

✓ 107715

THE Nation

A LIBERAL WEEKLY DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, ECONOMICS, SCIENCE, FOREIGN AFFAIRS, LITERATURE,
DRAMA AND THE ARTS

FOUNDED 1865

==

VOLUME 164

JANUARY 4, 1947, to JUNE 28, 1947

==

107715

THE NATION ASSOCIATES, INC.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK 7

INDEX TO VOLUME 164

JANUARY 4, 1947, to JUNE 28, 1947

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A Art
Arc Architecture
C Correspondence
CH Chart
Ct Cartoon
D Drama
E Editorial Article
EP Editorial Paragraph
M Music
MP Moving Pictures
P Poetry
S Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages	Pages
1-28 January 4	381-408 April 5
29-56 January 11	409-436 April 12
57-84 January 18	437-464 April 19
85-112 January 25	465-500 April 26
113-140 February 1	501-528 May 3
141-168 February 8	529-556 May 10
169-196 February 15	557-584 May 17
197-232 February 22	585-642 May 24
233-260 March 1	643-670 May 31
261-288 March 8	671-698 June 7
289-316 March 15	699-724 June 14
317-344 March 22	725-754 June 21
345-380 March 29	755-782 June 28

SUBJECT

A	PAGE
Aluminum trust, busting the, Putney.....	273
America:
I.T.O. and (editorial).....	412
Wants what, Kirchwey (editorial).....	504
American Authors Authority, Bower.....	772
American Veterans Committee, battle of, James.....	706
Americans for Democratic Action: (editorial).....	29
Bolté.....	424
Revolt in the middle, Bendiner.....	65
Andrews, Walter.....	55
Arab states, record of the, Hourani (letters).....	534
Arabian Nights in Flushing, Alvarez del Vayo.....	701
Argentina: Arm thine enemy (editorial).....	169
Arguello, Leonardo (editorial).....	169
Art, (articles by Greenberg):
Bonnard, Pierre.....	53
Cartier-Bresson, Henri, photographs.....	406
Chagall, Marc.....	525
Chirico.....	340
Dufuffet, Jean.....	164
Iane Street Group.....	284
Klee, Paul.....	578
Lachaise, Gaston.....	164
Miro, Joan.....	692
Moore, Henry.....	164
Motherwell, Robert.....	664
Painting in France, 1939-1946.....	228
Picasso's lithographs.....	405
Pollock, Jackson.....	137
Smith, David.....	459
Tamayo, Rufino.....	284
Van Doesburg, Theo.....	664
Whitney Annual.....	405
Atomic energy:
Debate on control (editorial).....	141
For the millions, Engel.....	648
Atomic Energy Commission, U. S.: Gamblers with destiny, Levin.....	201
Atomic report, the (editorial).....	31
B
Balch, Emily Greene, Randall.....	14
Baruch, Bernard (editorial).....	466
Bathsheba's lament in the garden, Lowell.....	120
Berlin and the Russian zone, Carmichael.....	453
Bethlehem Steel Corporation's forgotten men, Hutchison.....	453
Bevin, Ernest:
Dramatic criticism, Levy.....	732
Explodes (editorial).....	263
Great light, Vallance.....	651
Wins again, Vallance.....	679
Bigotry in B-flat, Sutton.....	768
Bilbao, letter from (editorial).....	647
Blum, Leon (editorial).....	57
Bonnard, Pierre, work of, Greenberg.....	53
Braden, Spruille, or Messersmith? Bendiner.....	116
Brain for hire, this, Joesten.....	36

Branting, Georg (editorial).....	465
Brest-Litovsk again.....	630
Bright spot in the West, McWilliams.....	709
Budget problem, G.O.P. (editorial).....	60
Business:
Buyers' market, where's that? Hutchison.....	278
Challenge to (editorial).....	441
Will business bring down prices? Lesser.....	442
C
Canada, Social Credit movement, McWilliams.....	11
Cartels, German, and AMG, Lobbenberg.....	299
Cartoons:
Balancing act, Schloss.....	440
Crusaders, the, Schloss.....	390
Summer styles for Uncle Sam (1947), Schloss.....	735
"You only lose once," Schloss.....	675
Catholicism, the Roman Catholic Church.....	330
Catt, Carrie Chapman, Adams.....	441
Challenge to business (editorial).....	441
China:
Chiang, falls back (editorial).....	675
Chinese students, the, Lyon.....	767
Dark destiny of, Durdin.....	150
Next steps in, Stewart.....	566
Pulling out of? (editorial).....	143
Taiwan, unhappy colony, Durdin.....	685
Terror in Taiwan, Durdin.....	526
Time bomb (editorial).....	199
Chirico, work of, Greenberg.....	340
Churchill, Winston:
(editorial).....	320
War, Kirchwey (editorial).....	320
Civil rights, fresh start, Bendiner.....	536
Coal, how to run, Coleman.....	242
Communism vs. dollars Kirchwey (editorial).....	646
Conant, James Bryant (editorial).....	114
Conference of the excluded, Baldinger.....	99
Congress, U. S.:
Committee assignments (editorial).....	87
Eightieth, the (editorial).....	3
Congress of Industrial Organizations, South- east drive, Metzger.....	38
Conscientious objectors: in California, Geiger.....	331
Cooperatives, banner year for (editorial).....	89
Cost of living: What will your dollar buy in 1947? Lesser.....	63
Cross and the circle, the, McWilliams.....	11
Crude oil politics, Hutchison.....	71
Curtain raiser for '48, Neuberger.....	682
Cushing, Harvey, health plan, Gumpert.....	127
D
Dalton, Hugh and Mr. Micawber, Vallance.....	512
Dance, the José Limón, Mishun.....	110
De Gaulle, Charles (editorial).....	438
De Gaulle, Charles (editorial).....	539
De Gaulle, Charles (editorial).....	31
De Gaulle, Charles (editorial).....	245
De Gaulle, Charles (editorial).....	736
De Gaulle, Charles (editorial).....	680
De Gaulle, Charles (editorial).....	417
De Gaulle, Charles (editorial).....	584
De Gaulle, Charles (editorial).....	324
De Gaulle, Charles (editorial).....	360, 448, 509, 655
De Gaulle, Charles (editorial).....	63
De Gaulle, Charles (editorial).....	646
De Gaulle, Charles (editorial).....	262
Drama (reviews by Krutch):
"Allice in Wonderland".....	494
"All My Sons".....	191
"Fatal Weakness, the," Kelly.....	81
"Big Two, the".....	110
"Chocolate Soldier".....	377
"Craig's Wife".....	256
"Eagle Has Two Heads, The".....	403
"Fatal Weakness, the," Kelly.....	81
"Importance of being earnest".....	338
"Little A".....	140
"Love for Love".....	691
"Parlor Story".....	375
"Story of Mary Surratt".....	226
"Whole World Over, The".....	459
"Wolf, Donald-Shakespeare".....	283
"Yellow Jack".....	312
Dufuffet, Jean, art of, Greenberg.....	136
E
Editorials:
America and the I.T.O.....	412
Anglo-French treaty.....	169
Anglo-Soviet treaty of 1942.....	113
Arm thine enemy.....	701
Assembly's decision.....	617
Atomic-energy-control debate.....	141
Atomic report, the.....	31

Back to McKinley.....	506
Baruch, Bernard.....	466
Behind the Hungarians "coup," Kirchwey.....	731
Best foot forward.....	33
Braden or Messersmith? Bendiner.....	116
Branting, Georg.....	465
British-Burma agreement.....	142
British coal crisis.....	197
Challenge to business.....	441
Chiang falls back.....	675
China, pulling out of?.....	143
China's time bomb.....	199
Churchill, Winston.....	320
Churchill's war, Kirchwey.....	439
Cooperatives, banner year for.....	89
Crisis in Britain.....	113
De Gaulle, Charles.....	438
Dollars vs. communism, Kirchwey.....	646
Douglas, Lewis.....	262
Eightieth Congress.....	3
Fascism in the U. S.....	437
Federal aid and Catholic schools.....	618
Future of empire.....	4
G.O.P. budget problem.....	60
G.O.P. saboteurs.....	171
Gromyko, Andrei, contra mundum.....	292
Harris, James.....	263
Hoess, Rudolf, mass murderer.....	411
Hoover report.....	261
Truman speech.....	713
India divided.....	702
Killian, James A.....	235, 411
Learning the hard way.....	467
Letter from Bilbao.....	647
Lewis, Charles.....	291, 10
Liberals beware! Kirchwey.....	384
Lilienthal, David.....	197, 233, 412
Manifest destiny, 1947, Kirchwey.....	317
Marshall plan.....	729, 758
Moscow Conference failure.....	463
Mr. Bevin explodes.....	263
Mufti's henchmen—a who's who.....	561
Mugwumps in action, Kirchwey.....	61
Murray, Philip.....	263
New coalition for old.....	560
Nicaragua's presidential election.....	169
Notes for a new year, Kirchwey.....	33
Palestine.....	33, 141, 172, 236, 468, 533, 561, 600
Pass the Stratton bill.....	674
Passage from India.....	236
Planning or starvation.....	645
Podell, David Louis.....	143
Powers at Moscow, the.....	264
Prisoners.....	11
Railroad rate increase.....	235
Rankin, John.....	235
Remember Mr. Hoover!.....	532
Rent control.....	143
Republican party, had enough?.....	319
Secretary of state, the.....	59
Shirer, William.....	347, 381
Slight case of murder.....	757
Socialization in Germany.....	143
Stern, David.....	143
Talmadge, Herman.....	233
Tax cuts and politics.....	349
To the Greeks, bearing gifts, Kirchwey.....	347
United States and Steel-I.O. agreement.....	518
Voice of Europe.....	88
Voorhis, Jerry.....	383
What America wants, Kirchwey.....	504
Why teachers rebel.....	200
E
Chinese students, the, Lyon.....	767
Federal aid and Catholic schools (editorial).....	618
Why teachers rebel (editorial).....	200
Election day in Santo Domingo.....	543
Empire, death of, in the Pacific, Stewart.....	178
Europe:
Can our dollars save? Bolles.....	759
Revolution in Eastern, Poulos.....	734
This summer?.....	570
Everybody's business, Hutchison:
America's world bank.....	425
Are profits too high?.....	305
Bethlehem's forgotten men.....	453
Bringing the trade gap.....	659
British budget.....	480
Chessie chases the fat cats.....	186
Colonial socialism.....	249
"Is trade".....	518
Famine and surplus.....	101
Fighting for tariffs.....	17
Financing the Monnet Plan.....	631
Hogs around the sugar bowl.....	157
Oil: East and West.....	742
Oil, have we enough?.....	744
Prayer, profits, and pie.....	213
Reform or bankruptcy.....	573
Russia and reparations.....	543
Shifting the tax burden.....	771
Speak up, consumers!.....	688
Storm in a cocoa cup.....	129

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Undistributed profits	397	Housing:		Lone Star liberals, Carter	780
Vanishing building boom	545	Must: politics control? Abrams	293	Net profit is less, Van Horn	669
Where's that buyers' market?	278	Vanishing building boom, Hutchison	545	Niemöller—not a Nazi, Niebuhr	407
Why Greeks go left	364	We need a better housing bill, Abrams	562	Not the same "Nation," Roussellange	166
Existentialism (editorial)	171	Workable program, Abrams	15	Old dilemma, Baxter	668
		Human rights (editorial)	577	Old disease, an, Hughes	231
F		Hungarian "coup," behind the, Kirchwey	251	Ought to be a law, Abrams	668
"Fair trade" for whom? Hutchison	518	(editorial)	347	Our Marxist president, Adams	583
Faith to live by:		(editorial)	731	Picasso appeals, Webster	534
"At the end of the crisis, a new world,"		(poetry)	575	Postscript to pay day, Smith	231
Maritain	568	(editorial)	197	Race fight strategy, Kennedy	499
Dilemma of modern man, Niebuhr	205	Hutchison, Ralph C. (editorial)	114	Real appeasers, Brown	463
Institutions and men, Meyer	269			Realism, two kinds of, Schutz	111
Famine:		I		Recollections of Judge Tree, Barnard	781
And still they laugh, Larom	479	In one ear, see Radio		Record of the Arab states, Hourani	55
Planning or starvation (editorial)	645	In the wind...40, 100, 363, 478, 538, 629, 742		Reduce the cost, Foreman	315
Surplus and, Hutchison	101	India:		Rugged collectivist, a, Guerard	83
Farewell to New York, Boyle	271	Comes into its own, Rao	275	Ryder biographer, Mallan	499
Farmer pays his debts, the, Hearst	420	Crisis, behind, Rao	704	Same fight, Nicotri	751
Federal Communications Commission, Franklin	102	Divided (editorial)	702	Soviet Tartars, Fischer	582
Fields, W. C. (editorial)	3	Drifts toward civil war, Rao	653	Spanish intellectuals appeal, Quiroga Pla	697
Food:		Hour of decision, Rao	394	Spoils system in action, O'Neal	83
In France, Blum	683	Mountbatten's task in, Rao	394	Step forward, a, Man	83
"Let the people eat chops," Gedye	209	New destiny, Rao	125	Stieglitz items requested, Norman	83
Ford, Henry, II, price-cutting announce-	86	Passage from (editorial)	236	There isn't any business, Dennison	343
ment (editorial)	86	Industrial giants, the 250, Sternberg	763	To resolve a discord, Vamberg; Masaryk	287
Foreign policy:		Innocence, Mizener (poem)	47	UNRRA was careful, MacDuffie	435
Five-star, Reynolds	676	Institutions and men, Meyer	269	Vatican representative, Adams	83
Plea to America, Roosevelt	352	Insurance, life, is it healthy? Gumpert	708	Wayward reviewer, Leigh	640
Forest, national, looting, Neuberger	471	International Bank for Reconstruction and		Who talks for the Arabs? Yahuda	582
France:		Development, Hutchison	425	Who will be the judge? Porter	640
Anglo-French treaty (editorial)	169	International Trade Organization, America	412	With open eyes, Guerard	556
As a Frenchman sees us, La Salle	296	(and editorial)	425	You can't firm that! Hobart	435
Food and wages in, Blum	683	Iraq: Black-gold and poverty, Roth	444
Is not finished, Alvarez del Vayo	743	Isabelita has lost her reason, Boyle	628	Lewis, John L. (editorial)	291, 410
Letter from Paris, Clark	150	Italy:		Life insurance, is it healthy? Gumpert	708
Nazi plots and French plans, Alvarez del		Anti-clerical magazines (editorial)	72	Lilienthal David (editorial)	170, 197, 233, 412
Vayo	266	Letter from Rome, Rossi	742	Limón, José, work of, Mishmun	110
Ramadier cabinet, make-up (editorial)	113	Loan to (editorial)	85	Looting the national forests, Neuberger	471
Tragedy of DeGaulle, Blum	539	On the hard road back, Alvarez del Vayo	327
France, Francisco, Dictator-Regent, Alvarez		Place in the world, Alvarez del Vayo	473	M
del Vayo	517	Vatican versus left, Alvarez del Vayo	388
Freedom of the press, Republicans and, Putney	67			Management: Bethlehem's forgotten men,
		J		Hutchison	453
G		Jamaica, notes on, Marshall	423, 476	Manifest destiny, 1947, Kirchwey (editorial)	317
Gamblers with destiny, Levin	201			Marshall, George C.
Georgia:		K		Plan (editorial)	729
Condemnation of Talmadge (editorial)	89, 233	Kelly machine, Chicago dumps, Akers	7	Marketing, Kirchwey (editorial)	758
Georgians have had enough, Mezzerik	174	Killian, James A. (editorial)	235, 411	Role in Moscow, Werth	350
Pay day in, Smith	118	Klee, Paul, work of, Greenberg	578	Secretary of state (editorial)	59
Political crisis (editorial)	141	Kolonaki and the others, Field	358	Messersmith, George S.
Germany:		Korea, an American tragedy, Hamlin	245	(editorial)	85
Nazi plots and the Russian zone, Carmichael	120			Braden or, Bendiner	116
Cancer spot of Europe, Sternberg	146	L		Middle east: Back stage in the Persian the-
Cartels and AMG, Lobbenberg	299	Labor:		atre, Roth	514
Hoover report, (editorial)	261	Coalition in Holland, Niebuhr	447	Miro, Joan, work of, Greenberg	601
Monument to Hitler, Boyle	417	House divided, Baldinger	238	Monnet Plan, financing, Hutchison	631
Nazi plots and French plans, Alvarez del		Pains of Senator Taft, Baldinger	238	Montgomery, Alexander, in Moscow, Werth	68
Vayo	266	"Time is money," Mezzerik	121	Monument to Hitler, Boyle	417
Socialization in (editorial)	144	Voices without smiles, Eulau	392	Moore, Henry, art of, Greenberg	164
Soviet politics in, Carmichael	42	What's ahead for? Baldinger	5	Moore Conference
Will Russia stay in? Carmichael	9	Lance, Gaston, work of, Greenberg	195	"American question," Werth	624
Great Britain:		Land without conflict, Gumpert	365	Clash at Moscow, Werth	413
Anglo-Soviet treaty of 1942 (editorial)	113	Landlords' field day, Wechsler	175	Failure of (editorial)	465
Arab League and (editorial)	599	Latin America, reaction in, Alvarez del Vayo	687	Marshall's role in Moscow, Werth	350
Bad news for British Tories, Vallance	92	Legislation:		Moscow overture, Werth	294
Bevin, Ernest, see Bevin, Ernest		Housing bill, we need a better, Abrams	562	Powers at (editorial)	264
Britain's emergency, Vallance	203	Stratton bill, E	674	Two worlds in Moscow, Werth	322
Burmese delegation agreement (editorial)	142	"Let the people eat chops," Gedye	209	Where do we go from? Werth	507
Coral crisis (editorial)	197	Letters:		Motion pictures, Agee
Colonial socialism, Hutchison	249	Advice on tactics, Duncan	499	"Adventures, the"	339
Labels in (editorial)	115	Beloved gentlemen, Perlez	780	"Angel and the Bad Man"	339
Dalton, Hugh, and Mr. Micawber, Vallance	512	Building codes vs. progress, Green	167	"Before Him All Rome Trembled"	340
Future of empire (editorial)	4	Bund offshoot? Sheldon	287	"Beginning or the End"	259
How deep is Britain's crisis, Vallance	297	Callou, callay for Harry, Buchan	751	"Blaze of Noon"	340
Inquest on the British press, Vallance	451	Catholic deny it, Lewis	527	"Boomerang"	340
Labor government (editorial)	58	Challenge . . . and a response, Somerville;	554	"Cage of Nightingales"	340
Labor's pledges on Palestine	600	Hook		"Captive Heart"	553
Socialism begins at home, Alvarez del		Chinese writers, aid for, Carmer et al.	111	"Carnegie Hall"	553
Vayo	247	Common sense for peace, Williams	195	"Carnival in Costa Rica"	553
Without empire, Laski	353, 415	Compromise on method, Schwartz	195	Catholics and Hollywood	183
Great Britain:		Crane documents wanted, Remords	298	"Children of Paradise"	553
American reciprocity (editorial)	289	Digging out the truth, Yale University Press	69	"Egg and I"	553
Common sense for, Williams (letters)	696	Distorted picture, Quinn	195	"Farmer's Daughter"	433
Greek frontier, Poulos	620	Long Dubois paragon, Apteker	463	"It Happened in Brooklyn"	433
Kolonaki and the others, Field	358	Ethical protest, Trilling	111	"Ivan the Terrible"	495
Meet your Greek allies, Poulos	761	Everybody's battle, Robbins	111	Man's Hope	134
To the Greeks, bearing gifts, Kirchwey	356	Friends from Britain, Bird	752	"Monsieur Verdox"	551, 665, 723, 749
What America could do in, Poulos	356	From Paris, Clark	152	Movies in 1946	108
Why Greeks go left, Hutchison	364	German peace movement, Valettin	166	23 Rue Madeleine	69
Gromyko, Andrei, contra mundum (editorial)	292	Health bill's limitations, Davis	315	"Zéro de Conduite"	553
		How to do it, Holborn	167	Mountbatten's task in India, Rao	394
H		In Rhee's defense, Oliver	407	Mufti's henchmen—a who's who (editorial)	561
Harris, James (editorial)	263	In the face of reality, Schwartz	315	Mugwumps in action, Kirchwey (editorial)	61
Haskell, William H., memo to (editorial)	59	Insult to Isherwood? Laughlin	101	Murray, Philip (editorial)	263
Health, public: Cushing health plan, the,		Is good prose a crime? Goldin	167	Music, Haggin:
Gumpert	127	Rust for the record, Ayers	780	Balanche	54
Holland, labor coalition in, Niebuhr	411	Lamb or falcon? Martin	752	Ballet Society's presentation	259
Hollywood, see Motion pictures		Laski trial, the, McIvor	27	Bigotry in B-flat, Sutton	768
Homeless America, Abrams	15	Liberated attitudes, Yarmon	615	Iron and analysis seminars	579
Hoover, Herbert, report on Germany (editorial)	261	Life of de Leon, Lazarus	640	German musicologists	378

N	Progressives: Mugwumps in action, Kirchwey, E.....	61	Spain:	Dirty deals in.....	572
National Farm Labor Union, Baldinger.....	99		Francisco Franco: Dictator-Regent, Alvarez del Vayo.....	517
National forests, looting, Neuberger.....	471	R	Isabelita has lost her reason, Boyle.....	628
Naval misrule in the Pacific, Collier.....	738	Race relations:	Letter from Bilbao (editorial).....	647
Newsprint shortage (editorial).....	87	Is your name Gonzales? McWilliams.....	Report from, Alvarez del Vayo.....	711
Niemöller Martin (editorial).....	85	Land without conflict, Gumpert.....	Republican crisis, Alvarez del Vayo.....	211
Noway, Russian treaty revision (editorial).....	77	Radio:	Stalag Luft, Jarrell (poetry).....	773
Notes by the way, Marshall.....	546, 632, 689,	Broadcasters' Advisory Council, Frankel.....	Steel mills, we need more, Putney.....	94
Notes for a new year, Kirchwey (editorial).....	374	"Cross-Section—U. S. A." Frankel.....	Stern, David J. (editorial).....	143
O		Documentaries by CBS, Frankel.....	Stratton bill, pass the (editorial).....	674
O'Dwyer, James (editorial).....	199	Educational programs, Frankel.....	Students, American, talk it over, Farrar.....	45
Obituaries:		Federal Communications Commission, Frankel.....	Sudan, who should rule the Henares.....	540
Catt, Carrie Chapman, Adams.....	330	102	Supreme Court, U.S., Ewing Township case.....	199
Podell, David Louis.....	143	128	ruling (editorial).....	101
Oil:		Intercollegiate Broadcasting System, Frankel.....	Surplus, famine and, Hutchison.....	101
Crude oil politics, Hutchison.....	71	158	Sweden still the middle way, Harvey.....	101
East and West, Hutchison.....	712	International Broadcasting Foundation, Frankel.....
Have we enough? Hutchison.....	744	158
Under the sign of the Flying Red Horse, Mezerik.....	509	454
One country: Equal rights, Arnall.....	650	481
		46 187
		277
		212
		347
		334
		18
		186
		154
		347 213 113
		235
		433 104 165
		140 461 497 110 166
		165
		194
		110
		82
		166
		166
		342, 433
		110 166
		166
		165
		406 497 109
		139
		435
		110, 433
		435
		165
		435 194 497
		143
		175
		333 60 67
		171
		319 467
		34
		177 65
		734 171
		185
		388
		742
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68
		85 264 333 42
		9
		239 113
		120
		630
		183
		703
		68

PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
"Egg and I".....	553	Carter, Jack, Lone Star liberals (letters)....	780	Ginger Raymond S., Wants data on Debs (letters).....	781
"Farmer's Daughter".....	433	Clark, Eleanor.....	335	Glazer, Nathan, Black anger, Sachs (R).....	222
"It happened in Brooklyn".....	433	Aerodrome, the, Warner (R).....	402	Gold, W. J.:.....
"It's a Wonderful Life".....	193	Angelic avengers, the, Andrezej (R).....	493	Future in perspective the, Neumann (R).....	77
"Ivan the Terrible".....	495	Fyodor Dostoevsky, Lloyd (R).....	493	Refugees in America, Davie (R).....	777
"Man's Hope".....	134	Under the volcano, Lowry (R).....	335	Way of the South, Odum (R).....	574
"Monsieur Verdoux".....	551, 665, 723, 749	Wayward bus, the, Steinbeck (R).....	370	Goldberg, Arthur J., Secret missions, Zacharias (R).....	520
Movies in 1946.....	108	Clark, Michael:.....		Goldin, Judah, Is good prose a crime? (letters) 167
"13 Rue Madeleine".....	257	Behind the Viet-Nam revolt.....	564	Goldschmidt Walter R., Alive and kicking (letters).....	84
"Zéro de Conduite".....	778	Letters from Paris.....	152	Green John, Building codes vs. progress (letters).....	167
Akers, Milburn P., Chicago dumps Kelly.....	7	Coleman, McAlister.....	634	Greenberg, Clement, art:.....
Aptheker, Herbert, edits DuBois papers (letters).....	435	American dynasty, Tebbel (R).....	634	Bonnard, Pierre.....	53
Armstrong, Jane, Dionne centuplets.....	736	How to run coal.....	242	Cartier-Bresson, Henri, photographs.....	406
Arnall, Ellis, One country: Equal rights.....	650	Small town, Hicks (R).....	281	Chagall, Marc.....	340
Auden, W. H.:.....		Tour of Duty, Dos Passos (R).....	80	Chirico.....	340
Fall of Rome (poem).....	716	Collier, John, Naval misrule in the Pacific.....	738	Dubuffet, Jean.....	136
Some notes on D. H. Lawrence.....	482	Commanger, Henry Steele, Washington witch-hunt.....	385	Jane Street Group.....	284
Ayers, C. E., Just for the record (letters).....	780	Grossman, R. H. S., Weizmann.....	181	Klee, Paul.....	578
B
Baldinger, Wilbur H.:.....		Crum, Bartley C.:.....		Lachaise, Gaston.....	64
Conference of the excluded.....	99	Palestine: Star or crescent? Barbour (R).....	549	Miro, Joan.....	692
Labor pains of Senator Taft.....	145	Underground to Palestine, Stone (R).....	504	Moore, Henry.....	164
Labor's house divided.....	288	D
Republicans on the hill.....	34	Davis, H. David, Brandeis: A free man's life, Mason (R).....	48	Motherwell, Robert.....	664
What's ahead for labor?.....	5	Davis, Michael M.:.....		Painting in France, 1939-1946.....	228
Baldwin, James, Best short stories, Gorki (R) 427		Health bill's limitations (letters).....	315	Picasso's lithographs.....	405
Bardin, John Franklin, Father of the man, Davis and Houghurst (R).....	523	Medicine in the changing order, Communist front (R).....	550	Pollock, Jackson.....	137
Barnard, Harry, Recollections of Judge Tree (letters).....	781	Dean, Vera Micheles, Guide to the Soviet Union, Mandel (R).....	282	Smith, David, sculpture.....	459
Barrett, William:.....		Del Vayo, J. Alvarez:.....		Tamayo, Rufino.....	284
Kafka problem, the, Flores, ed. (R).....	23	Arabian Nights in Flushing.....	534	Van Doesburg, Theo.....	664
Kierkegaard anthology, Bretall, ed. (R).....	250	France is not finished.....	243	Watney, Anna.....	403
Barzun, Jacques, Balzac, Zweig (R).....	279	Francisco Franco: Dictator-Regent.....	517	Griffiths, Joan, Gentleman's agreement, Hobson (R).....	521
Bates, Ralph:.....		Italy on the hard road back.....	327	Guérard, Albert:.....
Farewell to Salomika, Sciaky (R).....	78	Italy's place in the world.....	473	Am I my brother's keeper? Coomaraswamy (R).....	634
Scientists against time, Baxter (R).....	162	People's front, the.....	41, 70, 96	Aurelien Aragon (book review).....	747
Baxter, Percival, Old dilemma (letters).....	668	Perón on the march.....	658	Communitas: Means of livelihood and ways of life, Goodman (R).....	574
Bazelon, David T.:.....		Reaction in Latin America.....	687	Critics and crusaders, Madison (R).....	428
Christ stopped at Eholi, Levi (R).....	635	Report from Spain.....	711	French personalities and problems, Brogan (R).....	338
Essay on morals, Wylie (R).....	336	Spanish Republican crisis.....	211	Religion in public education, Thayer (R).....	309
How it happens, Buck (R).....	190	Vatican versus left in Italy.....	383	Rugged collectivist (letters).....	83
Touched with fire: Civil War letters and diary of Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. Howe, ed. (R).....	577	Dennison, Henry S., There isn't any business (letters).....	343	When the cathedrals were white, Le Corbusier (R).....	519
Bendiner, Robert:.....		Dunbar, Hugh, Advice on tactics (letters).....	499	With open eyes (letters).....	556
Braden or Messersmith?.....	116	Durbin, Peggy:.....		Gumpert, Martin:.....
Civil rights—fresh start.....	536	China's dark destiny.....	150	Cushing health plan, the.....	127
Hurry up please its time, Hawes (R).....	50	Taiwan: China's unhappy colony.....	685	End of tuberculosis, the?.....	13
Inside U. S. A., Gunther (R).....	716	Terror in Taiwan.....	626	Is life insurance healthy?.....	708
Revolt in the middle.....	65	E			395
Berryman, John, Well-wrought urn, Brooks (R).....	775	Empson, William:.....		Haggin, B. H., music:.....
Bird, Arthur H., Friends from Britain (letters).....	752	Poems, 1938-1945, Graves (R).....	403	Balanchine.....	54
Bishop, Elizabeth:.....		Selected writings of Dylan Thomas (R) 214		Ballet Society's presentation.....	259
Faustina or, Rock Roses (poetry).....	214	Engel, Leonard:.....		Form and analysis seminars.....	579
Fourth Street (poetry).....	308	Atomic energy for the millions.....	648	German musicologists.....	378
Blackmur, R. P.:.....		Revolution in warfare, Hart (R).....	748	Harvard Symposium on music criticism.....	779
In defense of reason, Winters (R).....	718	Eulau, Heinz, Voices without smiles.....	392	Koussevitzky's service to composers.....	313
Leo Tolstoy, Simmons (R).....	103	F
Rime of the Ancient Mariner, Coleridge (R) 307		Farrar, John Curtis, American students talk it over.....	45	"Mother of Us All".....	615
Blanc-Ross, René:.....		Farrell, Charles B., Haydn: A creative life in music, Geiringer (R).....	310	New York Philharmonic crisis.....	229, 284
Prose poems from the illuminations, Rimbaud (R).....	49	Farrell, James T., This is my story, Budenz (R).....	368	Bach's "Christ lag in Todes banden".....	433
Residence on earth, Neruda (R).....	160	Field, Allen D., Kolonaki and the others.....	358	Bach's D minor Concerto.....	194
Blum, Léon:.....		Fischer, Markosha, Soviet Tartars (letters) 582		Beethoven's Fourth Symphony.....	140
Food and wages in France.....	683	Fitzgerald, Robert, Mountain lion, the, Stafford (R).....	399	Beethoven's Piano Sonata Opus 27 No. 2.....	491
Tragedy of DeGaulle.....	539	Fodor, M. W., Bright passage, the, Hindus (R).....	488	Beethoven's Sonata Opus 13.....	467
Bogan, Louise, Blue flower, the: Best stories of the Romantics, Kesten, ed. (R).....	159	Foreman, Clark, Reduce the cost (letters).....	315	Brahm's Second Symphony.....	139
Bolles, Blair, Can our dollars save Europe?.....	759	Frankel, Lou, In one ear:.....		Brahm's Third Symphony.....	109
Borstein, Z.R.:.....		Broadcasters' Advisory Council.....	365	Chopin's Sonata Opus 35.....	166
Berlin underground, 1938-1945, Andreas-Friedrich (R).....	721	Documentaries by CBS.....	304	Copland's "Lincoln Portrait".....	165
Germany's underground, Dulles (R).....	575	Educational programs.....	426	Debussy's "Pour le piano".....	194
Mind and death of a genius, Abrahamson (R).....	452	Federal Communications Commission.....	102	Debussy's Preludes.....	110
Mind at the end of its tether, Wells (R).....	80	FM broadcasting.....	128	Foreign recordings.....	166
Boy, Kay:.....		International Broadcasting Foundation.....	454	Gershwin's Prelude No. 2.....	166
Farewell to New York.....	271	Juvenile programs.....	481	Hamlet, Maurice Evans.....	166
Isabelita has lost her reason.....	628	Lazarsfeld survey.....	46	Handel's "Messiah".....	342, 433
Monument to Hitler.....	417	"Let the people eat chops".....	209	Haydn's Quartet Opus 74, No. 3.....	110
Bresler, Harvey:.....		Geiger, Henry, Conscience in California.....	331	Khachaturian's Piano Concerto.....	166
Reconquest: Its results and responsibilities, Albend (R).....	133	Gilson, Mary Barnett, In the face of reality (letters).....	315	"l'Oiseau de feu".....	166
Spheres of influence, Morrell (R).....	133	Goris, Robert E., Music in our time, Salazar (R).....	48	La Traviata.....	165
Brodie, Berland, Strange alliance, the, Deane (R).....	224	Gedye, G. E. R.:.....		Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro".....	406
Brooks, W., "The appeaser" (letters) 643		Disunion in Vienna.....	684	Mozart's Quartet in E flat.....	497
Buchan, John, Callow, calloy for Harry (letters).....	751	"Let the people eat chops".....	209	Mozart's sonatas.....	109
Buckman, Gertrude:.....		Geiger, Henry, Conscience in California.....	331	Mozart's Symphony K. 551.....	139
Joy, Bernanos (R).....	456	Gilson, Mary Barnett, In the face of reality (letters).....	315	Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3.....	435
Woman of the Pharisees, Mauriac (R).....	456	WQXR programs.....	334	Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5.....	110, 435
C
Carmichael, Joel:.....		Satire of Henry Morgan.....	212	Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter".....	435
Berlin and the Russian zone.....	120	WQXR programs.....	334	Schubert's "Schöne Müllerin".....	165
Crisis of Zionism.....	90	Satre of Henry Morgan.....	212	Sibelius's Fourth Symphony.....	435
Soviet politics in Poland.....	42	WQXR programs.....	334	Strauss's "Tod und Verklärung".....	194
Will Russia stay in Germany?.....	9	Satre of Henry Morgan.....	212	Stravinsky's "Saere du printemps".....	497
G
Carmer, Carl, et al, Aid for Chinese writers.....	111	Hamilton, Thomas J.:.....		After UNRRA, what?.....	123
Carmichael, Joel:.....		Complicit dictator, Hoare (R).....	250	Hamlin, Will, Korea: An American tragedy.....	245
Berlin and the Russian zone.....	120	Harris, Seymour E., Those perverse Republicans.....	177	Harrow, Benjamin:.....
Crisis of Zionism.....	90	Explaining the atom, Hecht (R).....	719	Human destiny, du Noy (R).....	282
Soviet politics in Poland.....	42	Human destiny, du Noy (R).....	282	Path of science, the, Mees (R).....	162
Will Russia stay in Germany?.....	9	Harvey, Robert, Sweden: Still the middle way.....	420	Hearst, James, Farmer pays his debts, the.....	420

Henriques, Robert, Who should rule the Sudan?	540	"Whole World Over, The"	459	O
Hick, Albert C.	340	Wolff, Donald—Shakespeare	283
Election day in Santo Domingo	543	"Yellow Jack"	312
Péron's expanding empire	765	Hannah More and her circle, Hopkins (R) ..	486	O'Brien, Justin:	487
Hobart, Alice Tisdale, You can't film that! (letters)	499			Republic of silence, Liebling, ed. (R)	487
Holborn, Frank, How to do it (letters)	167			Three short novels, Vercors (R)	487
Holmes, John V., Question, a (letters)	166			O'Neal, Maude, Spoils system in action (letters) ..	83
Hook, Sidney:				Oliver, Robert T., In Rhee's defense (letters) ..	407
Challenge	554
Soviet Philosophy: A study of theory and practice, Somerville (R)	188
Hourani, Cecil, Record of the Arab states (letters)	55
Howe, Irving, Portable Ring Lardner, the (R) ..	131
Hughes, Asa M., An old disease (letters)	231
Humphries, Rolf:
Earth-bound, the, Lewis (R)	281
Lady Gregory's journals, 1916-1930, Robinson ed. (R)	575
Mainly on the air, Beerholm (R)	338
Santa Claus, Cummings (R)	78
Slow music, Taggard (R)	281
Hunt, Storor B., Long not a German (letters) ..	463
Hutchinson, Keith:
Crude oil politics	71
Everybody's business:
America's world bank	425
Are profits too high?	305
Bethlehem's forgotten men	453
Bridging the trade gap	659
British budget	490
Chessie chases the fat cats	186
Colonial socialism	249
"Fair trade" for whom?	518
Famine and surplus	101
Fighting for tariffs	17
Financing the Monnet Plan	631
Hogs around the sugar bowl	157
Oil, have we enough?	744
Oil: East and West	712
Prayer, profits and pie	573
Reform or bankruptcy	213
Russia and reparations	523
Shifting the tax burden	771
Speak up, customers!	688
Storm in a cocoa cup	129
Undistributed profits	397
Vanishing building boom	545
Where's that buyers' market?	278
Why Greeks go left	766
History of Russia, Pares (R)	776
Income: An introduction to economics, Pigou (R) ..	721
Russia in perspective, Solovychetchnik (R) ..	726
Struggle on the Veld, Peattie (R)	691
United States and the Near East, Speiser (R) ..	683
Who they behave like Russians, Fischer (R) ..	434
I
Iduarte, Andres, Shirt-sleeve diplomat, Daniels (R) ..	745
J
James, Daniel, Battle of A.V.C.	706
James, Herbert, Our Marxist president (letters) ..	583
Jarrell, Randall:
Field hospital (poem)	714
Lord Weary's castle, Lowell (R)	74
Stalag Luft (poem)	773
Joesten, Joachim, This burden	36
Johnson, Harry M., Chrysanthemum and the sword, the, Benedict (R)	190
K
Kennedy, Stetson, Race fight strategy (letters) ..	499
Kirchway, Frecla:
Behind the Hungarian "coup" (editorial) ..	731
Dollars vs. Communism (editorial)	646
Liberals beware! (editorial)	384
Manifest destiny, 1947 (editorial)	317
Marketing the Marshall plan (editorial) ..	738
Mr. Churchill's war (editorial)	439
Mugwumps in action (editorial)	61
Notes for a new year (editorial)	73
Notes on power politics (editorial)	349
To the Greeks, hearing gifts (editorial) ..	407
U. N. and Palestine (editorial)	408
What Americans want (editorial)	504
Krutch, Joseph Wood, drama:
"Alice in Wonderland"	494
"All My Sons"	191
"Androcles and the Lion"	25
"Big Two, the"	338
"Chocolate Soldier"	377
"Craig's Wife"	256
"Eagle Has Two Heads, the"	403
"Fatal Weakness, the" Kelly	81
"Importance of Being Earnest"	338
"Little A"	140
"Love for Love"	691
"Parlor Story"	375
"Story of Mary Suratt"	226
L
Larom, Charles, And still they laugh	479
La Salle, Bertrand de, As a Frenchman sees us	296
Laski, Harold J.:
Britain without empire	353, 415
Why does Russia act that way?	239
Laughlin, James, Insult to Isherwood? (letters) ..	111
Lazarus, Louis, Life of de Leon (letters)	640
Leavenworth, Coman, Norfolk Memorials (poetry) ..	366
Leigh, Robert D., Wayword reviewed (letters) ..	640
Lesser, Simon O.:
What will your dollar buy in 1947?	63
Will business bring down prices?	442
Levin, Carl, Gamblers with destiny	201
Levy, Benn W., Ernest Bevin: a dramatic criticism ..	732
Lewis, John L., Can't deny it (letters)	527
Liebling, A. J., Free and responsible press, a (R) ..	427
Llobenberg, George, German cartels and AMG Lowell, Robert:	299
Bathsheba's lament in the garden (poem) ..	575
Her dead brother (poetry)	218
Transport to summer, Stevens (R)	400
Lowenthal, Marvin, Behind the silken curtain, Crum (R) ..	661
Lynd, Robert S., Coming crisis, the, Sternberg (R) ..	130
Lyon, Jean, Chinese students the	767
M
MacDuffie, Marshall, UNRRA was careful (letters) ..	435
Mallan, Lloyd, Ryder biographer (letters) ..	499
Man, Alphon, Step forward, a (letters)	83
Mann, Klaus, Ferdinand and Isabella, Kesten (R) ..	51
Maritain, Jacques, At the end of the crisis, a new world ..	568
Marshall, Margaret:
Notes by the way	546, 632, 689, 774
Notes on Jamaica	423, 476
Martin, David, Lamb or falcon? (letters) ..	752
Masaryk, Jan, To resolve a discord (letters) ..	287
Melvor, Archibald, Laski trial, the (letters) ..	27
McWilliams, Carey:
Action for unity, Watson (R)	523
Big Yankee, the, Blankfort (R)	431
Bright spot in the West	709
Cross and the circle, the	302
Is your name Gonzales?	280
Plotlers, the, Carlson (R)	132
Southern exposure, Kennedy (R)	623
Tacoma agreement	269
Meyer, Gerd, Jr., Institutions and men
Mezerik, A. G.:
J. I. O. southern drive, the	38
Dixie in black and white	324, 360, 448, 509, 655, 740
Georgians have had enough	174
"Time is money"	121
Miles, Josephine, The Materialists: 1946 (poetry) ..	366
Mishnau, Virginia:
Cow-tail switch, the, Courlander and Herzog (R) ..	430
Limón, José	110
Mizener, Arthur:
Innocence (poem)	47
Noble voice, the: A study of ten great poems, Van Doren (R) ..	131
Prefaces to Shakespeare, vol. 1, Granville-Barker (R) ..	549
Morris, Charles, History of American philosophy, Schneider (R) ..	225
Myers, E. D., Study of history, a, Toynebe (R) ..	455
N
Nagel, Ernest, Introduction to Peirce's philosophy, interpreted as a system, Feibleman (R) ..	521
Neulberger, Richard L.:
Curtain raises for	682
Highballing with kilowatts	154
Looting the national forest	471
Nicotri, Gaspare, Same fight (letters)	751
Niebuhr, Reinhold:
Dilemma of modern man	205
Labor coalition in Holland	447
Niemöller—not a Nazi (letters)	407
Norman, Dorothy, Requests Sieglitz items ..	315
Noyes, Charles E.:
Congress at the crossroads, Galloway (R) ..	161
Lions under the throne, Curtis (R)	458
Taxation for prosperity, Paul (R)	576
O
O'Brien, Justin:
Republic of silence, Liebling, ed. (R)	487
Three short novels, Vercors (R)	487
O'Neal, Maude, Spoils system in action (letters) ..	83
Oliver, Robert T., In Rhee's defense (letters) ..	407
P
Pence, R. W., Question of hypocrisy (letters) ..	166
Perez, R. C., Beloved gentlemen (letters)	780
Porter, Katherine Anne, Who will be the judge (letters) ..	640
Poulos, Constantine:
Greek frontier	621
Meet our Greek allies	765
Revolution in Eastern Europe	734
What America could do in Greece	356
Putney, Bryant:
Busting the aluminum trust	273
Republicans and the First Freedom	67
We need more steel mills!	94
Q
Quinn, Herbert F., Distorted picture (letters) ..	195
Quiroga Pla, José, Spanish intellectuals appeal (letters) ..	697
R
Randall, John Herman, Jr., Emily Greene Balch	14
Ransom, John Crowe, Discovery of Europe, Rahv, ed. (R) ..	368
Rao, Shiva:
Behind India's crisis	704
India comes into its own	275
India drifts toward civil war	653
India's hour of decision	470
India's new destiny	125
Mountbatten's task in India	394
Reichenbach, Hans:
Einstein: His life and times, Frank (R) ..	306
Philosophy: Speculation or science? (R) ..	19
Remords, Georges, Wants Crane documents ..	28
Reynolds, Thomas F., Five-star foreign policy ..	626
Robbins, J. Knowles, Everybody's battle (letters) ..	111
Rolland, Siphra, Generous offer (letters) ..	166
Ross, Elliott, Plea to America	352
Rosenberg, Harold, Collected writings of Ambrose Bierce (R) ..	311
Rosenberger, Coleman:
Alexander H. Stephens: A biography, von Aiele (R) ..	105
White House physician, McIntire (R) ..	105
Rossi, Mario, Letter from Rome	742
Roth, Andrew:
Backstage in the Persian theatre	514
Bag: Black gold and poverty	444
Roussclange, A., Not the same "Nation" ..	166
S
Salisbury, Harrison, Year of Stalingrad, the, Werth (R) ..	519
Schlesinger, Arthur M., Jr.:
Ally betrayed, Martin (R)	218
Capitalism, socialism and democracy ..	489
Schumpter (R)	161
Frontier on the Potomac, Daniels (R) ..	161
Selected writings of John and John Quincy Adams, Koch and Peden, eds. (R) ..	489
Struggle for the world, the, Burnham (R) ..	398
The House physician, McIntire (R) ..	105
Schloss, Ezekiel, cartoon:
Balancing act	440
Crusaders	390
Summer styles for Uncle Sam, 1947 ..	735
You only lose once	25
Schutz, B. R., Two kinds of realism (letters) ..	111
Schwartz, Delmore, Selected poems of Kenneth Patchen (R) ..	220
Schwartz, Eugene G., Compromise on method (letters) ..	195
Seligman, Ben B., Economic policy and full employment, Hansen (R) ..	458
Sheldon, James H., Bund offshoot? (letters) ..	287
Smith, Lillian:
Pay day in Georgia	118
Postscript to pay day (letters)	231
Somerville, John, Challenge	554
Soule, George:
Cartels in action, Stocking and Watkins (R) ..	160
Planning and paying for full employment, Lerner and Graham, eds. (R) ..	254
Towards world prosperity, Ezekiel, ed. (R) ..	690
Trade of nations, the, Heilperin (R) ..	430
Sternberg, Fritz:
Cancer spot of Europe, diagnosis of the German problem ..	146
250 industrial giants, the	763

I

I. G. Farben, Sasuly (Welsh).....	746
In defense of reason, Winters (Blackmur)...	718
Income: An introduction to economics, Pigou (Hutchison)	721
Inside U. S. A., Gunther (Bendiner).....	716
Introduction to Peirce's philosophy, interpreted as a system, Feibleman (Nagel)	521

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
J		Patthen, Kenneth, selected poems (Schwartz)	220	Stocking, George W., and Watkins, Myron W., Carrels in action (Soule)	160
Jackson, Robert H., Nuremberg case, the (Vambéry)	492	Paul, Randolph E., Taxation for prosperity (Noyes)	576	Stone, J. E., Underground to Palestine (Crum)	104
Joy, Bernanos (Buckman)	456	Peattie, Roderick, Struggle on the veld (Hutchinson)	691	Strange alliance, the, Deane (Brodie)	224
K		Philosophy: Speculation or science? Reichenbach (Hutchinson)	19	Struggle for the world, the, Burnham (Schlesinger)	398
Kafka problem, the, Flores, ed. (Barrett)	23	Pigou, A. C., Income: An introduction to economics (Hutchinson)	721	Struggle on the veld, Peattie (Hutchinson)	691
Kardiner, Abram, War stress and neurotic illness (Zlatichin)	690	Planning and paying for full employment, Lerner and Graham, eds. (Soule)	254	Study of history, a, Toynebee (Myers)	453
Kennedy, Stetson, Southern exposure (McWilliams)	132	Plotter, the, Carlson (McWilliams)	280	T
Kesten, Hermann, ed., Blue flower: Best stories and the Romantics (Bogan)	151	Poems, 1938-1945, Graves (Empson)	403	Taggard, Genevieve, Slow music (Humphries)	281
Kierkegaard anthology, Bretall, ed. (Barrett)	250	Portable D. H., Lawrence, Trilling, ed. (Auden)	482	Taxation for prosperity, Paul (Noyes)	576
Koch, Adrienne, and Peden, William, eds., Selected writings of John and John Quincy Adams (Schlesinger)	489	Portable Ring Lardner, the (Howe)	131	Tebbel, John, American dynasty (Coleman)	309
L		Prose poems from the illuminations, Rimbaud (Blanc-Roos)	49	Thayer, V. T., Religion in public education (Guérard)	407
Lady Gregory's journals, 1916-1930, Robinson, ed. (Humphries)	577	R		This is my story, Budenz (Farrell)	367
Leo Tolstoy, Simmons (Blackmur)	103	Rahv, Philip, ed., Discovery of Europe (Ransom)	368	Three short novels, Vercors (O'Brien)	483
Lerner, Abba P., and Frank D. Graham, eds., Planning and paying for full employment (Soule)	254	Raw youth, Dostoevsky (Clark)	493	Todd, Ruthven, Tracks in the snow (Sypher)	720
Levi, Carlo, Christ stopped at Eboli (Bazelon)	635	Reconquest: Its results and responsibilities, Abend (Bresler)	133	Touched with fire: Civil War letters and diary of Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., Howe, ed. (Bazelon)	577
Lewis, Janet, Earth-bound, the (Humphries)	281	Religion in public education, Thayer (Guérard)	309	Tour of duty, Dos Passos (Coleman)	578
Liebling, A. J., ed., Republic of silence, the (O'Brien)	487	Republic of silence, the, Liebling, ed. (O'Brien)	487	Towards world prosperity, Ezekiel, ed. (Soule)	690
Life and the dream, Colum (Todd)	551	Residence on earth, Neruda (Blanc-Roos)	160	Toynebee, Arnold J., of history, (Myers)	453
Lions under the throne, Curtis (Noyes)	488	Religion in public education, Thayer (Guérard)	309	Tracks in the snow, Todd (Sypher)	720
Lloyd, J. A. T., Fyodor Dostoevsky (Clark)	493	Revolution in warfare, Hart (Engel)	748	Trade of nations, the, Helperin (Soule)	430
Lord, Russell, Wallace of Iowa, the (Waring)	491	Rimbaud, Arthur, Prose poems from the illuminations (Blanc-Roos)	49	Transport to summer, Stevens (Lowell)	400
Lowell, Weary's castle, Jewell (Jarrell)	74	Rime of the Ancient Mariner, Coleridge (Blackmur)	307	Trilling, Diana, ed., Portable, D. H. Lawrence (Auden)	748
Lowry, Robert, Lord Weary's castle (Jarrell)	74	Robinson, Lennox, ed., Lady Gregory's journals, 1916-1930 (Humphries)	577	U
Lowry, Malcolm, Under the volcano (Clark)	335	Russia in perspective, Solovyechnik (Hutchinson)	776	Under the volcano, Lowry (Clark)	335
M		S		Underground to Palestine, Stone (Crum)	104
Madison, Charles A., Critics and crusaders (Guérard)	428	Sachs, Curt, Commonwealth of art, the (Sypher)	216	United States and the Near East, Speiser (Hutchinson)	631
Mainly on the air, Beerbohm (Humphries)	338	Sachs, Wulf, Black anger (Glazer)	222	V
Mandel, William, Guide to the Soviet Union (Dean)	282	Salazar, Adolfo, Music in our time (Garis)	48	Van Doren, Mark, Noble voice, the: A study of ten great poems (Mizener)	131
Martin, David, Ally betrayed (Schlesinger)	218	Santa Claus, Cummings (Humphries)	78	Vercors, Three short novels (O'Brien)	483
Mason, H. David, Brandeis: A free man's life (Davis)	456	Sasuly, Richard, I. G. Farben (Werner)	746	von Abele, Rudolph, Alexander H. Stephens: A biography (Rosenberger)	103
Maupassant, Guy, Woman of the Pharos (Buckman)	456	Schlechtman, Joseph, European population transfers, 1939-1945 (Vambéry)	78	von Schuschnigg, Kurt, Austrian requiem (Werner)	47
McIntire, White House physician (Schlesinger)	105	Schneider, Herbert W., History of American philosophy (Morris)	225	W
Medicine in the changing order, Commonwealth Fund (Davis)	133	Schumpeter, Joseph, Capitalism, socialism, and democracy (Schlesinger)	489	Wallaces of Iowa, the, Lord (Waring)	491
Mees, Kenneth, Path of science, the (Harrow)	162	Sciaky, Leon, Farewell to Salonika (Bates)	78	War stress and neurotic illness, Kardiner (Zlatichin)	690
Mexico south, Covarrubias (Wildner)	336	Scientists against time, Baxter (Bates)	162	Waring, Alston, and Golden, Clinton S., Soil and steel (Stewart)	450
Mind and death of a genius, the, Abrahamson (Howe)	457	Secret missions, Zacharias (Goldberg)	520	Warner, Rex, Aerodrome, the (Clark)	333
Mind at the edge of the world, (Bower)	480	Selected poems of Kenneth Patchen (Schwartz)	220	Watkins, Myron W., Carrels in action (Soule)	160
Moorad, George, Behind the iron curtain (White)	255	Selected writings of Dylan Thomas (Empson)	214	Watson, Goodwin, Action for unity (McWilliams)	574
Morley, Sylvanus Griswold, Ancient Maya (Wildner)	663	Selected writings of John and John Quincy Adams, Koch and Peden, eds. (Schlesinger)	489	Way of the South, Odum (Gold)	574
Morrell, Sydney, Spheres of influence (Bresler)	133	Sheller, A. Life story, Blundin (Sypher)	373	Wayward bus, the, Steinbeck (Clark)	370
Mountain lion, the, Stafford (Fitzgerald)	399	Shirt-sleeve diplomat, Daniels (Iduarte)	745	Well-wrought urn, Brooks (Berryman)	773
Music in our time, Salazar (Garis)	48	Simmons, Ernest, Leo Tolstoy (Blackmur)	103	Wells, H. G., Mind at the end of its tether (Bower)	480
N		Slow music, Taggard (Humphries)	281	When Alexander, Year of Stalingrad (Salisbury)	519
Nabokov, Vladimir, Bend sinister (Trilling)	722	Small town, Hicks (Coleman)	281	When the cathedrals were white, Corbusier (Guérard)	519
Neruda, Pablo, Residence on earth (Blanc-Roos)	160	Snow, Edgar, Stalin must have peace (Bornstein)	721	White House physician, McIntire (Schlesinger)	105
Neumann, Hans, The coming crisis (Lynd)	78	Soil and steel, Waring and Golden (Stewart)	456	Why they behave like Russians, Fischer (Hutchinson)	484
Noble voice, the: A study of ten great poems, Van Doren (Mizener)	131	Solovyechnik, George, Russia in perspective (Hutchinson)	776	Winters, Yvor, In defense of reason (Blackburn)	711
Nuremberg case, the, Jackson (Vambéry)	492	Somerville, John, Study of theory and of theory and practice (Hook)	188	Woman of the Pharisees, Mauriac (Buckman)	450
O		Southern exposure, Kennedy (McWilliams)	132	World and Africa, the, DuBois (Werner)	402
Odum, Howard W., Way of the South (Gold)	574	Soviet impact on the Western world, Carr (Hutchinson)	191	Wouk, Herman, Aurora Dawn (Trilling)	630
P		Soviet philosophy: A study of theory and practice, Somerville (Hook)	188	Wylie, Philip, An essay on morals (Bazelon)	336
Palestine: Star or prescient? Barbour (Crum)	549	Speiser, E. A., United States and the Near East (Hutchinson)	631	Y
Pares, Sir Bernard, History of Russia (Hutchinson)	776	Spheres of influence, Morrell (Bresler)	133	Year of Stalingrad, the, Werth (Salisbury)	519
		Stafford, Jean, Mountain lion, the (Fitzgerald)	399	Z
		Stalin must have peace, Snow (Bornstein)	721	Zacharias, Ellis N., Secret missions (Goldberg)	520
		Steinbeck, John, Wayward bus, the (Clark)	370	Zweig, Stefan, Balzac (Barzun)	220
		Stenberg, Fritz, The coming crisis (Lynd)	130
		Stevens, Wallace, Transmont (Lowell)	400

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 164

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 4, 1947

NUMBER 1

The Shape of Things

A NEW AVALANCHE OF SUITS, BRINGING THE aggregate of claims to well over $1,000,000,000, has pushed the "portal-to-portal" problem right to the front of the national stage, where it is taking the limelight from both labor-law revision and pending wage negotiations. Employers, facing huge potential liabilities, are almost hysterically demanding that Congress act immediately to rescue them; the unions, while moving to protect the legal rights of their members, are perhaps more than a little awed by the magnitude and complications of the issue and would not be averse to legislation that made possible a quick and fair settlement. In many quarters, the Supreme Court, whose decision in the Mt. Clemens Pottery Company case provided the basis for these multimillion claims, is being criticized for daring to repair a Congressional omission and give a commonsense definition of "working time." It is said that employers stand to be mulcted of enormous sums just because they continued customary practice in measuring working hours. The worth of this complaint must be assessed in the light of an interpretation issued by the Wage and Hour Administration shortly after the Fair Labor Standards Act went into effect. "Compensable time," it declared, was "all time during which an employee is required to be on duty or on the employer's premises or to be at a prescribed work place." But even if the employers' case is weaker than their numerous friends make out, legislation is required, for reasons outlined by Keith Hutchison in these pages last week. What must be avoided is an over-hasty measure which might be declared unconstitutional and so lead to an indefinite continuation of the uncertainties that are bedeviling industrial relations. As a first step, we suggest that the Secretary of Labor call a conference of employers' and workers' organizations with a view to drafting an agreed program for recommendation to Congress.

★

HENRY WALLACE'S SPEECH AT THE MERGER convention of the National Citizens' P. A. C. and the Independent Citizens' Committee in New York last week-end set a keynote for the short-range activities of the new organization which has come out of the union—the Progressive Citizens of America. He urged sharper definition of the liberal and conservative positions and insisted on the need for making the issues clear to the whole country. More specifically, he advocated a drive by progressives to prevent the "Republican Congress and the laissez faire big business men from leading us down the highroad of boom, bust, and war," and a simultaneous effort to capture the Democratic Party. The further objectives he outlined were general, indeed rather vague, wrapped up in the slogan "world peace, world prosperity, and world freedom." Whether the new committee can accomplish even his immediate aims and those laid down—also rather broadly—in its own program depends upon the amount of local vitality it can draw upon. It is a good omen that delegates came from all parts of the country and that the spirited discussion at the working sessions revealed plenty of independent thinking and little partisan control. The desire of the delegates to build the organization on a regional basis and from the ground up was expressed over and over. If this spirit can dominate the activities of the Progressive Citizens, the merger will be an important move toward drawing together the shattered left in America. If it lapses into a campaign and lobbying committee run from headquarters in New York, the merger will mean little. We should feel more optimistic on this point if the two national chairmen, Frank Kingdon and Jo Davidson, were not both New Yorkers.

✱

SPEAKING OF THE GERMAN PEACE TREATY which the Council of Foreign Ministers will try to draft when they meet in Moscow on March 10, Foreign Secretary Bevin said in a radio speech on his return from New York: "We must avoid the creation of a cesspool of cheap and half-starved labor in Middle Europe. At the same time we must insure that Germany can never again be a menace to the Allies." These two generalizations are broad enough to permit agreement among the Big Four, but their translation into practical detail is likely to be a formidable task. One problem is created by the fact that, since the end of the war, each of the four occupying powers has been building foundations for the new Germany in its own zone with little attention to what was being done in the others. We have had a good

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	1
The Eightieth Congress	3
The Future of Empire	4

ARTICLES

What's Ahead for Labor? by Wilbur H. Baldinger	5
Chicago Dumps Kelly by Milburn P. Akers	7
Will Russia Stay in Germany? by Joel Carmichael	9
The Cross and the Circle by Carey McWilliams	11
The End of Tuberculosis? by Martin Gumpert	13
Emily Greene Balch by John Herman Randall, Jr.	14
Homeless America. III. A Workable Housing Program by Charles Abrams	15
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	17
In One Ear by Lou Frankel	18

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Philosophy: Speculation or Science? by Hans Reichenbach	19
Neurosis and Lucidity by William Barrett	23
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch	25
Records by B. H. Haggin	26

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 27

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 193 28

by Jack Barrett

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor J. King Gordon Literary Editor Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart
Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Tris Coffin

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside, Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting, Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellong Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

many accounts and criticisms of such activities in the western sectors, but in regard to the Russian zone rumor has too often taken the place of fact, thanks partly, though not entirely, to Russian discouragement of newspapermen. In an attempt to obtain a more complete picture, The Nation sent its Central European correspondent, Joel Carmichael, to eastern Germany last fall. The first of his reports, which we believe make a valuable contribution to an understanding of the issues likely to develop in Moscow, appears on page 9 of this issue.

✱

IN ROME, ONE ANTI-CLERICAL WEEKLY HAS been suppressed without court action; Ruggero Maccari, editor of another, has been convicted of "offending the religion of the state" and sentenced to two years' imprisonment. Since Roman Catholicism is the religion of the state only by virtue of the Concordat negotiated by Mussolini with the Vatican in 1929, this seems rather a queer charge for a democratic Italian government to bring forward; it tends to prejudice the question of relations between church and state in Italy, which presumably is to be settled by the new constitution now under discussion in the Constituent Assembly. Feeling, possibly, that this was rather dubious ground on which to proceed, the government prosecutor made much of the alleged obscenity of the cartoons which have appeared in Maccari's and other anti-clerical magazines. That, of course, is a familiar accusation against critics of the church, and since we have not seen any of the cartoons in question, we cannot say how far it is justified. It is hardly borne out by descriptions of several that have appeared in the American press. One cartoon which figured in the Maccari trial showed a priest wringing the neck of a chicken representing Italy—a bitter political comment, perhaps, but legitimate enough in view of the Vatican's strenuous intervention in Italian elections. Another depicts a licentious friar—a subject which has always attracted satirists because of the not infrequent gap between priestly pretensions and priestly performance. If criticism of this kind is to be banned, the Italian government will have to suppress a large number of Italian classics beginning with Boccaccio.

✱

THERE IS SOMETHING RATHER PATHETIC about a teapot tempest recently brewed by another defender of another faith. Speaking for the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, Dr. Walter Van Kirk took to the air to lambast Eleanor Roosevelt for her syndicated remarks about Germany's Martin Niemöller. "One may applaud his bravery," Mrs. Roosevelt had written of the Lutheran pastor who is now touring the United States and lecturing under the Council's aegis, "but one can hardly applaud his attitude on Nazi politics, and I cannot quite see why we should be asked to listen to his lectures." This, we believe, is a graceful understatement, Dr. Van Kirk's splenetic protest notwithstanding. The facts about Martin Niemöller are involved and contradictory, but they throw an extremely mottled luster upon the good pastor. Niemöller joined the Nazi Party in 1926; his later recantation was due chiefly, it would seem, to a sort of falling-out among evangelists. In the early thirties, his pastorate provided a genuine refuge for many of the hunted, and he spoke out against Nazi interference with religion until the regime clapped him into a concentration camp. He survived eight years of imprisonment only to announce publicly, after his release, that he had agreed with the Nazis in everything except their ungodliness, that he had opposed the Weimar Republic, and that his prescription for post-war Germany was an authoritarian government. This is the man who is now telling American audiences, "Ye are all one in Christ Jesus," and, as Mrs. Roosevelt has so gently indicated, we think his right to impart that information may be questioned.

✱

THE POMPOUS BLUFF, THE GENIAL FRAUD, has been a classic and endearing figure since the tongue was first discovered as a weapon for petty larceny. Nowhere has the type been more appreciated than in the United States, where thousands of glib and brassy pitchmen have sold everything from the secrets of Masonry to Kickapoo Indian Snake Oil, absolutely guaranteed to cure the itch, remove gravy stains, and grow hair on an egg. It was the finest flowering of this pitchman's art, the essence of droll swindling, that was at the core of the performances of W. C. Fields and that made them unique and memorable. His billiard and golf routines and his highly perfected slapstick were enormously funny, but we feel he will not be remembered for these, or for his juggling, or even for the alcoholic voice with which he would wrathfully demand, "What contemptible scoundrel stole the cork from my lunch?" or tell his harrowing tale about traveling for three days and nights on nothing but food and water. We rather think he will live in the memory of the generation fortunate enough to see him for the artistry with which he played the childishly transparent swindler, for the way he would touch finger-tips, purse his mouth into a sickly sweet smile, and mumble pious nothings like "Ah, indeed, how true of all of us"—while carefully conning his audience for a likely shill. His was a raffish life, from the time he left home at the age of eleven after a bitter tiff with his father, through years of privation and petty pilfering, to the days when he could afford his dream house, with a magnificent pool table in the living room and portable bars equipped with quart-jars of ready-made double martinis. Like Dickens, whom he greatly admired, he embodied much of his private life in his art, and it was this that gave his work the touch of authentic genius.

The Eightieth Congress

THE frustrations of victory, as well as its fruits, are about to be gathered in by the Republicans. For fourteen years their leaders have orated on the wickedness of the Roosevelt heresies, the ineptness of long-haired bureaucrats, and the return to the American Way that would set in when the country should at last have "had enough" and voted Republican. But now that the great moment has come, the Republican Congress meets not in the spirit of crusaders arrived in the Holy Land and lusting for battle, but rather in that of reluctant warriors, suddenly grown prudent and only slightly more zealous for battle than the Good Soldier Schweik.

At this writing, it appears that the "middle way" will be the way of the Eightieth Congress. Senator Taft's insistence on having the chairmanship of the Labor Committee is reasonably interpreted as a reflection of this policy in the field of labor legislation. No one doubts that there will be curbs on labor, as there would be even if the Democrats had won; but they are not likely to be the crippling blows at trade unionism publicly dreamed of by Republican spokesmen when they were in the political wilderness. Taft himself is on record against barring the closed shop and against curbs on industry-wide bargaining, two of the most serious dangers to labor's position.

It was widely assumed that the Republicans would make short work of the President's emergency war-time powers, but here too the sentiment has shifted in favor of a go-slow policy, with Republicans who favored a big military establishment particularly fearful of putting an end to the present procurement powers of the armed services. This same big-army sentiment promises to be a brake on the party's budget-slashing program. And Representative Knutson's inequitable and inflationary plan to lower income taxes by 20 per cent already appears doomed. Even if he should succeed in jamming this across-the-board reduction through the House, G. O. P. leaders have already promised it a pigeonhole in the Senate, where feeling for a balanced budget is even stronger than a politician's natural desire to take credit for a tax cut.

Senator Vandenberg's Wanderjahr as Republican adviser to the Secretary of State is generally regarded as assurance against any drastic change in foreign policy. But here—as, in fact, throughout the Republican program—there are dangers beneath the surface. The Taft weight, moderate as it may be on the domestic side, is sure to be cast with those who keep their internationalism on a strictly lip-service level. It was Taft who led the fight against Bretton Woods and the British loan, and it was Taft who objected to the hanging of Göring and Company at Nürnberg. Even more serious, Taft opposed the reciprocal-trade program. With Southern farmers now abandoning their historical support of free trade, any extension of the reciprocal system and any further lowering of tariffs will find the going rough. Yet the hopes of a democratic world rest on freer and freer trade and on getting some of this country's surplus cash into circulation abroad.

At the root of the Republicans' inhibitions with regard to the scrapping of New Deal legislation, so far a cry from the blood and thunder of their minority days, are three clearly defined factors. The first, most creditable and probably least influential, is the conviction in intelligent conservative circles that unless the Republicans display some measure of social responsibility or reasonable facsimile thereof, this may be the last fling for the free-enterprise system. It was not The Nation but Barron's, the business weekly, that recently warned Republican leaders thus:

Unless they provide good government and leadership of sufficiently high quality to command the confidence of the people in the long run, we are seeing today merely the start of a sort of Indian summer of capitalism. In that case, the next depression will bring on a far more extreme swing to the left than the New Deal ever was. . . .

On a lower level of prudence, the Republican leaders are not allowing themselves to forget for a second the elections of 1948. They know that they did get some of the labor vote in the big industrial centers last November, and they are not disposed to throw it away for the sake of pleasing the more extreme anti-unionists in industry, who will vote Republican in any case. Nor are they forgetting that, however the Presidential vote may go, the possibility of a political reverse in the Senate is far too real for comfort. Of the thirty-two Senators up for reelection in 1948, eighteen are Republicans and fourteen are Democrats. But ten of those Democrats are Southerners, sure to be returned, while only six of the eighteen Republicans come from states that are anything like as safe for the G. O. P. The Democrats need only four out of twelve doubtful Republican seats to win back the Senate.

Finally, the coming of victory has precipitated a struggle for power within the Republican ranks. And this too will act as a check on extremist legislation. We have already discussed in these pages the feuds within the party, and it is perhaps enough now to say that they have been intensified in the past week. Governor Dewey's open intervention in behalf of Charles Halleck for floor leader has forced a defensive truce between Bricker and Taft, but widened the cleavage between the Ohioans and Dewey. The resentment of the Westerners over the maldistribution of party plums has been crystallized by Hoffman of Michigan in an attack on his Eastern colleagues as vitriolic as any of his old-time onslaughts on the New Deal.

These internal conflicts and long-range fears may well make for moderation, as we believe they will, but moderation is not a program. It will not build houses for veterans, head off inflation, ease race relations, or otherwise improve the state of the nation. Such objectives call for constructive imagination and boldness, and of these long-hair attributes the leaders of the Eightieth Congress have yet to betray even a faint suggestion.

The Future of Empire

ACCORDING to the gloomy and embittered Mr. Churchill, Prime Minister Attlee's declaration that Burma is to be given the right of secession from the empire on the same terms as India has shorn from the Crown one more of Britain's proud possessions. M. Blum, even while employing force against the rebellious nationalists of Indo-China, has declared for the eventual independence of that colony. The Dutch Cabinet is at present seeking to transform the entire empire into a federal union, to the disgust of Dutch reactionaries. Throughout the Far East, once subject peoples are in open rebellion or have mustered such force that the West has been compelled to yield. Whether the present struggle will end in the total severance of relations between the colonial powers and their Eastern possessions or in a new style of association clearly depends upon the wisdom of the West. Military strength has ceased to be the decisive factor.

No longer do the imperial countries possess their unanimous belief in empire. It is not merely that their peoples are weary of war. The British government, struggling to transform an impoverished economy, neither is able nor desires to afford so great a diversion of man-power as would be necessary for a desperate effort to reimpose the old colonial controls. In France, the M. R. P. is the only major party that might discover in itself a sustained will to repression. Yet it knows that a prolongation of the crisis must surely strengthen the two left-wing parties, both of which, in varying degrees, are opposed to a continuance of the old system.

But while it is apparent that the rise of the left has weakened imperialism, it must also be admitted that nowhere has there been a total abandonment of old motives and techniques. The very ability of the Dutch to negotiate with the Indonesian nationalists was conferred upon them by a British army, which broke the first wave of insurrection and gave the Netherlands time to muster and transport its forces. But for that intervention the liberation movement would be far stronger today, for it would have promptly spread outward from its Java stronghold to all parts of the empire. And while the Dutch have negotiated an agreement with the nationalist party in Java and Sumatra, they have declared it illegal in other territories.

The same reluctance can be seen elsewhere. The Burmese crisis provoked by the June strikes was only solved by the entry into the interim regime of the powerful but moderate Anti-Fascist Peoples' Freedom League. That party is now critical of Mr. Attlee's proposal. Its withdrawal would put an end to British control in Burma, and London is well aware of the fact. The case is different in British Malaya, where racial divisions and the existence of native sultanates have checked the growth of a militant nationalist movement. Mr. Churchill's solution, embodied in the MacMichael agreements of 1945, was to compel the nine Malayan sultans to surrender their sovereignty to the British crown and so create islands of conservative resistance, as in India. That arrangement provoked so much resentment that it had to be abandoned. Nevertheless, the present plan again puts the native rulers under the control of Britain and confers upon the high commissioner the powers of veto and government by decree. Left-wing opposition in Malaya is daily growing in strength.

Open war rages in Indo-China, and the responsibility undoubtedly falls upon the French government, which has been unreasonably slow in carrying out the promises contained in the preamble to the new constitution. The situation in that Far Eastern colony is complex and obscure. The Viet Nam Party may have been unwise to demand the inclusion of southern Indo-China in one republic with the north. Yet the fear that Saigon, where something like a puppet regime has been installed, may serve as a military base for a counter-offensive is natural and justified. Nor is Viet Nam wrong in declaring that the summer conferences in Paris resulted in little more than unsatisfactory and conditional agreements. The present wave of insurrection will probably be broken, after which the Dutch pattern may be followed. Yet, in the brief run, Paris must surely yield.

If the Socialist movements of Europe fail to live up to their doctrines on colonial policy the result must be final defeat and, in all probability, total chaos in the Far East. It is a result which the more responsible leaders in the nationalist movements themselves wish to avoid. In India, the Socialist Nehru has declared that a free India would establish cooperative relations with Britain. The moderate U Aung San of Burma and the pro-Communist Ho Chi Minh of Indo-China have made similar statements, the reason for which is obvious. These leaders are not merely advocates of liberty. They are progressive men who wish to raise the living standards of their people and who know that this can only be done by maintaining trade with the West and drawing upon Western technical ability. At the same time, the European powers will suffer far less from the liquidation of their empires if they make possible close relations, based upon liberty freely conceded, with their now rebellious dependencies.

That defines the real problem, upon the solution of which the future of a Socialist Europe in part depends. The East has thrown down its challenge not merely to the military might of the imperialist countries but to the vision and sincerity of the new political forces in Europe. The transformation of the Far Eastern scene offers a superb economic opportunity to the impoverished Western powers, all of which need the stimulus of expanding markets. By ridding themselves of the military burdens imposed by the maintenance of empires the Western peoples will be enabled to devote their resources to the real task confronting them—rebuilding their shattered economies after a new and better model.

What's Ahead for Labor?

BY WILBUR H. BALDINGER

Washington, December 29

A LAWYER for the National Association of Manufacturers was having a note-comparing lunch with a lawyer for the National Labor Relations Board. They got around, naturally, to labor and what the Eightieth Congress ought to do about it, starting this week, and the N. A. M. man said he had been putting a lot of thought and desk work on the subject.

One thing on his drafting board, the N. A. M. man said, was a law breaking up big-union monopoly and localizing labor-management misunderstandings. Any strike would be limited legally to a single union unit at the spot where the controversy developed; a national union would be forbidden to bring in help or to spread the walkout through other sectors of the affected industry. The NLRB man asked if that would work both ways—so the struck plant couldn't bring in strike-breakers or get other industrial aid in its time of trouble. The N. A. M. man said the point might be an interesting one, but that he hadn't got around to it yet.

The heady Republican climate down here induces such planning for domestic peace and tranquillity. Organized labor is in for it; almost anything can happen on Capitol Hill, with the repressive tenets of a revived Case bill as a moderate starter.

The N. A. M. is applauded by the press for its temperate, statesman-like, and liberal convention conduct in resolutely refusing to demand outright revocation of the Wagner act. Senator Robert A. Taft, who seems to think most labor leaders have crypts reserved for them in the Kremlin wall, is characterized in the editorials as the sane and sober new chairman of the strategic Senate Education and Labor Committee. Wasn't he the friend of labor who last spring turned back President Truman's plan to conscript railroad strikers?

WILBUR H. BALDINGER, formerly Washington correspondent for PM, is now on Newsweek's Washington staff.

Mr. Truman himself, in his state-of-the-union message to Congress scheduled for January 6, is expected this time to give the labor question a once-over-lightly treatment and not ask for legislative specifics. He probably will suggest, however, that the government could use broader control—compulsory arbitration, say—in public-utility disputes which are damaging to the national interest. With the advice of his Cabinet the President has figured that it would be somewhat presumptuous of a Democratic Administration to try to tell a Republican Congress what to do, and that the Congress will do what it wants to anyway.

Labor itself has been curiously inert in the face of the impending onslaughts from the Hill. It has grown to take the National Labor Relations Act as a matter of course, forgetting the good old Republican years when a collective-bargaining right was something to be won with a ball bat at a picket barricade. Leaders of the A. F. of L. and C. I. O. can turn out a fighting speech at the drop of a gavel or the click of a mimeograph machine, crying that hard-won gains must be held. But now is a time for earnest study and close-in lobbying.

Within labor only big, loud, aggressive Charles J. MacGowan, white-shocked president of the A. F. of L.'s big, loud, aggressive International Brotherhood of Boiler Makers, has put the point publicly. His warning, a solo which did not even evoke echoes from other A. F. of L. and C. I. O. sections, was: Look, boys, we're going to get some labor legislation from the new Congress whether we like it or not. Wouldn't we be smart to do some work ourselves on legislation now, so that we will have a better chance of liking what we get?

"Let us not only express the hope but make a contribution to a thorough study of the whole industrial problem to see if it is not possible to pass legislation which will make strikes unnecessary except in very rare instances," MacGowan, who is a Republican card-carrier, wrote in the December issue of the Boilermakers' Journal. He deplored what he called the labor custom of "standing in the middle of the road and shouting no to all attempts on the part of even sensible people to bring about the creation of permanent and capable legislation for the adjustment of labor controversies."

Until MacGowan spoke out, no important labor figure had expressed any public interest in reviewing the lawbooks to devise measures which might be acceptable to the G. O. P. and at the same time save the Wagner act from rape—which otherwise seems as sure as the Republican invasion on January 3. President William Green proposed to call an A. F. of L. legislative conference some time later in January, after Congress goes to work on labor. A. F. of L. Legislative Representative Lewis G. Hines, a rasp-voiced Republican, wasn't drafting any suggestions for the lawmakers; he thought A. F. of L. General Counsel Joseph A. Padway might be. Padway, preoccupied with his coming defense of Lewis in the Supreme Court, said he had no ideas; that was Hines's department. The C. I. O. from Murray down was devoting its attention to wages; perhaps the National Lawyers' Guild could do something about laws.

Around the Senate Labor Committee it was figured that these would be among the minimum proposals enacted, probably with Administration support:

1. Establishment of emergency boards and arbitration procedures to handle national industrial crises in utilities—a broad category which is likely to be stretched to cover not only transportation and power but steel, coal, and communications.

2. Revision of the Wagner act to permit employers to petition for collective-bargaining elections challenging already-won representation claims by unions—a device which could keep unions in a continuing rat race.

3. Elimination of secondary boycotts by which an A. F. of L. union refuses to handle products of a C. I. O. shop, and vice versa—an indefensible practice which neither organization has really tried to stop.

4. Amendment of the Wage-Hour Act to settle the portal-to-portal pay issue—in which claims for more than a billion dollars in back overtime wages have already been filed joyously in the courts by unions.

If these four points—and no more—are put over by Congress, labor will be getting off lucky. More almost certainly will be put over: the N. A. M.'s liberalized labor program for 1947 makes the following demands:

1. Abolish industry-wide bargaining and "joint wage action" affecting more than one employer. This would rip apart the structure of A. F. of L. craft unionism as well as the C. I. O. structure of industrial unionism.

2. Ban strikes in any collective-bargaining area not directly involving "wages, hours, and working conditions." This would cover a nearly limitless area of "sympathy" walkouts and of any "feather-bedding or other work-restrictive demands."

3. Protect strike-breakers from mass picketing "and any other form of coercion or intimidation."

4. Emasculate "union-security" provisions of closed-shop contracts.

There will be earnest but lonely voices raised on the Hill by such labor students as Senator James E. Murray of Montana, outgoing Democratic chairman of the Senate committee, and Senator Wayne Morse, Oregon Republican, warning Congress that extreme measures for the imposition of industrial peace may mean incitement to industrial warfare instead. The President probably can be counted on to veto any outrageous repression. The Supreme Court may have some sobering words for all hands in the Lewis injunction case. Secretary of Labor Schwellenbach and Conciliation Director Edgar L. Warren will continue, somewhat wistfully, to promote their labor-management area-conference formula for peace and good-will.

But the rampant Republican lawmakers are in a mood for making new labor laws, veto or no veto, and they'll be made. When they get going, the A. F. of L. and C. I. O. may find out tardily that boilermaker MacGowan had a sensible pre-session idea. By that time it may be too late for Bill Green or Phil Murray to do much more than scream at what Congress is doing to them.

Chicago Dumps Kelly

BY MILBURN P. AKERS

Chicago, December 26

THE Old Guard in Chicago, the once invincible Kelly machine, has defied the adage and surrendered. It did so when it indorsed for the Democratic nomination for mayor an independent business man and civic leader, Martin H. Kennelly, who as a director of the Chicago Crime Commission has long been an active enemy of the Kelly administration.

The machine surrendered to an aroused public opinion led by the crusading Chicago Sun and the independent Daily News. But by indorsing Kennelly it was able to upset the well-laid plans of Governor Dwight Green and Robert R. McCormick, editor and publisher of the Chicago Tribune, the leaders of the Republican Party hereabouts. In consequence Chicago, for the first time in half a century, is likely to elect as its next mayor—on April 10—a vigorous fighter against the corruption which has been associated with the city's politics.

Mr. Kennelly is president of Werner Brothers-Kennelly Company, a warehouse organization, and of Allied Vans, and is a director of Wilson and Company, the meat packers. He has never been identified with liberal causes, but liberals and independents have rallied to his support, considering his election a necessary first step in ridding Chicago of machine government and the crime that has flourished under it. They look to him to provide an administration that will tackle constructively Chicago's vast civic problems—housing, transportation, clean streets, and many others. Kennelly, they hope, may do for Chicago what the late James Couzens did for Detroit.

Readers of The Nation may recall an article I wrote for it last spring called The Twilight of Boss Kelly. In that article I described the difficulties in which the

Caricature by Seligson
Mayor Kelly

Kelly machine was floundering—the exposure of its mishandling of the Chicago public schools and the increasing wrath of Chicagoans over its apparent inability to perform efficiently.

The summer passed, and in the election campaign the Kelly machine was attacked with some energy by the Republicans. On November 5 it lost some but not all Cook County offices, holding its own in the city of Chicago. The Republican leaders, however—Messrs. Green and McCormick—surveyed the results and decided that the machine, which had really only been cracked, had been smashed. Before the official vote in the November 5 elections had been proclaimed, they announced their candidate for mayor, an obscure politician, Russell W. Root, who had served as county chairman during the campaign. The Republican City Committee immediately and obediently ratified the selection. Root, a forty-nine-year-old lawyer of little distinction, is assistant state treasurer. He was chosen, patently, because the leaders believed that a G. O. P. trend had started and that Kelly would be a push-over for anyone.

Green and McCormick undoubtedly foresaw a city administration that would go along with their plans for 1948. Had they disregarded 1948 and, concentrating upon Chicago and its needs, picked a Republican of the caliber of Kennelly, I believe that they could have looked forward to taking over the city on April 1. But they didn't. Instead, by their gross political opportunism they made a new era possible for Chicago.

The Democrats, bewildered by the November 5 results, took no immediate action but decided to follow a policy of watchful waiting, since it was not necessary for candidates to file for the February primary until early in January. While they were waiting, Chicago's independents got busy. The Chicago Sun, branding Root a stooge for aspiring politicians, urged that some Republican of stature enter the primary against him. The Daily

MILBURN P. AKERS is the principal political writer on the Chicago Sun.

News, noted for its political independence, took a similar position. But the Republican high command was unable to give up its dream of conquest. Root remained in the race, and Mayor Kelly, although nearing seventy-one, began to bestir himself. It looked as if Chicagoans would have to choose between Root, the creature of Green and McCormick, and Kelly, the machine boss.

The machine Democrats now appointed a committee on candidates which promptly indorsed Mayor Kelly for reelection and then offered him full support. The Mayor, in somewhat ambiguous terms, spoke of his wish to retire and said the boys should go back and reconsider. The boys—with few exceptions his faithful henchmen over the years—did. It is at this point that the political experts begin to differ. Some contend that Kelly was all along intent on retirement and planning to substitute some faithful retainer. Others are convinced that he was setting the stage to be drafted.

Whatever his real attitude, the Chicago Sun came out with a blistering page-one editorial saying bluntly, "Kelly Won't Do." It followed up this attack several days later with a long, documented denunciation of the Mayor's record, reciting his sins of omission and commission, and declaring plainly that if Chicago had to choose between Root and Kelly, the Sun would unhesitatingly back an independent in the mayoralty contest. The Daily News took a similar position. The Independent Voters of Illinois, a small but active group, announced that it would advise its followers to remain out of the primary contests so as to be eligible to sign petitions for an independent.

Democratic leaders were now confronted with the fact that the only editorial support Kelly, or a Kelly henchman, would get would be from the afternoon tabloid, the Chicago Times. The Sun (morning) and the News (evening) would be lost to them. The Tribune (morning) had already come out for Root, and the fifth newspaper, Hearst's Herald-American (evening), was an unknown factor.

Nevertheless, the machine leaders, after talking with the other ward committeemen, determined to offer the indorsement to Kelly again. Assembling at the City Hall to hear his decision, they were handed an 800-word statement in which the Mayor didn't say yes and didn't say no. More private conferences were held. William J. Tuohy, state's attorney for Cook County, whose two-year regime has been marked by utter indifference to the machine's throttle-hold upon the public schools and a willingness to let sleeping dogs lie, was tentatively suggested as the Kelly successor.

At once came blasts from the Sun and the Daily News: "Tuohy Won't Do." The two newspapers mentioned as alternative choices such independents as Major Paul Douglas, University of Chicago economist and Marine Corps hero, Martin Kennelly, and several other Democrats known to be independent of the machine.

The ward committeemen were again interviewed by the machine leaders. And here another factor must be taken into account. Jacob M. Arvey, a lawyer and long the leader of the Twenty-fourth Ward, the most "deliverable" of all the wards, had been named chairman of the City Committee on his return from the Pacific war. Jack, as he's generally known, has become a political enigma. Always an organization man, he had grown wealthy long before the war. Above draft age, he had gone to war because he felt so strongly about the principles at stake. When he returned after five years of service, he told many persons he had a new view on life, and wished to use whatever political skills he had for a new day in Chicago.

Most people accepted the new Arvey with a grain of salt, recalling his long service to the organization and his unusual ability as a machine leader. Today various persons who are fully informed about the maneuvering that went on before Kelly and Tuohy were downed and Kennelly put up, give full credit to Arvey. Whatever his motives, Arvey told the nominating committee after Kelly and Tuohy had both been blasted out of the running that Kennelly must be named. And Kennelly, after some persuasive talk by Mr. Arvey, was.

In accepting the indorsement Kennelly maintained his independence of the machine, said he was aware, and wanted the committeemen to be aware, that many of his ideas did not coincide with theirs, and recalled the three occasions on which he had participated in political contests in behalf of candidates opposed by the machine. His stature in Chicago is such that few other than Republican partisans are concerned about his acceptance of machine support. He has also the support of avowed machine foes, such as the Sun and the News, and of many well-known liberals, including Major Douglas. So far the Communists are practically alone in questioning his selection. The Democratic organization, afflicted with defeatism after the November reverses, has indicated an intention to go down the line.

These rapid developments put Republican organization leaders in a quandary. Reports that Root would be withdrawn and the G. O. P. equivalent of Kennelly substituted circulated widely. Influential party leaders are understood to have offered support to several such Republicans, who refused to enter a contest against Kennelly. Had they been approached when Kelly or Tuohy appeared to be the likely Democratic nominee, they might have consented.

The machine, by surrendering, had taken out of the campaign the one big issue on which Republicans counted to win the victory—the machine. Simultaneously James B. McCahey, stormy petrel of the School Board, announced his resignation, effective with the ending of Mayor Kelly's term. So that issue, too, which would have favored the Republicans, has been snatched from them.

Root, flanked by a number of Governor Green's associates and advisers, recently held a press conference and announced he was in the race to stay.

Most political observers concede Kennelly an easy victory; they believe that Root was left in the race on the theory he might as well be the sacrifice. If that is the outcome, Colonel McCormick will have demonstrated that in his new role as boss, with Governor Green, of the Illinois Republican Party he is hardly a sensational success.

So far, the Tribune, taken off its editorial feet by the Kennelly candidacy, has remained mute, reporting only the day-to-day developments in its news columns. It has made no attacks upon Kennelly, and it has given Chicago one of the best jokes of the year. In printing the story of Kennelly's indorsement by the organization, the Tribune allowed its writer to admit that Tuohy had been removed from consideration by editorial attacks "in two newspapers."

Will Russia Stay in Germany?

BY JOEL CARMICHAEL

Paris, December 15

THE obscurity which has veiled the Soviet zone of Germany for so long has lately begun to be lifted.

But our view of what is happening there has been distorted by the tendentiousness which marks the relations of the great powers. The American press in particular has used the meager data obtained as material for speculations about the aims of Soviet policy. Depressed, or exhilarated, by the relative industrial stagnation of western Germany, observers have been greatly struck by the undeniable resumption of economic activity in the Soviet zone: this has led to inflated quantitative estimates on the one hand and rather misleading political conclusions on the other.

One of the principal difficulties in determining the trend of the Soviet occupation arises from uncertainty about the proper perspective to apply. How long an occupation, that is to say, are the Russians planning for? Some light can be thrown on this question by a brief consideration of their removal of German capital equipment, about which so much has been said in Germany and abroad.

It is obvious that the amount of dismantling and transporting of factories carried out by the Russians will depend on the actual time they intend to remain in Germany. The waste of the operation, after all, is enormous—it is estimated at from 50 to 80 per cent. And in addition the removals place a tremendous strain on a transportation system already inadequate and partially crippled by war-time destruction. Furthermore, the Russians, still suffering from their chronic shortage of technical personnel, can scarcely expect German technicians to produce efficiently in Russia under the conditions of virtual imprisonment in which they would have to work, since it would be inexpedient for the Soviet regime to allow them to participate in the privileges of its own technical caste.

The dismantling program, therefore, can be understood only in reference to the political situation; it would be senseless for the Russians to incur the immense losses inevitable in wholesale removals if they were certain of retaining control of the area for a long time. They must have first applied the policy when they had no idea how long they would stay in Germany and in consequence took, very sensibly, the attitude of the dog in the manger: even if they lost most of the value of the transported machinery, the Germans were not going to have it—or the Western powers either.

But the Russians must have changed their minds a number of times. When they first advanced into Germany in 1944, their impulse seems to have been to seize every machine they could lay their hands on and cart it off. Officially, however, this policy was terminated on May 1, 1946, and there is no doubt that the great wave of removals, at any rate, has subsided. Some industrial plants have even been brought back and are producing for reparations; in these cases, no doubt, the bottlenecks encountered in Russia proved too staggering. However, a new outbreak of dismantling and removal began during the last week in October, and was generally linked with the disastrous defeat in the Berlin elections of the Soviet-sponsored Unity Party. It seems to me that the spasmodic handling of this question indicates abrupt fluctuations of official opinion and the absence of a long-range, carefully worked-out plan. At the same time there is a great deal of evidence, which I shall present later, supporting the theory that the Russians now intend a lengthy and increasingly entrenched occupation.

JOEL CARMICHAEL, Nation correspondent for Central Europe, served during the war with the O. S. S. and the United States Navy. At the end of the war he was assigned to Army Intelligence in Berlin. This is the first in a series of articles on the Russian zone of Germany, from which Mr. Carmichael has just returned. Speaking both German and Russian fluently, he had access to information not usually open to American correspondents.

GERMANY PRODUCES, RUSSIA CONSUMES

The purely physical effects of Russian occupation seem fairly clear. About half the total industrial capacity of the zone has been transferred to Russia, but what is left of its resources in labor and capital is being thoroughly exploited; nothing is going to waste. This accounts of course for the somewhat naively enthusiastic reports of foreign correspondents who have been taken on conducted tours. Employment is "full," in contrast to the situation in the western zones; there is even a certain shortage of labor, with extensive employment of women. The lack of raw materials has not had the paralyzing effect on production experienced in the west: coal is imported from Poland, partly in exchange for German potash, and various other raw materials, chiefly leather, wool, and cotton, are sent in by the Russians. Of German raw materials more than two-thirds is allocated to the manufacture of goods for reparations; a large portion of what remains is appropriated by the occupation forces.

It is generally admitted that between 70 and 80 per cent of all current production is sent directly to Russia; the Russians explain, quite plausibly, that part of this is taken as reparations and part as payment for the raw materials they contributed. Of the 20 per cent allocated to the Germans, the great bulk must go into the black market immediately, since very little is seen in normal channels. Some of it has been taken back again by the Russians. According to some estimates not more than one-twentieth of the goods produced actually stays in the zone for local German consumption or for barter with other zones or foreign countries.

The failure of the Soviet authorities to keep accounts of goods actually delivered to them, or at any rate to publish such accounts, has bewildered the Germans and caused frequent displays of temper in the Allied Control Council. The Germans have no notion how much they have already paid or how long it may be necessary for them to go on paying. Nor will they be in any position to contest the evaluation eventually made by the Russians.

With respect to food, though the Red Army still lives off the country, farm produce is not overtly transported to Russia. The Red Army simply has a priority on whatever is available, and since the zone as a whole is an area of food surplus—while the British and American zones are harassed by a shortage—this does not arouse too much dissatisfaction.

SOVIET GRIP ON INDUSTRY AND TRADE

The closely knit control of industry in the Russian zone, while similar to the state planning in the Soviet Union, has had exclusively short-term objectives. After production was resumed by the Russians, all establishments employing more than ten workers were registered and instructed to draw up lists of what goods they might expect to produce in 1946 and what their requirements in raw materials would be. The facts thus obtained were then combined into a general plan by the central administration for industry. But there was no element of "reconstruction" in the plan. Its purpose was simply to exploit the available resources as efficiently as possible; it was not a project for production as in the Soviet Union but a schedule of the capacity to produce.

The economic administration of the zone is planned and directed by a central agency in Berlin, at the head of which is a German secretary of state closely supervised by the Russians. Provincial offices carry out the directives of this central administration, which is in turn under the control of the Soviet military headquarters in Karlshorst. Direct control is exercised by Moscow over factories producing for the Red Army in Russia and Germany; these are run under the supervision of joint boards of army officers and Soviet officials. Karlshorst control extends to factories taken over by individual Länder and provinces and now regarded as German state property. Theoretically they are supposed to have belonged to former Nazis, but the law legalizing their confiscation was framed loosely enough to apply to practically any factory. War potential, for instance, is held to cover any goods manufactured for the Wehrmacht, however innocuous.

Most key industries except food processing are to be controlled by the newly formed Soviet Industrial Corporation, which has taken over the factories the Russians once earmarked for dismantling and transfer and then decided to keep in operation on German soil. These factories have become Soviet property, and since they are expected to be shipped eventually to the Soviet Union, the corporation is regarded as an interim measure. It is the holding company for the factories under its control, and operates through a number of joint German-Russian industrial associations, each of which has charge of one industry. Textiles, chemicals, engineering, solid and liquid fuels, and public utilities are known to come within the scope of these associations.

To boil the matter down, the Soviet Industrial Corporation is a vital element in a series of widespread interlocking cartels. Although Russian plans for it are supposed to be still rather unsettled, with some divergence of opinion between Karlshorst and Moscow, there can be no doubt that the Russians have established in their zone a complex of quasi-nationalized industries which has every prospect of remaining a permanent feature of the emerging economic structure.

Among the banks confiscated by the Russians after their entry into Germany was the Garantie- und Kreditbank of Berlin, all the funds of which had been in the possession of the Russian Foreign Trade Bank. Last September this bank was reactivated with a capital of 150,000,000 Reichsmarks, and it is now controlled by three Russian directors aided by a German chief clerk. It is supposed to handle the comprehensive trade engendered by the Russian state corporations set up in the Soviet zone under the terms of Law No. 124. In addition, interzonal trade, now extremely complicated, is to be revived and simplified, and at some time in the future the bank is to act as a clearing-house for all foreign exchange.

Since the principal industrial installations in the Soviet zone are to be administered by these state corporations, and since, further, this great complex of industrial enterprises is to be consolidated for all interzonal and foreign commerce under the direction of a bank controlled by the Russian Foreign Trade Bank, it seems clear that all interzonal trade within Germany and all trade between foreign countries and the Soviet zone will become part of the foreign trade of the Soviet Union. It would be difficult to overestimate the eventual importance of this administrative-economic device. Superimposed on the major enterprises of the zone, it may easily serve to integrate the zone into the whole nationalized economy established since the war in the border areas of the Soviet Union, if not into that of the Soviet Union itself.

We now have a picture of how Russian economic planning, spurred by an insatiable demand for goods of all kinds and undisturbed by any anxiety about future competition—compare the British reluctance to reestablish German automobile production because of the competition it might offer to domestic makes—has enabled the Russians to turn the zone into a convenient and entirely subordinate addition to their own system of production. Those who have voiced misgivings about the resumption of German productivity on so massive a scale may be reassured by the evident intention of the Soviet authorities to suck the last drop from the maimed and emasculated economic organism they have revived. In view of the facts presented above it seems extremely likely that Soviet occupation of the Russian zone of Germany will be practically permanent.

ARMAMENT PLANTS ON GERMAN SOIL

This likelihood is enormously reinforced by a development in a different sphere, namely, the incontestable production of armaments, which received such wide publicity last August. The immense effort expended by the Russians during the war to remove their arms plants beyond the Urals has now been reversed. All their present reasons for carrying on production for reparations on German soil apply equally to the manufacture of arms. Moreover, extended as it is into Europe as far as Lower Austria and Thuringia, Russia could not expect its crippled transport system to make trans-Ural production available.

The report that V-2 rockets are now being manufactured in the great German underground factories at Nordhausen and Niedersachswerfen, east of Cassel, in so far as it is simply a demonstration that Russia, like the other great powers, is keeping up its military establishment, is not particularly significant. But the fact that this plant for arms production and experimentation is located in Germany and is being operated with German technical personnel suggests that once again the Soviets are thinking in terms of a prolonged occupation. Certainly they would never evacuate the area leaving a resuscitated German government in possession of a substantial war-making apparatus.

The Cross and the Circle

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

Montreal, December 26

RECENT events in Canada point to the formation of a new and, it seems at first blush, curious political alliance between the Social Credit movement of Alberta, with its marked overtones of Protestant fundamentalism, and dissident elements among the French Canadian Catholics of the Province of Quebec. Curiously enough, anti-Semitism is one of the issues upon which this incipient alliance seems to be based. Before this year the Jews of Canada never thought that their detractors in Quebec—notably the remnants of Adrien Arcand's National Socialist Christian Party of the thirties—might possibly form a common front with the fanatical movement that had its rise in the cattle country of the West.

In the federal elections of 1945 neither the Bloc Populaire nor the Social Credit movement succeeded in electing any candidates in the Province of Quebec. But leaders of both parties noted that the combined vote of their nominees was sufficient in some constituencies to have elected one or more members of Parliament. As a result, shortly after the election a number of leaders of the Bloc Populaire visited Alberta, to address Social Credit audiences. In a spirit of reciprocity, several Social Credit leaders, including a non-French-speaker

CAREY McWILLIAMS, a staff contributor of The Nation, is an informed commentator on the political scene, particularly in the West. His latest book is "Southern California: An Island on the Land."

ing Mormon, visited Quebec and addressed Bloc Populaire meetings. When a by-election was scheduled for the Pontiac constituency in Quebec this summer, neither the Bloc Populaire nor the Social Credit movement proposed candidates, but elements from both groups supported the nominee of a new movement, the Union des Electeurs. This organization was pointedly referred to as a "movement," not a party, with the accompanying explanation that the people of Quebec were against political parties in principle and wanted a movement without a formal policy or program—a movement, it was said, that would follow the mandates of the people as articulated from time to time. The nominee of the new organization, Raymond Caouette, proceeded to win the by-election in Pontiac. But once in Parliament, Caouette quickly announced that in general he would vote with his Social Credit colleagues from Alberta.

On December 23 the Union des Electeurs threw their candidate into the Richelieu-Verchères by-election. He was impressively beaten by the government candidate but managed to poll three times the vote of his Progressive Conservative opponent, whose party constitutes the official opposition in the federal Parliament.

An offshoot of this curious alliance—if it is, in fact, an alliance—is the newspaper Vers Demain, which has been published for about a year in the Province of Quebec. Copies are not available on the newsstands, and "non-Aryans" who send in $2 for a year's subscription have their checks returned, without comment. Today Vers Demain claims a paid-up circulation of 70,000. I was informed, however, that its actual circulation is probably not in excess of 35,000. What makes the appearance of this sheet a matter of some general interest is that it has been consistently anti-Semitic. For example, it has just concluded the serial publication of the good old "Protocols of the Elders of Zion." Vers Demain is the official organ of the Union des Electeurs, and in the official organ of Social Credit it is referred to as "our French-language publication."

Those familiar with the background of the Social Credit movement will not be surprised to learn of its anti-Semitic tinge. Its prophet, Major C. H. Douglas, in one of his early tracts, "The Control and Distribution of Production," wrote that he was impressed with the "curiously circumstantial evidence" which, to his thinking, seemed to confirm the authenticity of the Protocols. Years later, when the forged character of the documents had been established beyond question, Major Douglas wrote in "Social Credit" that the "authenticity of the document is of little importance; what is interesting about it is the fidelity with which the methods by which such enslavement [of the world—by Jews] might be brought about can be seen reflected in the facts of everyday experience." This was also the position of Father Coughlin. In common with many movements in Canada which have advocated new monetary systems to combat the power of "the international bankers," Social Credit propaganda has always had overtones of anti-Semitism, and the movement employs verbal and other symbols strikingly reminiscent of those which Philip La Follette made use of in Wisconsin. The principal symbol of Social Credit is the cross and the circle; members form it with their hands at public meetings.

One of the Social Credit members of Parliament, Norman Jacques, from northern Alberta, is an active, vocal, explicit anti-Semite. Last July 29 Jacques spoke at an anti-Semitic meeting in Chicago at which the chairman was Frederick Kister. Jacques has been praised by Gerald L. K. Smith as an "outstanding crusader against internationalism, communism, and Zionism," and has spread volumes of anti-Semitic material upon the records of the Canadian Parliament's deliberations. Samples of his tirades against Jews may be found in John Roy Carlson's new book, "The Plotters." Although they have been asked by the leaders of Canadian Jewry on numerous occasions to repudiate Jacques, officials of the Social Credit movement of Alberta have thus far declined to do so. Jacques, they reply, "is a sick man . . . he has heart disease . . . he may die any moment"; besides, Social Credit is a movement, not a party, and as such is unable to discipline its adherents. Yet the official organ of the movement has referred to the Nürnberg trials as "a brutal form of Jewish revenge," and has argued that the Allies should not "starve the Aryan people of Germany." I was told, in fact, that the main difference between Jacques and the other leaders of Social Credit is that he always refers to "Jewish international bankers," while his more reticent colleagues say "international bankers." Implicit in the Social Credit ideology is the distinction between "productive capital" and "predatory capital," a distinction which tends to turn into one between "Gentile" and "Jewish" capital.

Different as they are in religion and descent, the followers of the Social Credit movement in Alberta and of the Bloc Populaire in Quebec are alike in several respects. Both movements are conspicuously negative in character: they have been "against" nearly everything—Bretton Woods, UNRRA, the United Nations, the British, the Communists, the international bankers, the Jews, foreigners, and so on. Thinking in both movements is replaced by faith in a hodgepodge of nostrums. Both feed upon the discontents of the lower middle class. It is worth noting that the Catholic church has expressed no opposition to its members joining the Social Credit movement. A Social Credit-Bloc Populaire fusion is not essentially improbable, as witness the collaboration between Father Coughlin and Gerald L. K. Smith in the thirties. Given a period of economic depression and widespread despair, such a fusion might have great political consequences.

The End of Tuberculosis?

BY MARTIN GUMPERT

WE FIND in the Journal of the American Medical Association of November 30, 1946, a paragraph which seems to announce the coming of one of the greatest victories of mankind. It says: "Streptomycin is an anti-bacterial agent which possesses the unique ability to inhibit the growth of Mycobacterium tuberculosis in vivo, both experimentally and clinically. The manifestations of tuberculosis may be suppressed both in experimental animals and in man, with at least temporary retardation of the pathological processes as judged by objective criteria."

This cautious statement is based on two years of treatment of one hundred patients with various types of tuberculosis in the Mayo Clinic, one of the world's outstanding scientific institutions. Drs. H. Corwin Hinshaw, William H. Feldman, and Karl H. Pfuete had already been credited, in 1940, with being able to arrest experimental tuberculosis in guinea pigs by sulfa drugs (promin, diasone, promizole). But the clinical use of these drugs was not feasible. In 1944, after streptomycin was developed by Schatz, Bugie, and Waksman, it was tested by the newly perfected methods of the Mayo Clinic, and its superior therapeutic potentialities were recognized promptly.

Streptomycin has in recent weeks become available for civilians, but physicians need to acquire more experience with the drug before they can make full use of it. For the time being it is recommended only for those patients who do not respond to conventional therapeutic methods. Great amounts are required for the treatment of a case of tuberculosis. Toxic by-effects have been observed. The acquisition of artificial resistance to the drug is to be considered. But Dr. Hinshaw and his coworkers say, "Streptomycin is recommended for more extensive trial in treatment of many forms of tuberculosis because of definitely and consistently encouraging results."

In spite of the fully justified reservations of the Mayo physicians in regard to the immediate usefulness of streptomycin, the tremendously important fact remains that for the first time in history a drug has proved its efficacy against this scourge of man, and we can safely foresee the final extinction of the disease.

Tuberculosis has been slowly but steadily declining in this country for several decades. Simultaneously with the exciting statement in the Journal of the A. M. A., the November issue of the Statistical Bulletin of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company says: "Through a well-coordinated and vigorous attack it should be possible virtually to eliminate tuberculosis as a cause of death in our country within a generation." The death rate from the disease in the United States has been lowered four-fifths since the turn of the century—from about 200 to about 40 per 100,000. "In large areas of the country the tuberculosis problem has already been reduced to almost negligible proportions." In five states the death rate has dropped to well below 20 per 100,000: in Utah, where it is lowest, it is only 12. Forty-three states had a tuberculosis death rate under 50 in 1944; only twenty states were in this category in 1934.

There are various reasons for this brilliant success. Facilities for detecting existing cases in the early stages have multiplied. X-ray tests have become routine in health examinations, and periodic check-ups have become more frequent. Military-service examinations, too, have been of benefit. Fewer active cases diminish the chances of infection. Living conditions on the whole have improved, and hygienic and nutritional standards are higher. There has been progress in medical and nursing care, and the newly organized Tuberculosis Division of the United States Public Health Service has been doing much useful work.

However, tuberculosis is by no means stamped out. Even now it takes more than 50,000 lives a year in this country. Tuberculosis is still a serious cause of disability in the most productive years of men and women. It is the principal cause of death among white females between the ages of twenty and thirty-four, and ranks second only to accidents in white males from twenty to thirty-nine. More than one-fourth of all deaths among colored males in the broad age group of ten to thirty-four years are due to tuberculosis.

The ability to extinguish, within the next ten or twenty-five years, a smoldering flame so destructive to mankind can help revive our defeated faith in the human species. Tuberculosis is now rampant in many countries, especially in war-torn Europe. If we can break the power of this infection in America, we can break it everywhere—a truly heroic goal for the community of man. A life unburdened by such a cruel disease would be a better life whatever the political future of the world.

DR. GUMPERT, a practicing physician of New York and the author of a number of books, contributes monthly articles to The Nation on new developments in medicine and related fields.

Emily Greene Balch

BY JOHN HERMAN RANDALL, JR.

EMILY GREENE BALCH, who together with Dr. John R. Mott was on November 14 awarded the Nobel peace prize, is the first graduate of the editorial staff of The Nation to receive that honor. During 1916-17 she was actively associated with Oswald Garrison Villard and other distinguished liberals in the Committee against Militarism, which carried on a vigorous campaign to prevent American entry into the war. She kept up her active opposition to the war, and in 1918 the trustees of Wellesley College, where she was professor of economics and social science, refused to renew her appointment. Despite her twenty-two years of distinguished teaching, the principle of academic tenure, already shaken by her progressive economic views, was not strong enough to withstand the war fever—though the decision was narrow and President Pendleton and all the alumnae trustees supported her. The Balch case was one of the outstanding violations of academic freedom during the First World War.

Mr. Villard, who had a high opinion of her scholarly attainments and of her accurate and discriminating judgment, seized the chance to add her to the editorial staff of The Nation. He and the group he had gathered about him were then at the height of their crusade for a just peace settlement that could be maintained. Miss Balch made especially valuable contributions to the International Relations Section, which was a keen weapon in this historic fight. She left The Nation in 1919 to take up her life work in Geneva with the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom.

In her association with the Nation group Miss Balch acted both as the ardent advocate of specific causes and as the informed expert bringing exact knowledge to bear on international issues. This double role was continued in her life-long devotion to the detailed problems of creating peace. In the peace movement she has been above all the practical and realistic scholar. She is conscious of the number of different channels through which men can cooperate and distrusts sweeping governmental action from the top. She has always found special promise in the international administration of matters of common interest—in various kinds of functional international "authorities" or trusteeships to deal with specific problems.

In disagreement with The Nation of 1919 Emily Balch was a supporter of the League of Nations. From the outset she felt that even enlightened public opinion must work through existing political organizations capable of dealing with concrete political issues. With all its limitations, the League was a going concern, an instrument for dealing with a multitude of international problems. In the course of these activities the League could develop habits of cooperation that might be extended to wider political relations. This experience of the League, she recognizes, has not been lost; and the opportunity of acquiring more is the greatest promise of the United Nations. "What is needed," she pointed out last November, "is exactly the sort of thing the Economic and Social Council and the UNESCO stand for—namely, human, tolerant, elastic cooperation in which the threat of war is as inappropriate as it is in any civilized undertaking. I hope we are not going to try a federal world state, but instead a complex interweaving of functional arrangements for common interests."

In company with a remarkable group of coworkers at the Geneva headquarters of the Women's International League, Emily Balch devoted much work to specific issues of international government, in close cooperation with experts in the League Secretariat and with many European statesmen of good-will. She planned many international congresses of women and helped organize conferences on drug control, the internationalization of aviation, and above all disarmament. She undertook some ten "peace missions" to investigate problems of international tension on the spot. Her most successful one, with Paul H. Douglas in 1926 to Haiti, undoubtedly helped to bring about the withdrawal of the American occupation forces.

The Nobel peace prize, while usually given to statesmen whose official position has made it not too difficult for them to work effectively for peace, has also been bestowed on representatives of those unofficial organizations whose work has prepared the ground for governmental action. In honoring Bertha von Suttner, Jane Addams, and Karl von Ossietzky the Nobel Committee has recognized how much private citizens can contribute to the conditions for international peace.

It is interesting to note that of the three women who have won the award, Jane Addams and Emily Balch, have chosen to work through the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom. This organization grew out of the Congress of Women held at The Hague in

JOHN HERMAN RANDALL, Jr., is professor of philosophy at Columbia University. He is the author of the widely read book "The Making of the Modern Mind" and coauthor, more recently, of "Naturalism and the Human Spirit."

1915—a group of pioneers in the movement for women's rights who tried to stop the war, and almost succeeded. It has through the years enlisted the support of eminent leaders among women—Jane Addams from America, Lida Gustava Heymann, Yella Hertzka, and Gertrud Baer from Central Europe, Gabrielle Duchêne and Mme Roland from France, Helena Swanwick and Catherine Marshall from England. Like Emily Balch, most of these women have not been absolute pacifists. The Europeans have in the main been Socialists, opposed alike to war and to the social conditions that breed it. They naturally found themselves in the forefront of the fight against fascism. The prominent role played by the W. I. L. in the resistance movements, and especially in working out methods of non-violent opposition, was undoubtedly in the mind of the Nobel Committee in honoring its international president, Emily Balch.

Miss Balch is well fitted to be a symbol of the whole body of voluntary workers for peace throughout the world. Never the narrow partisan of a single method, she has always gladly cooperated with organizations of very different shades of opinion, convinced that all are needed in the work of constructing peace and that in a pluralistic and not too centralized movement they can learn much from one another. With her dry and kindly sense of humor, her modesty, her integrity of mind, and above all with that priceless quality of spiritual intensity and vision, she has won the respect of sincere workers for peace everywhere. And in her they have all received recognition.

Homeless America

BY CHARLES ABRAMS

III. A Workable Housing Program

THE government's policy in housing has been to have no policy. Each new emergency has spawned a new proposal; each proposal has had to be shaped to suit the more vocal pressures. Fifteen billion dollars of federal commitments for housing have brought forth a maze of laws, regulations, and pronouncements that have allayed public clamor for a time, raised hopes, and in the end left the housing problem unsolved.

In treating the problem again as an emergency we only set the stage for a new emergency and speed its arrival. Mounting sales prices threaten soon to start another epidemic of foreclosures. We are assured that houses will spring up as soon as materials are available, but none that are built will be within the reach of the rank and file. Homeless veterans are becoming unmanageable. The makeshift houses now being hastily put up to meet the immediate deficit of four million dwelling units will leave us with as painful a hangover as ever followed an orgy of jerry-building.

The only way the housing crisis can be met is through public building operations; yet this solution remains unmentioned and unmentionable. If local communities and the 800 local housing authorities were given the signal to build houses for veterans and others, land would quickly be purchased, mass production inaugurated, and labor used efficiently. Plans and specifications would be integrated, parts standardized. Materials would be purchased in bulk; the complete outputs of factories would be contracted for; millions of standardized parts would be turned out on mass order. Larger self-contained neighborhoods would replace the current mushroom developments. Instead of waiting for little builders to select small sites at random, then subserviently moving into the area with costly schools, streets, and utilities, the cities could plan their growth in advance, bring new neighborhoods into being where they should be. If speculative profit were eliminated, interest reduced to the going government rate, and the amortization period extended, homes could be built at prices within reach of veterans and others in the middle-income group.

What, then, holds us back? In the main it is the acceptance of the myth that the end of hostilities means the end of the public's right to build housing. From now on, according to the myth, we must revert to pre-war practices and depend for our houses on the two-by-four builder—anything else would be socialism. Yet if fifteen months after the war's end we can prosecute John L. Lewis and his union in an effort to stop the coal strike, why do not the government's war-time powers authorize it to build houses? What stops government from building for returning veterans as it did for war workers? It has long been acknowledged that the war powers may be employed for the period of reconstruction. We are using those powers in moving temporary houses, giving premium payments to materials manufacturers, and encouraging prefabrication. Yet any official who dared suggest home building by public agencies would be automatically classed as anti-capitalist.

CHARLES ABRAMS, former counsel to the New York City Housing Authority, is author of "The Future of Housing." This article is the last of a series on the housing problem in America.

The question whether government intervention is socialist or capitalist in principle hinges upon three things: (1) whether the activity is affected with a broad general interest; (2) whether the government's action competes with private effort; (3) whether the intervention, if in fact competition, will be only temporary, as during the war or other emergency.

The provision of decent shelter at rents returning veterans can afford, like slum clearance and low-rent housing, has long been upheld as a public function. These activities do not compete with private effort, for the private builder will not undertake them. Even Adam Smith conceded it to be the proper function of government to build those public works "which could never repay the expense to the individual."

Judged by the most rigid criterion, namely, that it must benefit private enterprise rather than contribute to the general welfare, construction of houses by public agencies meets the test. In the building of homes the predominant private functions are not those exercised by the speculative builder but by the factories that supply the materials, the labor that puts them together, and the contractors and subcontractors who organize and superintend the work. The builder simply acquires the land and activates various private skills and agencies to create the finished product. His is usually a transient interest; his investment is small. In fact, under the arrangements set up by the Federal Housing Administration, home building has become a wholly publicly financed operation masquerading as private enterprise. If, instead of maintaining this fiction, public agencies hired the more competent builders to act as their agents, no participants in the industry would be displaced and the home buyer would get better value for his money. The stock attack on all public ventures is that they are not so efficient as private, but the private builder can hardly boast of his success. Local housing authorities, on the other hand, though they have been in existence only for a decade, must be credited with one of the best performances in the history of public operations.

A public building program would not preclude private home building for sale or rental. Some of the land assembled by a public agency could well be resold for private undertakings. Nor does public building preclude private ownership. Having built the houses, the public agency could dispose of them as the federal government has done with its war housing. The larger projects could be sold to mutual-ownership corporations, private investors, or the tenants themselves, with preference shown to veterans.

A public building program offers the only immediate remedy for the present housing crisis, but it is not a cure-all. Other reforms must be sought concurrently. Definite long-range plans should be formulated for the rebuilding of our cities as befits our wealth, energy, and culture. All urban slums should be cleared in fifteen years and good subsidized housing provided for the displaced occupants. The Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill is a start in this direction and should be passed without delay. Rural slums should also be cleared and rural houses repaired through federal aid.

Home ownership must be placed on a sound basis. Well-built homes in sound neighborhoods, properly financed and carrying low interest rates, would fortify the home-ownership investment. The owner rather than the lender must be protected against fortuitous defaults. A sound mortgage system must be devised. Though our whole economic system has been influenced by the unprecedented expansion of mortgage debt, no real effort has been made to analyze the system's impact or correct its defects. Federal supervision is essential. The current unconscionable interest rates on government-insured mortgages should be reduced. Obsolete mortgage laws should be revised, foreclosure costs lessened, cumbrous procedures eliminated, persecution of owners through deficiency judgments banned. Freer competition on mortgage loans should be established and lobbying by the government-insured lending institutions prohibited.

The present G. I. Bill of Rights should be replaced by a program meeting the needs of all veterans—the farmer and the city dweller, the Negro and the white man, the able and the disabled. The current arrangement is a vicious device enabling veterans to buy homes most of them cannot keep. Local authorities should build the houses with federal aid and without profit.

Only a politically irresponsible government will put the welfare of an industry that cannot fulfil its function in society above the welfare of the people. If circumstances make it impossible for private enterprise to supply some essential of life, it is the duty of government to intervene. When private enterprise again operates adequately, then and only then is it time for the government to withdraw.

During the war the government built not only housing, directly through private contractors, but plants for war industries. It took this action because it could do the job quicker and better than private enterprise. No one considered it a challenge to our way of life. Is the logic that dictates government building in a war emergency less forceful in a post-war emergency? The bottleneck in housing production is not the materials shortage but a misconception of the function of government.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Fighting for Tariffs

AMERICAN delegates to the recent preparatory conference of the International Trade Organization encountered a good deal of skepticism about the ability of the present Administration in Washington to implement its own proposals for the freeing of world trade. How far was the United States prepared to go, representatives of other countries were apt to ask, in lowering its own tariff walls? Was it willing to plan for a permanent import balance so as to permit foreign creditors to pay their debts to America and to continue buying American goods? It was not easy to provide reassuring answers to such questions; it has become still harder to do so since the elections and the remobilization of the protectionist storm troops.

Although the tariff was in no sense involved in the elections, triumphant Republicans have been quick to claim a mandate to end the Administration's efforts to reduce tariff barriers the world over through negotiations authorized by the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. Senator Butler of Nebraska has written to Under Secretary of State William C. Clayton demanding a suspension of such negotiations until the Congress has "an opportunity to write a new foreign trade policy" to replace the "lame-duck" program of the government. Representative Daniel A. Reed, second ranking Republican on the House Ways and Means Committee, has drafted a bill which would deprive the President of the right to make new reciprocal agreements and call upon him to cancel all existing ones. Although it is highly improbable that such a measure could be passed over a Presidential veto, G. O. P. strategists may decide to proceed with it "for the record." If that accomplished nothing else, it would certainly hinder negotiations with other nations by underlining the unstable nature of American policy.

Meanwhile a heavy barrage of protests against lowered tariffs will be fired off at public hearings which the Interdepartmental Committee on Reciprocity is to open on January 13 in connection with negotiations with eighteen foreign countries scheduled for the spring. Early in November the government published a list of imports in regard to which tariff concessions would be considered, and invited interested parties to file briefs. The response, particularly from industries producing light consumers' goods, has been voluminous and violent. The underwear and knitgoods industry, for instance, is planning not only to resist a further reduction in duties but to demand restoration of the 50 per cent cut included in the 1939 trade agreement with Britain. In an interview with the Journal of Commerce Roy A. Cheney, president of the Underwear Institute, declared that they were faced with competition, not from individual British firms, but from the whole "Fascist-Socialist" government of Britain. Since underwear is definitely not on the British government's nationalization program, Mr. Cheney's complaint is as strange as his use of a popular Communist epithet. But it suggests that in presenting their case the high-tariff boys will rely as much on appeals to prejudice as on statistics. It was ever so.

The rayon industry, supposed to be an outstanding example of the efficiency and initiative of private enterprise, is another which will plead for higher tariffs. Its brief will stress the danger of Japanese and Italian "dumping" and the strategic importance of the domestic rayon production. It will point out also that the largest American rayon manufacturer was British-owned until sold to provide war funds. Now, it will be alleged, the British are out to destroy the asset they sold to American investors.

Predictions of ruin through the competition of cheap foreign labor will also be voiced by the cotton, woolen, leather, shoe, pottery, and other industries. Growers of wool, in addition to "preparing to resist to the utmost the reported efforts of the State Department to reduce existing wool duties," will seek quota limitation of imports, according to a story in the New York Times. In this endeavor they can count on support from Western Senators of both parties, to the embarrassment of the Administration, which has zealously preached the wickedness of quantitative restriction of imports to foreign countries. But the hardest blow to the government's program up to date is the recent attack on it from the traditionally low-tariff South. Secretaries of Agriculture in thirteen Southern states have announced the filing of briefs with the Reciprocity Committee prophesying that if the present trade-agreements program is implemented, farmers will see crops "rotting on the land" while the railroads carry "trainload after trainload" of foreign vegetables.

This Southern manifesto calls for "a truly reciprocal" policy permitting the exchange of American farm products for commodities "which are not natural to our soil nor suited to our climate." Coffee, tea, rubber, silk, sisal, jute, and bananas are instanced as beneficial imports, but no effort is made to explore the difficulties likely to be met in persuading Brazil, a large exporter of cotton, to swap its coffee for Texas cotton.

In any case, imports of non-competitive products, whether industrial or agricultural, will not provide other countries with enough dollars to enable them to buy the goods we want to sell and pay their debts. William K. Jackson, president of the National Chamber of Commerce, said recently:

We have become the world's greatest creditor nation, and the only way we can ever hope to recover any substantial part of these credits is through the acceptance of the goods and raw materials that our debtor nations can send to us. . . . We cannot be impoverished by receiving back the equivalent of the goods or credits which we at some time sent away from our country. It is inevitable that some disadvantage will come to some industry or segment of our country, but with intelligent and sympathetic co-operation these disadvantages should prove negligible compared to the great good that will come to the greater number of our people.

Unfortunately, history proves all too plainly that in tariff matters the sum of sectional interests, multiplied by log-rolling, is normally found by Congress to be greater than the national interest.

IN ONE EAR

BY LOU FRANKEL

TEN years ago an experimental engineer named John Hogan was testing the acoustical range of a new method of high-fidelity broadcasting by playing recordings of classical music on his experimental station, W2XR, at the top end of the radio dial where the numbers run high. The average set at that time could not reach 1560 on the dial, but Mr. Hogan was flooded with mail asking for advance notice of the time when he was going to broadcast certain recorded classics. And radio repair men found that more and more people were bringing in their sets to have the dials reset so they could get W2XR.

Today some five hundred thousand people in and around New York City swear by WQXR, the station's present name, and thousands more in other parts of the country wonder why their community doesn't have a QXR. The reason for New York's singular good fortune is simply that the 10 per cent of the available audience who listen to WQXR in New York City and the vicinity amount to half a million people, enough to give the station a thumping financial success, whereas in no other community would 10 per cent of the available audience mean enough listeners to support a quality station. People in New York still want to know when their favorite music will be played, and 38,000 of them pay $1 a year for the monthly program booklet; 1,100 subscriptions to the booklet were ordered for Christmas gifts.

WQXR, now owned by the New York Times, is the quality radio station in the country. There the listener is king, not the advertiser. There every program, sustaining or commercial, that goes on the air is written and produced by the staff; none are written or produced by an advertiser. The basic material may be furnished by the advertiser, but that is all.

WQXR knows its listeners do not like singing commercials. But if an advertiser who wants to reach the WQXR audience with a jingle is willing to let WQXR revise the jingle, the station will go to work at it. Using only the tune of the famous, or infamous, Pepsi-Cola jingle, which has been dinned into the ears of listeners on almost every station, WQXR had it done on a pianoforte, giving it a music-box quality which listeners found pleasing. When the United Fruit Company wanted to air its familiar "Chiquita Banana" jingle over WQXR, the station dropped the lyric, orchestrated the melody to sound like something by Mozart, and used it as the signature to a quarter-hour of Latin American music.

WQXR has a continuity staff of seven writers to turn out the custom-written programs and commercials; many a 50,000-watt network affiliate operates with fewer writers. It has a studio orchestra of eleven musicians; most stations have no more than six and use them infrequently. Other stations have advisory committees, but WQXR consults a committee of 4,400 listeners, half of them taken from the subscription list for the program booklet and half from persons who have written to the station. Eight times a year the station asks them to give it a going over. Their only remuneration is an invitation to the concerts given expressly for them three times a year at Hunter College by the augmented station orchestra.

On election night the station scheduled twelve spots in that evening schedules for late election returns. Care was taken not to interrupt any selection and not to break into the mood of a program; and the election data were kept brief. The advisory committee, however, would have liked more breaks for election news, and that is what the audience will get next year.

Since the Times bought the station in 1944, the advertising standards have become even more stringent than before. Newscasts are no longer sold; the Times presents the news in short four-minute takes. The station figures that if an advertiser sponsors the news, there is liable to be pressure, perhaps only enough to make a news editor cut out an item he thinks the advertiser might not like. But even that is taboo.

The Times has also discarded commentators in the belief that every commentator has some bias, and that WQXR has not enough air time to present every point of view. Instead, the station uses the forum technique, with Times staff members as moderators; for a fillip the forums are broadcast each week from a different church, temple, service or women's club. In contrast to the newsrooms of most stations, which contain a news ticker, the daily papers, and an announcer with scissors doubling as newsmen, the Times staffs the WQXR newsroom with nine editors and writers who get a copy of everything that comes in to the newspaper from its correspondents and thirty-odd news tickers.

As everyone knows, WQXR's long suit is its music, more than 50 per cent of which is classical, symphonic, opera, and chamber music, about 25 per cent the lighter classics, and about 2.5 per cent popular non-swing tunes. Newscasts take about 10 per cent of the schedule; there are no sports and only a minute amount of religious broadcasting; forums and children's, women's, and public-service programs add up to a little more than 5 per cent. With a fifty-fifty split between commercial and sustaining time, it is obvious why the "class" listening audience likes WQXR.

However, I received a postcard recently from a WQXR fan in St. Albans, Long Island, complaining that the station advertised brassières, girdles, and stock-market tips. This slight headache stems from the Times ownership of the station. Any firm that advertises in the paper, where the acceptance rules are truly rigid, is automatically acceptable to the station. The alleged stock-market tips are nothing more than the Babson Market Service, which advertises in the newspaper. The girdle advertiser is also a Times client, and the copy makes its points inoffensively. So well does WQXR know its audience that the postcard I received was the only complaint they had had about the commercials on that program.

BOOKS and the ARTS

PHILOSOPHY: SPECULATION OR SCIENCE?

BY HANS REICHENBACH

IN THE usual conception, philosophy is the construction of a system. A philosophical system is a vast aggregate of ideas covering all domains of the physical and intellectual universe: it comprises a theory of knowledge, an interpretation of the fundamentals of science, an account of the structure of the cosmos, and, on the other hand, a set of directives for life derived from some superior rules of morals or religion. The German word Weltanschauung is perhaps the most characteristic term for such a comprehensive philosophy.

Looking with the eyes of the unprejudiced spectator, we see immediately that a philosophy of this kind is a strange mixture of two different objectives. One is of a cognitive nature, directed toward an understanding of matters of fact; the other is of a volitional nature and intended to supply a control of the emotional attitudes of man, including both his individual and his social behavior. This dual function of philosophy dates from ancient time. In Plato's dialogues Socrates repeatedly attempts to convince his opponents of the parallelism of knowledge and ethics, of the true and of the good; and the alternative true-false has been over and again considered the analogue of the alternative right-wrong. A somewhat closer study reveals that the emphasis on such duality was usually accompanied by a very definite practical purpose, the aim of protecting ethics from doubt, of making moral laws as certain as the laws of nature or even as the laws of logic. Spinoza's system of ethics, which in its form imitates Euclid's system of geometry, is perhaps the outstanding representative of a cognitive-valuational parallelism. Kant's philosophy repeats the same theme; his "Critique of Pure Reason" was written with the intention of establishing a basis for his "Critique of Practical Reason," and his synthetic a priori was meant to supply a rational ground both for knowledge and for morals.

Even without entering into a logical critique of such parallelism we observe one of its most conspicuous consequences—the fact that the theory of knowledge in such a philosophy is ultimately a means for an end and therefore not developed in its own right. It is not based on specialized studies; it indulges in extreme generalities, leaving detailed analysis to other disciplines. To construct generalities not based on analysis of details, however, means speculation; in fact, it is speculation as opposed to research that has distinguished philosophy from science. Science proceeds analytically; it studies the minute detail before it proceeds to generalization. The philosopher has attempted to replace minute analysis by intuition, and has believed that there exists a direct approach to ultimate truth or rightness that does not need scientific substantiation. Radical idealists like Schelling have based a claim of superiority on the evasion of scientific method. He calls science "blind and deprived of ideas" and insists that his philosophy trains "a new organ of vision and of the understanding of nature" capable of solving the problems which science has been unable to solve.

No wonder that the scientist felt disappointed by such philosophy, that he distrusted generalities not derived from the analysis of the detail. It is true that not all philosophers were as arrogant as Schelling and disdained the scientist; but their methods must appear pretentious to the men who compile long sets of observational data before they venture to formulate the simplest generality, and who control their inferential chains by the elaborate methods of mathematics. Helmholtz, one of those physicists whom science has led to philosophy, complains about "the impudence with which certain people who do not understand the smallest geometrical theorem judge about the most difficult problems of the theory of space, convinced of their superior wisdom." The nineteenth century has borne out the antagonism of scientists and philosophers. The high degree of technicalization to which science rose in that century has separated more strongly the scientist from the philosopher. As a result of such development, the science of our day is completely severed from philosophy. Seeing that the philosopher is unable to interpret scientific results and scientific method, the scientist has attempted to construct his own philosophy, which, though not always too successful, at least has helped him in the development of scientific theories.

The philosophical work of the scientist was taken up by a group of younger men who, trained not only in the history of philosophy but also in the mathematical sciences and mathematical logic, renounced an active participation in scientific discovery and concentrated on the elaboration of the philosophical implications of science. Disregarding the philosophical systems, they rather tried to bring into the open the philosophical undercurrents of the evolution of science, thus opening a new source which is feeding philosophy with new content and new methods of work. The introduction of scientific method into philosophy found its first expression in the clarification of the program of philosophic investigation. The cognitive branch of philosophy was separated from the valuational branch and was made the objective of careful analysis carried through with the means of mathematical logic and undertaken without any intention of finding ethical implications.

One of the foremost results of such scientific philosophy is the clarification of the nature of a question. The adage that a fool can ask more than a wise man can answer finds its logical equivalent in the distinction between meaningful and meaningless questions. A question is meaningful only if

Oxford Books

INCLUDED IN THE NATION'S LIST
OF OUTSTANDING BOOKS OF 1946

From Max Weber

ESSAYS IN SOCIOLOGY

Translated, edited and with an introduction by H. H. GERTH and C. WRIGHT MILLS. A selection of newly translated writings from the work of one of Europe's greatest social scientists, with a biographical introduction, notes, and bibliography. $6.00

★

A CRITICAL HISTORY of English Poetry

By SIR HERBERT GRIERSON and J. C. SMITH. This collaboration between two great scholars, which covers 1200 years of English poetry from Anglo-Saxon times to 1939, is designed to stimulate a sounder understanding and a deeper enjoyment of the virtues and pleasures of poetry. $5.00

★

THE Carthaginian Peace

or THE ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES OF MR. KEYNES

By ETIENNE MANTOUX. "Important... an intelligent, factual and illuminating appraisal of the Treaty of Versailles, and of Keynes's attack upon it, in the light of subsequent events."—The Nation. $4.50

AT ALL BOOKSTORES

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
114 FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK 11

it is so asked that before we can give the true answer we at least can tell how a possible answer would look. Thus to ask for the origin of the terrestrial globe is a reasonable question, because we can imagine an answer, for instance in the form of a theory according to which the earth was originally part of the sun and then detached by centrifugal forces; whether this answer is true remains to be found out by scientific investigation. But to ask for the origin of the universe is an unreasonable question; it is meaningless because we cannot say how a possible answer would look. Any answer would make the universe the product of some other occurrence which in turn would have to be included in the universe and therefore could not be the source of the universe. A review of philosophical systems shows that many so-called philosophical questions are of the meaningless type. No wonder that a great many of the philosophical controversies are so empty and futile. The distinction between meaningful and meaningless questions is the scientific form of a criticism which common sense has always raised against philosophy. "Where concepts are missing, the word is right at hand," says Goethe. The term "metaphysics" is now often used, by its opponents, to indicate what they consider to be an empty brand of philosophy.

Not all philosophical questions are meaningless, however. Some have remained unanswered because their answer required a scientific technique which up to now had not been developed. The question of the origin of life, for instance, has found a new approach through Darwin's theory of evolution; and the near future may perhaps supply us with the proof that living cells may be constructed from inorganic matter. The question of the nature of space and time has found an answer in certain mathematical and physical discoveries, reaching a climax in Einstein's theory of relativity. We have learned to distinguish between mathematical space, a conceptual construction open to various geometrical forms, and physical space, which is part of the structure of the universe; and we know that space and time, in the physical sense, express some very general features of the physical world, such as are given in the behavior of solid bodies and light rays. Some of the answers thus supplied by science to philosophical questions have turned out to be surprising even to the scientist. Thus the question of the nature of cause and effect has found a negative answer, in that it has been shown that there exists no strict causality in the physical world, that the future is indeterminate, and that the dream of a pre-determination of the future and of a possible strict prediction of future events must forever be abandoned. Only statistical predictions are possible.

The concept of probability which thus has received a legitimate place in the system of physics has likewise turned out to be indispensable for the solution of a problem which the history of philosophy had faced for about two hundred years without the hope of a solution—the problem of the inductive inference. This problem, which found its critic in David Hume, is now accessible to an answer based on probability notions; it turns out that the procedure of inductive knowledge is more closely related to the betting of the gambler than to the rationalized conception of knowledge which so far has been the basis of philosophic investigation.

In addition to answering old questions, the philosophy of science has learned to ask new questions of which the philosophical systems had never thought. That there is more between heaven and earth than was dreamed of in traditional philosophy has found a vivid demonstration in the results of modern quantum physics, according to which the elementary physical particles, when unobserved, behave in an irrational way, so that the world of unobserved objects cannot be constructed along the lines of macroscopic phenomena. The critique of the foundations of mathematics, furthermore, has led to the discovery of concepts incomprehensible to traditional logic. That the whole need not be larger than its part was shown in the theory of sets; that logic is not restricted to the alternative true-false but can be replaced by a multi-valued logic, which possesses more than the two truth values of truth and falsehood, was shown in mathematical logic. One of these non-Aristotelian logics, a three-value system, has been used for the interpretation of quantum physics.

Scientific philosophy is on the march, and speculative philosophy is dying, though it still supplies the major material of our instruction in philosophy. The philosophy of the systems is dying because it has no connection with the work and the achievement of the scientist. If academic philosophy is so inefficient in the education of youth, if it has no influence on scientific pursuit, the reason is to be found in its adherence to outmoded forms, in its inability to turn away from speculative creations which, in their time, may have represented necessary forms of thought but which find no application in the age of a mature science. What does it help to teach the student of science the history of philosophy as a sequence of "philosophical systems, to guide him through the philosophical museum of stuffed products of human imagination? He will learn philosophy only if it is taught in close contact with his scientific studies; if it helps him to understand the methods of his scientific work and the results of a science grown from the soil of experiment and observation. Philosophic systems will not be awakened from their paper lives if occasionally a new system becomes a literary fashion, such as existentialism in present-day France. Such injections with new verbalisms will not give new life to a dying form of philosophy.

The extension of scientific philosophy to the inclusion of the social sciences leads to great difficulties. One reason is that the social sciences are not so highly developed as the natural sciences, that they are too controversial in their methods and their results. Another reason is derived from the confusion of cognitive statements and volitional aims mentioned above. Social organization is a means to an end; but to what end it is to be adjusted cannot be found out by scientific methods because the question of the end is not of a cognitive nature. Purpose is man-made and is not derivable from the structure of the universe. We human beings set up the aims of our society; what we call a better world is a matter of volitional decision. If we stand for our decision, if we are willing to take upon us the trouble of the fight for a better world, we do so because we trust in human will. There is no such thing as "the good" in the sense of an object of knowledge. The distinction between good and bad is volitional; and to follow our decision requires confidence in our set of values but does not presuppose an adherence to cognitive truths.

COLUMBIA BOOKS

Recommended by The Nation in their list of Outstanding Books of 1946

A HISTORY OF American Philosophy

By Herbert W. Schneider. In this brilliant synthesis of American thought an outstanding scholar in the field surveys the entire range of ideas developed in this country, many of which still influence our current thinking. His volume is of two-fold importance: first as a study of one segment of the general history of philosophy; second as a much needed contribution to the history of American culture. $4.50

THE CONCENTRATION OF Economic Power

By David Lynch. "His summary and appraisal of the TNEC will be cherished by many. . . More than a ready guide to significant statistics. . . A well-woven background of the committee's origin."—The Nation. $5.50

Beyond Supply and Demand

A REAPPRAISAL OF INSTITUTIONAL ECONOMICS

By John S. Gambs. "An original and important book, clearly and entertainingly written."—The Nation. "Exceptionally broad and thorough study . . . an exhilarating and fruitful intellectual experience."—Chicago Sun. $1.60

AT ALL BOOKSTORES

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS
MORNINGSIDE HEIGHTS NEW YORK 17

HON. EUGENE P. CONNOLLY

and

DASHIELL HAMMETT

INVITE YOU TO A

TESTIMONIAL DINNER

TO

CONGRESSMAN

VITO MARCANTONIO

Friday • January 10, 1947 • 7 P. M.

HOTEL COMMODORE

Lexington Ave. & 43rd Street

S P E A K E R S

DOROTHY PARKER.....Writer
 A. F. WHITNEY.....President, Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen
 HON. EMANUEL CELLER.....Member of Congress
 HYMAN BLUMBERG.....State Chairman, ALP
 HON. A. CLAYTON POWELL.....Member of Congress
 ALBERT DEUTSCH.....Columnist, PM
 JOHANNES STEEL.....Commentator
 DONALD OGDEN STEWART.....Writer

Reservations may be made at:

New York County ALP, Dinner Committee
 28 Greenwich Ave., New York 11, N. Y. • ORchard 4-1041

$10.00 per person

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE *Nation*Money-Saving Magazine Combinations

with Harpers Magazine $8.50

You Save $2.50

with Consumers Union $9.25

You Save $1.25

with Harper's Magazine and Consumers Union $11.75

You Save $3.75

with Free World $8.50

You Save $1.50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses. Canadian and foreign postage extra.

THE NATION by itself:

☐ 1 Year $6 ☐ 2 Years $10 ☐ 3 Years $14☐ Servicemen's Rate $4 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage—$1 a year extra

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed.☐ Bill me.

NAME _____

STREET _____

CITY _____

ZONE _____

STATE _____

1-4-47

Only the relation between ends and means is of a cognitive nature. From the higher aim we derive the subordinate aim: that war is not good if we want the greatest happiness of the greatest number is demonstrable by cognitive means. Fortunately the volitional aims of human beings are not so very different, and a great deal of political controversy is therefore of a cognitive nature. Thus the question whether state ownership of the means of production should be demanded is of a cognitive nature for all those who pursue a democratic aim. That the answer is so difficult results from the fact that the science of sociology is still in its beginnings. But the philosopher should at least point out where cognitive relations exist, and what questions can be answered, in principle, by the social sciences.

Not all political controversies, however, can be settled by cognitive means. The proponents of the existence of a master race, for instance, cannot be shown by cognitive means to be wrong; they stand for a different aim. We do not wish to say that such aims should be tolerated, but we should know that we cannot convince our adversaries by something like logic. The different aims are represented by different social groups; which group will be victorious is a matter of social power. Our hope that the social struggle can be settled without resort to bombs and bullets is based on the fact that the majority of men prefer peaceful aims to the valuatational system of the superman.

It would be a serious mistake to call upon philosophy to be a leader in the social struggle. Ethical decisions, the maturation of will, grow from the activities of life, not from the philosopher's study. We take our set of values from the sociological environment in which we live, and we shape our decisions under the pressure of the tension between social strata, of the discrepancies between religious morals and the exigencies of life, of our necessary adjustments in our personal struggle for existence. The philosopher can help such developments by the clarification which he contributes to the struggle. But even that social function he will acquire only when his philosophy of values is as close to social life as his philosophy of cognition should be with respect to scientific knowledge. The philosophy of speculation is as unsuited for such achievement as it is in the cognitive field. Social philosophy has its future in scientific method as much as does the philosophy of knowledge. If the academic philosopher does not realize this situation, if he insists on the claim that philosophy can supply us with a system of ultimate truths and ultimate values, academic philosophy will more and more lose contact with actual life and live on only in the isolation of the philosophy departments.

Philosophers never have been lawgivers, and even the present-day colleagues of Plato. I am afraid, will not become kings. But philosophers have been, and should be, educators; and philosophic clarification of thought should help to shape the face of society in a world of industry and class movements. The path to a functional incorporation in modern civilization is open only to a philosophy which is willing to appropriate scientific methods for philosophic pursuit. Between speculation and science there is no third; the philosopher has to make up his mind, and his choice will determine whether there will be a philosophy that is an active ingredient of intellectual life.

Neurosis and Lucidity

THE KAFKA PROBLEM. Edited by Angel Flores. New Directions. $5.

WHAT has modern literature to set beside this?" André Gide is reported to have asked at a Picasso exhibition in Paris in 1932. He was referring to the distortions, arbitrary forms, free constructions, and general departure from naturalism that are the familiar and triumphant feature of all painting we know as truly modern. His interlocutor, had he been alert, might have answered that in Franz Kafka literature had at last caught up with painting in these particular qualities of modernism. In these bold innovations in technique, his distortions, free construction, and illogical logicity, Kafka has perhaps more to offer the future novelist in the way of going beyond naturalism than any of his great contemporaries.

And perhaps it is this very novelty of his art that is chiefly responsible for the babel of critical voices we get in this not very distinguished collection of essays. Chiefly, but not altogether; for when George Woodcock declares Rex Warner to be superior to Kafka, or when Max Lerner speaks of a "wild subjectivism" in Kafka, who is, moreover, "God-drunk," or when Edwin Berry Burgum refers to "so disordered a talent," or—but why go on? The point is that we are back again in that vast modern army of whim and wilfulness that marches under the challenging banner of "Anything Goes." Such lapses aside, however, in a good many of the contributions to this book we might almost be present at a confusion of critics before the early showings of Matisse, Picasso, Klee, Miro, eagerly jostling each other and aggressively asking, "But what does it mean?"

The quick leap past the literary work to get at its meaning is precisely the great critical temptation in the case of Kafka. Two contributors, Camus and Maguy, are enough aware of this to begin by announcing that they approach Kafka's writings as constructions with their own internal characteristics as literature—though perhaps neither holds to this point of view rigorously enough. But if Kafka's work becomes merely a hurdle to be taken quickly for the meaning beyond it, the critic usually comes a cropper in one or another of two ditches on the other side: a very muddy ditch, the excessively theological interpretation; or a ditch whose water is much too insipidly thin, the exclusively or mechanically social interpretation. Max Brod, his friend and editor, who strove to see Kafka in the pattern of his own pietistic Judaism, has already made us familiar with this first interpretation, but in the present volume the most extreme and vigorous representative of the theological critics is John Kelly, who would see Kafka grounded as firmly in the rigid and elaborate "theology of crisis" of Karl Barth as Dante was in scholastic theology and philosophy! If Kafka did not read Barth, this does not seem to bother Kelly, for he proceeds to equate Barth with Kierkegaard, whom we know Kafka did read. No notice is taken of Kafka's own statement that neither Judaism nor Christianity was the door by which he entered or left existence. Kafka, we remember, began to read Kierkegaard for the parallel between their broken-off engagements. The very comparison between Kierkegaard and scholastic theology only serves to show how little the critic has grasped the meaning of this philosopher, the very movement of whose thought is against system, and in a certain sense against philosophy itself, and whose philosophical contribution might be summed up under his own half-jesting title, "Philosophical Scraps."

No doubt Kafka was a religious writer, but in a sense far subtler than Brod or Kelly recognizes: in the sense of consecration with which he approached the act of writing; and in his unblinking gaze at certain absolutes of existence, guilt, and loneliness he was confronting those experiences with which religions have traditionally attempted to cope by other means, by more or less elaborate systems of belief.

If Brod and Kelly are ready to receive Kafka into the fold of Zionism or Geneva, Mr. Burgum, on the other hand, is definitely the commissar purging Kafka as a proto-fascist, disordered mind and diseased personality. It might be better to pass over such an exhibition in silence, were it not that Burgum's is no isolated mind but a representative of the barbarous mentality of Stalinism which now threatens the few tattered shreds of civilization remaining in the world.

But though his critics do not hesitate to load Kafka with much more theological, metaphysical, and social baggage than the traffic can bear, there seems nevertheless to be a concerted shying away from any application of Freud to the data of Kafka's life or writings. Only Paul Landsberg in the present volume makes a legitimate use of Freud in interpreting "The Metamorphosis" as a liberation from an obsession, and rightly finds therein added reason for praising Kafka. Rudolf Vasata blithely states that Max Brod is quite right in refusing a psychoanalytic interpretation of Kafka's relation to his father—as if anyone, much less Kafka, could so easily escape his father! The applicability of Freud to him and his works, far from being a necessary diminution of his stature, may actually witness his real depth and universality. The strains of neurosis are in us all, and the fact that in those lucid hallucinations which are the stories of Kafka some of the deepest compulsions of human beings are expressed, and to that extent liberated, only renders mankind the more his debtor. What, after all, has the modern writer become but that outcast who is appointed to suffer lucidly for the rest of humanity?

WILLIAM BARRETT

JOIN

THE BALLET SOCIETY

GEORGE BALANCHINE, Artistic Director

LEON BAZZIN, Musical Director

Second Program:

Monday and Tuesday, January 13 and 14

Hunter College Playhouse, 117 East 44th Street

"RENARD" ("The Fox") (First U. S. Stage Performance)

Igor Stravinsky—George Balanchine—Esteban Frances

"PASTORELA" (Mexican Folk Opera) (First U.S. Performance)

Paul Bowles—Lew Christensen—Alvin Colt

RATNA MOHINI and her Javanese Court Dancers

Stravinsky's "Rossignol" and arrangements by Colin McPhee

IRIS MABRY (Young American Dancer)

"DIVERTIMENTO" (Classic Ballet) (First Performance)

Alexei Haieff—George Balanchine

Admission by subscription only

THE BALLET SOCIETY

130 West 54th Street

Phone: Circle 6-7831

JOIN THE BALLET SOCIETY AT ANY TIME

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
86th ST.
NAME: LEX.
HAMILTON
123th ST.
RECENT RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE
HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RIKO

NOW

"HARBOILED DRAMA OF MURDER AND LOVE"
—N. Y. Sun

GEORGE RAFT
LYNN BARI

'NOCTURNE'

—AND—

JAMES MASON
'THEY WERE SISTERS'

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT REPUBLIC
TILYUO
Coney Island

Queens
MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Kelt's
FLUSHING
Kelt's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

Manhattan
COLONIAL
B'way & 52St.

"Fluent, musical and enchanting."—N. Y. Herald Tribune

CARY GRANT
ALEXIS SMITH

In the story of COLE PORTER • with COLE PORTER songs

'Night and Day'

In TECHNICOLOR • with

Monty WOOLEY • Glancey SIMMS
Jane WYMAN • Mary MARTIN

—AND—

'I'LL TAKE MILK' • Leon ERROL

PARAMOUNT Presents

BETTY HUTTON • SONNY TUFTS

IN

'CROSS MY HEART'

A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

—IN PERSON—

ANDREWS SISTERS

TONY PASTOR and His Orchestra

PLUS

LES PAUL & HIS TRIO

NOW
TIMES SQUARE

PARAMOUNT

Midnight
Feature
Nightly

STAGE PLAYS

RICHARD RODGERS & OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN, 2nd, present
"IRRESISTIBLE HUMOR."—Barnes, Herald Tribune

HELEN HAYES

—in—

'HAPPY BIRTHDAY'

A New Comedy by ANITA LOOS • Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN

BROADHURST Theat., 44th St. West of Broadway, Evenings 8:30, Matinee: Wednesday & Saturday 2:40.

"JUBILANT & JOYFUL."—Brown, Sat. Review of Literature

ETHEL MERMAN

IN THE MUSICAL SMASH

'ANNIE GET YOUR GUN'

Music & Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN • Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS

with RAY MIDDLETON • Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN
IMPERIAL Theatre, 43th St. West of Broadway, Evenings 8:30, Matinee: Wednesday and Saturday at 2:30.

STAGE PLAYS

MELVYN DOUGLAS & HERMAN LEVIN present

"CALL ME MISTER"

Smash-Hit Revue with JANE KEAN

Songs by Harold Rome • Sketches by Arnold Auerbach • Staged by Robert Gordon
In New York—NATIONAL THEAT., 41st St. W. of B'way, Mats. Wed & Sat.

• AND ON TOUR •

BOSTON—SHUBERT THEATRE
"BROADWAY'S BIGGEST REVUE HIT!"—Life Magazine

"A smash hit of enormous proportions." —
Ward More-
house, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEAT., 43th Street East of B'way, OH 4-4236
Evenings 8:40, Matinee Wednesday & Saturday 2:40.

MAX GORDON Presents

FREDERIC FLORENCE
MARCH ELDREDGE
YEARS AGO

The New Smash Hit by RUTH GORDON

Directed by Garson Kanin

MANSFIELD THEAT., 47th St. W. of B'way, CI 9-9056
Eves. 8:40 Mats. Wed. & Sat. at 2:40

"Must be seen.
... Warming, charming chuckling."
—Morehouse, Sun

"RATTLING GOOD THEATRE."—Atkinson, Times

JOSE FERRER IN
CYRANO de BERGERAC

FRANCES REID • RALPH CLANTON • HIRAN SHERMAN

PAULA LAURENCE • FRANCES COMPTON

ERNEST GRAVES • WILLIAM WOODSON

BARRYMORE THEAT., 47th Street West of Broadway, CI 4-0390
Eves., Incl. Sun., 8:30, Mats. Sat. & Sun., 2:30

JEAN DAIRYMPLÉ Presents

BERT LAHR

with JEAN PARKER in

BURLESQUE The FAMOUS COMEDY

By George Manker WATTERS and Arthur HOPKINS

BELASCO Theat., 44th St., E. of B'way, BR 9-2067

Evenings: 8:40, 11:20-12:40; Saturday Evenings 11:50-12:40
Matinee: Thursday and Saturday 2:40, 11:20-12:40 tax included

Buy Your Books
through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price post-free if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D. No C. O. D.'s outside of United States. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible. Make checks payable to The Nation.

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION

The NATION

20 VESBY STREET

NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

IT HAS often been objected by the more serious-minded that Shaw's prefaces make his plays unnecessary. In the case of "Androcles and the Lion" he outdid even himself, for never before has a mountain of earnestness brought forth a friskier mouse. Perhaps the best way to take the play is to forget the intolerable burden of preliminary lucubrations and to accept it for what it is—a joyously irresponsible little farce entirely appropriate to the Christmas season, when even adults traditionally attempt, with greater or less success, a return to a happier childish world: That at least seems to be the mood in which the American Repertory Theater has approached the current production at the International Theater. The lion should be readily understood by a generation raised on Disney, and the big scene is made that in which two quite entrancing bullocks created by Remo Bufano ponderously pull the cart bringing Androcles's old friend to the arena where Androcles himself is awaiting martyrdom. The moral—which is chiefly that the early Christians, like the early members of every revolutionary movement, seem to their conventional contemporaries inspired by nothing except tire-some bad taste—is left clear enough, but is reduced, as Shaw himself reduced it as soon as the preface was finished, to little more than incidental importance in a divertissement which is primarily a way of leading up to the always satisfactory conclusion "and they lived happily ever after."

It has long seemed to me that those who struggle to resolve the paradoxes of Shaw tend to overlook, because it is so obvious, one of the most important keys—which is simply that this big bad diabolist is, as a matter of fact, so kindly and so soft-hearted that he has always found it impossible to summon sufficient implacability to write a play in which anything irreconcilably evil puts in even a temporary appearance. He blusters mightily about, for example, the Battle of the Sexes, Nietzscheism, and the Revolution. But the battle of the sexes, instead of being as in Strindberg a war of extermination, becomes merely a pleasant little sham contest in which both sides win; Nietzscheism becomes, similarly, merely an earnest determination to improve from which all ruthlessness has disappeared; and revolution turns out to be nothing except the process of voting the rascals out. He never writes tragedy, because in tragedy someone has to get hurt; and it may even be that the absence of heart which has so often been complained of means merely that he cannot bear to create a character endowed with the organ which makes a certain kind of suffering possible.

If this is true, then "Androcles" is merely the most obvious of all the examples. The preface may treat persecution as the cruel and bloody thing which historically it was, but when the play comes to be written the author cannot bring himself to create the actual image of anything so painful. Nor is it merely that the martyrs are saved and the Romans themselves rendered likable. The very emperor himself, for all that he is presiding over a butchery, is made into a fairy-tale ogre who wouldn't hurt a flea. Obviously the author is the same man who, according to a recent newspaper story, sent an insulting letter to a chapter of the League of Woman Voters which had asked him to autograph a book for sale. A curmudgeon would, of course have simply thrown the request into the wastepaper basket. Shaw instead plays the role expected of him and contributes a characteristic screed which, as he well knows, will sell for a great deal more than a simple autograph while at the same time it enables him to stay in character.

And has it ever been noticed, I wonder, that few if any other modern writers of repute are so completely free in their personality as well as in the characters they create from any touch of what we call—and tend to praise as—the "neurotic." That was part of the stock in trade of his immediate predecessor, Ibsen, whose originality was in no small measure connected with his exploitation of the irrational components in human character. It becomes a constructive program for better housing

At last,

The FUTURE of HOUSING

By CHARLES ABRAMS

Author of "Revolution in Land"

"I found this—for the layman—the most interesting analysis of all the factors involved, social, economic, political, and humanitarian—of any book on the subject I have read... practical, challenging, and striking—a sound middle of the road approach between planned housing and private enterprise."—Virginia Kirkus

$5.00 At your bookstore or from

HARPER & BROTHERS, 49 E. 33rd St., New York 16

almost the whole of Strindberg, and it is at least a sine qua non of most of the intellectually fashionable writers from Dostoevski through Joyce to Kafka. Yet Shaw and also Shaw's characters tend to seem—perhaps, indeed, are—not fully human because they are all so harmless, so well adjusted, and, fundamentally, so serenely optimistic in temperament no matter what opinions they profess to hold.

As a whole the present production is perhaps the most thoroughly satisfactory which the American Repertory Company has offered. Visually it is very nearly perfect and a sheer delight. Almost as much can be said for the Androcles of Ernest Truex and a great deal, if not quite so much, for Philip Bourneuf's interpretation of the role of the emperor and for Victor Jory's Ferrovius. Undoubtedly, on the other hand, something more could have been made of parts less minor than they seem in certain performances, but the general spirit of gaiety is so well maintained that it does not matter too much. Sean O'Casey's "Pound on Demand," used as a curtain-raiser, is so excessively trivial a skit that I almost forgot to mention it.

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

IN MARCH, 1945, I published the important news of Victor's imminent resumption of production of a number of the important recordings that it had placed on the inactive list for the duration of the war. It was planning to do this because after more than two years of the Petrillo ban it had almost exhausted its reserve of new recordings; and the plan was dropped when the capitulation to Petrillo enabled the companies to resume recording, and all available plant, labor, and materials were devoted to pressing copies of the new recordings by the big-name, big-sale people.

Things like the Glyndebourne recordings of Mozart's operas therefore continued to be scarce; and recently there was a rumor that Victor intended not to resume pressing the European recordings at all, but only to import HMV copies, which are much more expensive. This rumor appeared to be confirmed by the HMV copies of scarce items that suddenly appeared in almost every shop window. I therefore made inquiries—one to Victor itself, which brought me the assurance that the rumor was false and that Victor would, at a time which it could not be definite about, resume production of its pre-war catalogue.

My other inquiry went to a dealer, who wrote that he suspected the rumor originated with the large shops which specialize in importing records from England. As far as he knew Victor had given no indication of planning to stop pressing from its European masters; on the contrary, "within the past year a large number of 'connoisseurs' items were restored to the catalogue and actually pressed and delivered in limited quantities for the first time in five years." These included Mozart operas, Bach's B minor Mass, and Budapest and Busch Quartet performances; and the new-style labels and albums indicated that the sets were not from past surplus but from new production.

He also gave me the encouraging news that in recent months "as much as three-quarters of our Victor shipments have been older items many of which have long been out of stock. Columbia, on the other hand, has emphasized new releases (and rotten ones at that) at the expense of older numbers. A few months ago Columbia sent out a special fall production list devoted mainly to things which dealers were already heavily stocked on. I understand the howl was pretty loud; and in the past two weeks Columbia has been turning up with newly pressed items such as Beecham's London Symphony, Gieseking's Mozart and Beethoven recordings, the Szegedi-Flesch Bach, etc. Quantities are not large yet, but they are the first influx in five years of some of the best things in the Columbia catalogue."

And finally he added some information about the new European recordings that some of us have been wondering about. Here again commitments to the big-name performers whom Victor and Columbia have under contract, combined with insufficient production facilities, stand in the way. "From fairly reliable sources I gather that Victor does not plan to issue any of the new British releases, except Beecham's, until their domestic artist relations are settled down. I was told that Victor definitely hopes to put out things like the French 'Pelléas,' the Italian operas, and British moderns as soon as it catches up on catalogue production. But Columbia shows no inclination to use any of the very fine things, especially chamber music, issued lately in England."

I might interrupt at this point to mention that when I inquired at Columbia a year ago whether there was any plan for rehabilitating fine recordings—like the one of Mozart's Concerto K. 491—that had deteriorated, I was told that the company's policy was to remake such recordings with the artists it had under contract. I mention this because it is part of the picture my dealer friend gives of the consequences of Columbia's "subservient artist policy," as he calls it. Thus, "Columbia has been going through the throes, apparently, of renewing the Kostelanetz-Pons contract, and its releases have been fouled up with that junk. This, plus a weirdly mistaken notion that Oscar Levant is a pianist, just about precluded the release of any first-rate Columbias for weeks. The Serkin and Lehmann records, when they have arrived, have been pitifully short in quantity."

I have the impression that Victor's artist policy has caused its releases to be fouled up with as much junk as Columbia's. And while American production facilities are devoted largely to junk, HMV is sending over its pressings of the good things—of which the English are consequently deprived—in order to get the needed dollar exchange.

On Victor's list of these importations I note the recording of Bach's "Goldberg Variations" that Landowska made in Europe a number of years ago, which is vastly superior to her new Victor recording—a finer performance on a finer-sounding harpsichord, and better recorded—and well worth the higher price. I note also the Cortot-Thibaud-Casals performance of Haydn's Trio in G Major, on two 10-inch records. But not, I notice, their performances of the Beethoven Opus 97 and Schubert's Opus 99. Is that in order not to lose Victor even a few sales of the inferior Rubinstein-Heifetz-Fuermann performances? And that reminds me to ask why Victor has never released its own recording of the Fuermann-Rupp performance of the two Beethoven sets of variations on Mozart's themes, which I know from test pressings to be two of the most marvelous ensemble performances ever put on records.

Read Your Share in the Coming Depression
by Stuart Chase
THIS MONTH MAGAZINE

January Issue Now on Sale
THIS MONTH Magazine - 247 Park Avenue
New York 17, N. Y.

Letters to the Editors

The Laski Trial

Dear Sirs: I attended the recent trial in the action brought by Harold Laski against the Newark Advertiser and South Notts Gazette, and it occurs to me that readers of The Nation might be interested in an account of the whole episode as it appeared to one observer. I shall try to set down the facts objectively, though my sympathies, political and personal, are frankly with Mr. Laski.

The incident which led to the suit occurred during the campaign preceding the General Election, when Mr. Laski spoke at Newark on June 12, 1945, for the Labor candidate, Air Vice-Marshal de Crespigny. The meeting was out of doors, in the market square, and it was a big enthusiastic one. About 1,500 people were there and no interruption occurred until the end. Just as the meeting was breaking up, a man stepped forward in the crowd and asked Mr. Laski two questions: Why had he evaded military service in the First World War, and why had he advocated violent revolution during the second? He quoted from two speeches, allegedly made in 1943, from the "Tory Speakers Handbook" issued for the election. Laski replied that the first accusation was untrue. He said that a Tory M. P., who had made the charge, had later offered him an unqualified open apology in the House of Commons. As to the second, Laski repudiated that in equally strong terms. What he had said, he told his questioner, was that unless serious popular grievances were remedied by legal means, 1789 and 1917 showed the danger of the people taking matters in their own hands and of a consequent drift to violence and revolution.

The events that followed suggested an interesting behind-the-scenes collaboration. On the Monday after the meeting the editor of the Daily Herald called Laski on the telephone, saying that a man named Carlton had written to the Nottingham Guardian of that day to the effect that he had been at the meeting and had been shocked to hear that the chairman of the Labor Party had said if "the party could not get its measures by fair means, they would get them by violent revolution." The editor also said that Beaverbrook's Daily Express was going to splash the story next day; and, sure enough, most of its front page next day was full of it. It was played up much the way the Zinoviev letter was in 1924, and the savings-bank scare in 1931. Laski then took out writs for libel against these papers, the letter-writer, the Newark Advertiser, and the London Evening Standard, which repeated, in worse form, what Beaverbrook's morning paper had said. The whole maneuver followed, and was clearly intended to support, Churchill's outrageous charge about a "Socialist Gestapo." By bringing suit Laski put a stop to these libelous tactics in the right-wing press for the duration of the campaign.

The trial began on November 26 this year before the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury. The defendants requested this, as a special jury consists of people who pay rates of more than £100 a year. Laski's counsel had asked to have all the actions tried together, since he thought it could be shown that a carefully organized conspiracy for election purposes had been organized. The Chief Justice refused this and granted the plea of the defendants to have the action against the Newark Advertiser tried first, though it was the last in point of time. Laski was cross-examined for two hours by the defense in an endeavor to show (1) that he had said he was in favor of revolution at the meeting, (2) that all his books preached the desirability of making a revolution in Britain, and (3) that he was generally an offensive character, disowned by the Labor Party. Ten witnesses, including the Air Vice-Marshal, swore that the plaintiff had never said the words attributed to him in the report. It was shown that the Newark Advertiser's own reporter had no such words in his shorthand report and, at the order of his editor, had put in the words written down by the questioner, a Tory journalist who writes for the Express, from recollection, hours after the meeting. They had one witness who thought he heard Laski speak the words and one who said that he mentioned revolution. Laski's counsel, in a brilliant closing speech, showed how the opposing counsel had torn words out of their context, and pointed up the astonishing fact that the editor of the accused newspaper had replaced his own shorthand reporter's account with a version fixed up by a professional Tory propagandist.

The judge summed up in a speech which sounded very correct but showed he was against Laski from the start. He never mentioned the alteration of the report or the relation of the questioner to the Tory candidate. He never discussed the evidence of Laski's witnesses. He told the jury that violence and revolution had clearly been mentioned. He referred them to Laski's writings, which had been quoted by the defense without their context, and said that the words used at the meeting, while not sufficient to sustain an imputation of treason, were certainly capable of suggesting that Laski was a man who made seditious writings and incited others to disorder. He then told the jury they must decide whether the report was true and accurate. The jury, after deliberating for forty minutes, found for the defendant with costs. This means that Laski will somehow have to meet costs in the neighborhood of twenty thousand pounds—an almost unheard-of amount.

Everyone I have talked to thinks the decision outrageous. Within a week hundreds of Labor supporters have sent money to a defense fund which Morgan Phillips, the secretary of the Labor Party, has opened to help Laski cover the costs. It is quite possible, however, that he will have to sell his house and the library he has spent his life building up.

The judge was once a Tory candidate, and apparently the jury agreed with his pretty obvious intention to hit the Labor Party through Laski in revenge for the Tory defeat in 1945. Special juries have been doing this kind of thing ever since the French Revolu-

THE WASHINGTON MERRY-GO-ROUND! Who's On It Now?

Revealed by ROBERT S. ALLEN, formerly of Pearson and Allen

VICTOR RIESEL, Guest Chairman • ROBERTS' Orchestra

SUNDAY, JAN. 5 — 8:30 P. M.

DANCING TO 1 P. M.

110 West
48 Street

Adm. $1.00
Tax Incl.

THE MODERN FORUM MEETS EVERY SUNDAY

Crossword Puzzle No. 193

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Game formerly known as "shuttlecock and battledore"
- 5 OGPU's predecessor
- 9 The logic of Aristotle
- 10 Where the French beast devours the German
- 11 It is spread to catch fish and crooks
- 12 Where law ends this begins, according to Pitt
- 13 In short, send out succor
- 15 Is sued for failure to find work
- 17 You may call Beatrice this, if you know her well
- 18 Played its part in old defense and modern attack
- 19 Sprite in the guise of a clergyman
- 22 Eat
- 25 A destructive insect
- 27 Don't ask for this in this famous New York store
- 28 Only way you can recall an oath
- 30 Rabbits whose ears stick out at right-angles
- 31 The bomber is its natural enemy
- 32 We all have a hand in it at some time
- 33 Gained her? But for loss of civil rights

DOWN

- 1 Made some beer for the children?
- 2 Erroneously supposed to be the time when canines are specially liable to rabies
- 3 Spells or turns

- 4 Ten set in principles
- 5 "But me - - - -," as Fielding said (2 and 4)
- 6 A Minister of Supply
- 7 No longer night or day then
- 8 A light gas
- 14 Turkish dynast
- 15 Two vowel-sounds pronounced as one
- 16 Yaffle
- 17 --- yourself first, then call in God, was Euripides advice
- 20 It's hell, that's what it is
- 21 Seaside resort in Dorset, England
- 23 Zulu spear
- 24 Fret over Ted
- 25 Haggard heroine
- 26 Seat vacated in favor of a spider, in the nursery rhyme
- 29 More than underdone

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 193

ACROSS:—1 DUMBSHOW; 5 PUTS UP; 10 CURRENT; 11 PARTING; 12 EXACTS; 14 LEGATION; 16 INJURED; 17 HALMA; 18 WHEN; 20 ERUPTED; 22 IDOL; 24 REVEL; 26 SECULAR; 29 ADDENDUM; 30 LEVITE; 32 OCARINA; 33 DALLIES; 34 NUDIST; 35 MEETINGS.

DOWN:—1 DOCKED; 2 MARIANA; 3 SEED-TIME; 4 OATH; 6 UNREAD; 7 SWINISH; 8 PAGANINI; 9 UPPER; 13 SNARLED; 14 LUMP SUM; 15 GENERAL; 19 RIGADOON; 21 DERELICT; 23 OLD HAND; 25 ELISION; 26 SNAILS; 27 CUBAN; 28 LENSES; 31 ADZE.

lution. But the sum of this particular verdict is that it was the pay-off for a Tory plot that failed to come off in 1945.

ARCHIBALD MCIVOR

London, December 12

[American friends of Harold Laski who would like to help defray the costs of the trial may send subscriptions to Morgan Phillips, treasurer of the Laski Fund, Transport House, Smith Square, London, S. W. 1. Checks drawn on American banks are now negotiable in the United Kingdom.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Wants Crane Documents

Dear Sirs: I am at present engaged in writing a thesis for the Sorbonne on Stephen Crane and the beginnings of realism in the American novel. May I ask any person possessing documents hitherto unpublished bearing on this subject kindly to communicate with me as soon as possible? I make the same appeal for material on W. H. Hudson. My New York address is: International House, 500 Riverside Drive.

GEORGES REMORDS

Paris, November 22

A German Peace Movement

Dear Sirs: Only a few people in the United States know that there has always existed in Germany a decent peace movement which tried very hard before World War II to convince and educate the German people that war is inconsistent with culture and civilization.

It will be of interest to all friends of the courageous German anti-militarists to learn that a respectable minority in Germany are trying again to organize a German peace movement to educate and influence the German people against any future rearmament and war. According to reports which have reached this country only lately, these people are in most urgent need of encouragement. I think it is in the interest of a future enduring peace to assist them. That is the reason why I appeal for encouragement to them. I know Americans with practical common sense will want to send parcels and letters to these anti-militarists. In this way we serve the next generation.

I shall be only too glad to let all those who want to answer my appeal have the addresses of worthy anti-militarists.

VEIT VALENTIN

Library of Congress

Washington, December 1

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 164

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 11, 1947

NUMBER 2

The Shape of Things

THE PRESIDENT'S PROCLAMATION ENDING hostilities has adroitly pulled one of the G. O. P.'s favorite planks from under it. During the campaign, Republicans pictured the Administration as clinging desperately to its war-time powers and boasted of their plans for ending this usurpation. So when Mr. Truman voluntarily surrendered such of those powers as were terminable at the official end of hostilities, Republicans were forced to applaud publicly, even though they could barely keep their smiles from becoming grimaces. One consequence of the President's action is that it brings Congress squarely up against certain problems which the majority might well have wished to ignore until a more strategically convenient hour. For instance, during the war, farmers were guaranteed price maintenance of their most important products at 90 per cent of parity for two full years after the end of hostilities. By making this date December 31, 1946, Mr. Truman insured the termination of that guaranty on December 31, 1948. The Republican majority in Congress will now be under pressure to legislate a new farm program before the next Presidential campaign, for if agricultural prices begin to slide as expected in the next twelve months, farmers will be increasingly intent on securing some alternative measure of price support. On the other hand, such support is likely to prove extremely costly unless accompanied by a system of stringent crop restriction. Consequently, the Republicans may find that they must either impose new controls on farming or jeopardize their fiscal program of budget balancing, debt reduction, and tax cuts.

✱

ANOTHER EMBARRASSING PROBLEM FOR THE G. O. P. is created by the automatic termination on July 1 of the special war-time excises imposed under the Revenue Act of 1943. Among the items affected will be the tax on admissions, reduced from 20 to 10 per cent; the cabaret tax, reduced from 20 to 5 per cent; taxes on jewelry, furs, cosmetics, and luggage, reduced from 20 to 10 per cent; and the distilled-spirits tax, reduced from $9 a gallon to $6. Other taxes to be diminished by various amounts include those on telephone and telegraph charges, transportation, and electric-light bulbs. It is estimated that as a result revenue for the next fiscal year will be reduced by about $1½ billion, which means that the Republicans have that much less to play with in concocting a tax-reduction program. This will probably prove the final blow to Representative Knutson's proposal for a 20 per cent "across the board" cut in income tax, the implications of which have already given the shivers to some of his more farsighted colleagues. Of course, Congress could pass a bill restoring these excise taxes, but that would not be a very popular move. In fact, sellers of furs, liquor, cosmetics, and so on are already agitating for repeal to be made effective before July 1, fearing that otherwise consumers will hold back their purchasing. Meanwhile, the question is being asked: if some taxes, many of them on luxury items, are to be slashed, why not those on such articles as business machines, electric, gas, and oil appliances, films and photographic apparatus, sporting goods, cigarettes, cigars, automobiles, tires, radios, and refrigerators, which were imposed or increased during the war under other statutes? That is a very pertinent question, for such hidden taxes are definitely regressive, bearing much harder on low incomes than on high. Their reduction should at least be given equal consideration with a reduction in income tax.

✱

THOSE WHO RELY ON NEWSPAPER HEADLINES as guides to political thought may have concluded that the primary function of the newly formed Americans for Democratic Action will be to combat the Communists. The truth is the contrary. The founders of the A. D. A. believe it necessary to exclude Communists in order to allow the new organization to perform its real function without interference. That function is to give the United States what it has lacked for many years—a broad and militant progressive movement unattached to any old-line party and free of the often constricting embrace of the Communists. Still in the throes of organization, the A. D. A., born of the five-year-old Union for Democratic Action, includes among its objectives an expansion of the New Deal program "to insure decent levels of health, nutrition, shelter, and education"; protection of civil liberties from both "concentrated wealth and overcentralized government"; support of the United Nations and of the American plan for international control of atomic

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	29
The Atomic Report	31
Peace for Palestine?	33
Notes for a New Year by Freda Kirchwey	33

ARTICLES

Republicans on the Hill by Wilbur H. Baldinger	34
This Brain for Hire by Joachim Joesten	36
The C. I. O. Southern Drive by A. G. Mezerik	38
In the Wind	40
The People's Front by Del Vayo	41
Soviet Politics in Germany by Joel Carmichael	42
Students Talk It Over by John Curtis Frankel	46
In One Ear by Lou Frankel	46

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

A Chancellor at Dachau by Alfred Werner	47
Innocence. A Poem by Arthur Mizener	47
Music and Society by Robert E. Garis	48
The People's Attorney by H. David Davis	48
Rimbaud in Exile by René Blanc-Roos	49
Hurry Up Please Its Spinach by Robert Bendiner	50
The Queen and Columbus by Klaus Mann	51
Art by Clement Greenberg	53
Music by B. H. Haggin	54

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 194 by Jack Barrett	55
--	----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor Literary Editor
J. King Gordon Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart
Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

energy; and steps "to raise standards of living and support civil and political freedoms everywhere." An ear even slightly attuned to political formulations will perceive marked divergences here from the aims of the Progressive Citizens of America, whose formation we noted in these columns last week. Moreover, while Henry Wallace, addressing the P. C. A., disavowed the use of Russian standards as a guide for American liberals, that organization clearly accepts the tactical principle of the Popular Front. Those liberals who believe this principle to be a delusion will be immensely heartened by the creation of an organization without Communists in which are represented both wings of the labor movement and such leaders as Chester Bowles, Wilson Wyatt, Leon Henderson, Eleanor Roosevelt, and Reinhold Niebuhr, to name only a few of the A. D. A.'s guiding spirits. The creation of these two major organizations presents progressives with a choice that calls for some hard thinking. We propose in the next issue of The Nation to deal more fully with the implications of this choice.

✱

FILMING "THE CAPTAIN FROM CASTILE" presented one difficulty to Twentieth Century-Fox: the villain of the novel is a priest of the Inquisition, and a cruel and corrupt one to boot. The Legion of Decency, in its usual compelling tones, warned the producers that the novel was not acceptable to the church because of its violation of historical truth: it had not made it clear that the Inquisition "was aimed at the crypto-Jews, who became Catholic converts for the purpose of subverting Catholic thought." (In just this way, Eisenstein's "Ivan the Terrible" has been condemned by the Soviet Union for violating historical truth—that is, it did not present Ivan as a "progressive statesman.") Two scripts had to be torn up, but the third was satisfactory: in it, the villainous priest appears briefly, does not accept bribes, and is not cruel. The Inquisition, too, is "touched on only briefly and fleetingly." How odd that the Legion of Decency should feel that it had to hush up something so congenial to the temper of our age as an Inquisition! If the Legion had as much imagination as it has power, we should before long be admitting Bing Crosby's finest impersonation, that of Torquemada in Warner Brothers' sensational epic of the Inquisition, "The Good Shepherd."

✱

LAST WEEK, WE URGED THE AVOIDANCE OF over-hasty legislative efforts to deal with the portal-to-portal issue. Since then, two Republican Congressmen have provided prime examples of the kind of thing we feared. Representative Knutson has proposed to levy a 100 per cent "windfall tax" on any money the workers may collect in portal suits; Representative Clare Hoffman of Michigan has introduced a bill amending the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 retroactively so as to wipe out all portal-to-portal claims. In addition, Mr. Hoffman proposes to end the provisions in the act for liquidated damages in the case of violations, so that employers who deliberately ignored minimum standards would be able to go on cheating their workers without fear of punishment. Finally, the Hoffman bill provides a definition of "work week" which excludes "time going to or from work, changing clothing, putting on aprons or overalls, taping or greasing arms, putting on finger cots, preparing equipment for productive work, turning on switches for lighter machinery, opening windows or assembling or sharpening tools, or time spent in preparation for work which is not time actually consumed in productive work." We do not envy the judges who will have to make the fine distinction between preparations for productive work and actual productive work if this bill is passed. But in any case, the definition is a ridiculous one and does not correspond to the facts of industrial life, which shows that once a man enters his employer's plant he is under orders and should therefore be on paid time. Apart from this feature, the bill stands condemned, just as the Knutson proposal does, by its attempt to destroy property rights without due process. Many lawyers believe that the Supreme Court would find it unconstitutional on these grounds. If it did not, all property owners would have cause for alarm, for the precedent created could have much wider application.

✱

THE ERA OF PRIVATE PROFIT IN BRITISH COAL mines has ended. On New Year's Day the flag of the National Coal Board was hoisted at every pit-head, and the miners went to their jobs as citizens working for their fellow-citizens. Ironically enough, at the very moment of this transformation, Britain was faced by an acute shortage of coal, bringing production in some industrial plants to a halt and forcing the authorities to consider the imposition of a semi-blackout. British critics of the Labor government are trying to link the crisis to public ownership, though nothing is more certain than that it would have arrived sooner, and proved more severe, if the old regime had remained. Since the Nationalization bill became law in the early summer, there has, in fact, been a marked improvement in the miners' morale. Recruits for the industry have been coming forward in greater numbers, absenteeism is sharply down, and production is rising steadily. In January, 1946, output averaged 3,250,000 tons per week; in the third week of December it was 4,000,000 tons, and although there was a much-advertised Christmas slump, the record of the holiday week was far better than in 1945. The current shortage is the result of increased demand as much as of decreased supply. Under conditions of full employment, British industrial-fuel requirements are higher than before the war, while improvements in the standard of living have raised consumption of electric power 75 per cent above the pre-war level. Full correction of this unbalanced supply-demand situation can be achieved only when the National Coal Board completes the reorganization of the industry and vastly increases its mechanization. Such long-range aids to efficiency will take time, but it will be surprising if greater output does not soon result from reduced friction between men and management and the desire of the miners to forward the success of a reform they have long passionately advocated.

✱

THE CURIOUS AMERICAN RELISH FOR converting its sports into Big Business is illuminated by recent bulletins and communiques about the Biggest Deer Hunting Season in History. Deer hunting is really big business in Michigan, where the current season represented an investment of nearly $75,000,000 as 325,000 hunters clogged three-lane highways leading to the Upper Peninsula. According to sources which The Nation considers unimpeachable, the self-respecting deer hunter does not dare venture into the woods nowadays without a minimum investment of $130 in equipment: rifle, $65; 20 rounds of ammunition, $1.80; rifle cleaning kit, $2.50; knife, $2; compass, $2; flashlight, $1.65; match box, 75 cents; long underwear, $5; cap, $1.50; shirt, $6; coat, $15; trousers, $11; socks, $2; boots (rubber), $8; boots (leather) $15; gloves, $2. If a hunter is lucky enough to kill a deer; and escape being shot himself, it costs him $50 to have the head mounted. While deer hunters actually do kill deer—24,000 this season in Maine—they seem to be incredibly reckless shots. In fact, the mortality rate among deer hunters must be considerably higher than that for combat troops in the war.

The Atomic Report

THE first report of the Atomic Energy Commission, which was adopted on December 30, 1946, may turn out to be the most important achievement of any United Nations body. Into it have gone six and a half months of hard work by representatives of twelve nations—scientists, engineers, policy makers. In the course of its labors the commission developed a technique of co-operative research, discussion, and formulation of results that might well be taken as a model for other U. N. committees engaged in similar tasks. The lessons learned should be of particular benefit in working out plans for wider disarmament and arms control called for by the General Assembly resolution of December 14.

The commission cut to the minimum the showy debates which in practice have always tended to emphasize differences between the main power blocs and frustrate real achievement. Instead, it carried on most of its deliberations in a working committee where scientists and policy makers could examine problems on their own merits and not in the frame of reference of narrow national interests. It is true that complete agreement was not reached; the report was adopted by ten assenting votes with Poland and the Soviet Union abstaining. But in the course of the commission's work many important aspects of atomic energy were investigated, the feasibility of a system of control established, the necessary safeguards against the illegal use of atomic energy outlined, and vital elements in a system of international management, control, and inspection mapped out in some detail.

The effectiveness of the commission's method was demonstrated during the slight crisis that developed out of Mr. Baruch's attempt to force an immediate vote on a resolution embodying the essential characteristics of the original American plan. The opposition to this "stand-up-and-be-counted" ultimatum did not come primarily from the Soviet Union but from nations which had no quarrel with the American plan or even with the American position on the veto. General McNaughton, leader of the Canadian delegation, accepting the principles on which the Baruch resolution was based, was anxious to give every member of the commission full opportunity to examine every proposal on which the commission took positive action. In this stand he was backed by the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, and France, nations particularly concerned in the possible development of an irreparable split between the United States and the Soviet Union. As the result of sending the Baruch proposal to the working committee, a number of important amendments were incorporated, and the final recommendations of the commission took into account the arms resolution of the U. N. Assembly.

It is unfortunate that the representative of the Soviet Union deliberately boycotted these final discussions. Had he not done so, his objections, entered in the final meeting of the commission, might have had some validity. As it is, he is in the curious position of urging that at some future time the Baruch plan be examined item by item when this was precisely the opportunity provided him by the Canadian amendment. It was in the working committee that Mr. Gromyko might have pointed out how the American proposal conflicted with the terms of the Charter, the Assembly resolution, and the original Soviet proposal of June 19, 1946. He might have argued that the elimination of the veto contradicts the letter and the spirit of the Charter. But in that case, so does Mr. Molotov's statement that in the day-to-day operations of an international inspection body the veto must not operate. And the Assembly resolution clearly states that the "international system" set up for the control of atomic weapons and other weapons of mass destruction will operate through "special organs, which special organs shall derive their powers and status from the convention or conventions under which they are established." The same convention or conventions—which must carry the unanimous assent of the great powers—could presumably provide for the elimination of the veto in the case of sanctions for proved violations (for which definite penalties have already been prescribed). Moreover, whatever legalistic case Mr. Gromyko might be able to prove, he failed completely to meet the commission's main conclusion that the security of any nation against the illegal use of atomic weapons must rest upon the certainty that no nation can violate the basic convention with impunity.

But the highlighting of the veto issue has failed to illuminate the actual differences between the point of view expressed in the atomic report and that held by the Soviet representatives. As a matter of fact, six and a half months' discussion has not brought out what the Russians really want. They have insisted that a convention to outlaw atomic weapons is a prerequisite of any scheme of atomic control. In the matter of the enforcement of such a convention they remain vague. At the outset, Mr. Gromyko seemed to insist that the enforcement could be carried out through national organs and that an international system would violate the rights of sovereignty. This stand appears to have been modified by Mr. Molotov in the disarmament discussions before the Assembly, when he came out for an international control agency. But what is to be the nature of this international agency? Is it simply to be a subordinate adjunct to the Security Council, subject to the latter's veto? Will it have to receive special mandate from the Security Council to engage in any specific task of inspection? Will it be intrusted only with powers of inspection and be denied those larger powers of ownership and management of atomic-energy installations which, in the Atomic Energy report, are regarded as necessary safeguards? No Russian representative has made himself clear on these points.

As for the American position and that shared by the great majority of members of the commission, there is no objection to the convention outlawing atomic weapons. In fact, such a convention is at the very heart of the commission's proposal. But it is firmly held that such a convention would be absolutely worthless without accompanying and simultaneous safeguards.

One cannot emphasize too strongly that this is an interim report. The section on safeguards appears not to have had the same detailed study as the scientific and technical section, and the report itself calls attention to the magnitude of the unfinished task. The Security Council could do no better than gratefully acknowledge the document as a report on progress and tell the Commission to keep up the good work. When the Commission reassembles after its recess, it will miss the showmanship and drive of Mr. Baruch, whose resignation has just been handed to the President. But no matter who succeeds him —Senator Austin would be an improvement on Mr. Baruch—in the American delegation there are men of scientific and technical competence, political understanding, and international good will who will expertly assist in devising a system of international control that may turn out to be the first institution of world government.

Peace for Palestine?

ON JANUARY 1 the British government unofficially announced that it was prepared to give serious consideration to any responsible proposal calling for the creation of separate, independent Jewish and Arab states in Palestine. This was not a new idea, for partition has twice been put forward, once in the Peel report issued ten years ago and recently in the quite unrealistic and discredited Morrison-Grady plan. It is known, too, that in conference with Dr. Weizmann and other Zionist leaders, shortly before the twenty-second World Zionist Conference just concluded, London had privately discussed the proposal made by the Jewish Agency in August, 1946, calling for partition on a basis which would make possible a "viable Jewish state." However, the present statement follows closely upon the decision of the Basel conference not to participate in further negotiations unless the situation changed, and so may be regarded as an effort to produce such a change. For overcautious as it is, Mr. Creech Jones's communication does seem to imply some sort of commitment to the idea of the "viable state."

It would seem that London has had its eye upon the realities that lay behind the sensational and rather misleading debates in Basel. For the American resolution rejecting Dr. Weizmann's conciliatory policies, while it was passed by a narrow margin, did no more than instruct future negotiators to refer any new proposals to the Zionist Executive for acceptance or rejection. Since it is known that fourteen out of nineteen members of the Executive favor a partition plan satisfying the essential territorial and political demands of the Jews, the defeat of the Weizmann position was more apparent than real. There is reason to hope that the Colonial Secretary had this fact in mind when he made his conciliatory statement.

The excessive caution of the London announcement was obviously due to a fear that the Arabs would instantly decline to enter negotiations. The Arab high command in Palestine, still insisting on its right to nominate the Grand Mufti as a delegate, has indeed declared that it will not attend the London conference if partition is to be discussed, and the Cairo leaders have supported this ultimatum. In reality, therefore, London for the first time has challenged the Arab movement and intimated that it will, under certain conditions, seek to persuade or compel a change in Arab opinion. If that is so, we believe it would have been wiser to give the Zionist movement a clear guaranty that full statehood within an agreed area would be quickly granted. To do so would certainly provoke trouble; yet the support of the majority of Zionist opinion and the approval of civilized people throughout the world should be more than sufficient compensation. And a resolute decision to set up a separate Arab state in Palestine would have a powerful appeal for the moderate section of Arab opinion and might conceivably reduce the time and intensity of the resistance.

The new outburst of violence on the part of the terrorists has been countered, inevitably, by stern measures of repression. Non-fraternization orders have gone out to British troops and searches and arrests have increased. The talks between the High Commissioner for Palestine, Sir Archibald Cunningham, and Mr. Bevin are sure to be influenced by these events. Observers fear they may result in decisions which will upset rising hopes for an agreed compromise solution. Certainly, the insistence of the British that the Jewish Agency itself must assume responsibility for curbing the terrorists is a bad omen. The Agency cannot act as long as it is without authority; nor can the Haganah be expected to put down the Irgun and Stern Gang by force when its own organization is outlawed and its arms confiscated. The Haganah has, it is true, threatened to "take action" unless the terrorists quit their attacks. That such action would go so far as civil war is unthinkable, however, unless a complete reversal of British policy gives power as well as responsibility to the Jewish agencies of government and defense.

Notes for a New Year

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

AS I WRITE, the year is only four days old. I have looked it over carefully and without enthusiasm. The best thing I have noticed is that the angle formed by the sun's position at noon and the points on the horizon where it rises and sets is spreading. Not enough to waste many lines on, but enough to cause a modest sense of expansion around the heart. Man's hope may be better measured by that widening arc along the earth's edge than by any of the dubious prognoses of better days you see listed in the morning paper.

THE year 1947 finds me increasingly weary of that old, that noble word liberalism. You meet it these days in all kinds of places, including the pages of The Nation. The new New Republic acts as if it were a recent, rather exciting discovery of Henry Wallace's. For half a generation or so the word had fallen on bad times and was generally used as a rather derisive epithet, modified by the adjective wishy-washy; but now it has won a new lease of life and I think I know why. Liberalism has become a charm, worn outside the shirt on the left side, to ward off communism and other forms of political evil. I don't believe in charms.

A California friend, speaking at The Nation dinner in Los Angeles, said that a liberal was a radical with a wife and two children. The definition is too cynical. Anyhow, the word brings quite different images to my mind. When I think of a liberal I am apt to see an old gentleman walking carefully along the top of a high, narrow fence, a nervous little smile on his face, his eyes fixed on the skyline. Either that, or I see him standing with one leg planted on either side of a sharp, jagged issue. From time to time, he topples over on his face and is neatly sliced into two factions.

But perhaps I am wrong. In South America, radical parties are nearly always reactionary. Here, who knows, the various new liberal parties and groups may grow up to be radical. It would be against history, but I hope so.

HAVING come out recently in support of the positive and forward-looking in political action, may I put in a dialectical word for the nasty, the negative, the downright destructive? I favor both—ideological blueprints and Bren guns, but we're going to fool ourselves again if we simply concentrate on blueprints while the other side demolishes our few hard-won positions.

I firmly predict that Republican counsels of moderation, however shrewd politically, are soon going to be overwhelmed by the demands of the storm troops of the right. Everything will be heaped together and attacked in one lot—liberals, Communists, foreigners, New Deal legislation, labor, Russia. Perhaps Robert A. Taft, too, unless he looks sharp.

It is well to recognize this in advance, because there won't be much time to prepare when the saturation bombing begins. What we must do is to fight back, beginning now. After all, the first job of an opposition is to oppose. And one of the best short-term reasons for a positive program is that you can oppose with greater effect if you know what you'd like to do in case you win.

WHILE I'm in the mood, I have another prediction for 1947—a sequel to the one above. I predict that the Communists and their various allies and friends, taking note of the threatening signs of the times, are going to become cooperative to the point of embarrassing their liberal opponents. They may not insist on joining the Liberal party or editing the New Leader, but they will do their best to convince the amorphous American left of center that they are amiable, trustworthy traveling companions. I predict that they will be firmly rebuffed, at least in the earlier stages of the Great Reaction; but they are going to be an embarrassment just the same, with their habit of doing first and more energetically a lot of things the rest of us are sure we could do better but haven't quite got around to.

My predictions, by the way, like Pearson's and Winchell's, are based on strictly inside information, namely, information from inside the oracle's head.

Oil and Power—

Keith Hutchison's page, Everybody's Business, has been omitted from this issue. Next week Mr. Hutchison will write about the Anglo-American oil cartel now being perfected for exploitation of the huge petroleum resources of the Middle East.

Republicans on the Hill

BY WILBUR H. BALDINGER

Washington, January 6

AFTER fourteen years the center of government gravity has shifted from 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue to the Capitol. The White House is no longer the important news beat for the reporting of United States history. The Hill is the place, and the man to watch is not the President but a Republican named Taft, or Martin, or even Knutson.

In other years a new session of Congress was not really convened until the pitch came up from the White House. Now it hardly matters what Harry Truman says, except for the record, in his three messages this week to the Eightieth Congress. The Republicans are fully in charge of their unaccustomed job of governing, and they have made it clear that they want no advice from the Administration. What they want is cooperation, meaning that the President should keep out of their way while they wash away the sins of the New Deal.

The state-of-the-union message which Mr. Truman took to Congress today was even-tempered, conciliatory, and punctuated with wistful hopes that "in our hands, yours and mine joined together," the Legislature and the Administration "can work together." The President mildly asked for the continuing development of his policies, domestic and foreign, whose goal, he said, was prosperity and peace. This message was nothing like last year's in which he essayed a bold post-war program in a score of social sectors. That program had already been junked; today he simply mentioned his former objectives as things that were still on the nation's agenda.

Caricature by Eckhardt

Representative Knutson

With a hundred anti-labor bills in prospect on the Hill, the President cautioned Congress not to press "punitive legislation" against "a few labor leaders." His four-point labor-management proposals offered few specifics except the organization of a temporary joint commission of the Senate, House, public, management, and labor to survey the field and come up, especially, with some answer to "nation-wide strikes in vital industries affecting the public interest." Such a survey had been suggested before by the President; it was unlikely that the Republicans would take the renewed suggestion any more kindly now.

The shape of things to come was obscured at the opening of Congress last week by the show in the Senate over a Mississippi obscenity. (A hopeful result of those proceedings is that it is not currently necessary to give Theodore G. Bilbo the dignity of the prefix of Senator.) But beyond the Bilbo headlines there was plenty to indicate that the Republicans, in picking up where they left off in 1933, were starting 1947 as of that Democratic date.

While the post-war world watched and rightly worried, the most powerful parliament was preparing a program in which a bi-partisan foreign policy was to be maintained politically but scarcely economically, and in which domestic policy was to be keyed to a balanced budget. Senator Robert A. Taft, ablest and most powerful Republican on the Hill, laid out these party approaches in a radio speech after a day laudably spent keeping Bilbo from his seat. The six-foot-one Ohioan, brain center of the statesmen at the right of the Senate aisle, gave assurance that "our political policy throughout the world" would be continued along lines which Arthur H. Vandenberg of Michigan, now president pro tem of the chamber, had helped Secretary of State James F. Byrnes draw.

But the inseparable economics of foreign policy will evidently undergo isolationist weakening. Taft said ominously that "reasonable assistance" to the rest of the world, instead of foreign rehabilitation loans, and "reasonable tariffs," instead of reciprocal-trade agreements, were in the Republican book. The interpretation of "reasonable" by Republicans who opposed Bretton Woods and British loan agreements and who yearn for Smoot-Hawley tariff days will be something to make the Administration—and foreign countries—shudder.

For domestic fare Taft offered the nation hope for emergency housing in a revised Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill. (But he plans to cut it up in sections, giving the real-estate lobby a clear chance to sabotage a part at a time, particularly that part which would subsidize a half-million homes for low-income families.) Taft said there ought to be federal aid for health and education, but nothing like the Murray-Wagner-Dingell bill. He promised a "just-to-all" set of new labor laws, adding in an offhand manner that they might ban such offenses as closed shops and industry-wide bargaining.

Joseph W. Martin, the plodding, bulky publisher of North Attleboro, Massachusetts, who jubilantly took up the Speaker's gavel in the flood-lit festive Republican House, made his party's domestic course even plainer. In his own state-of-the-union message, which asked for "cooperation" by all hands but did not contain a single reference to the Chief Executive, Martin observed by way of preamble that the world "lies crushed, broken, and in waste." He thanked God, however, that "the beacon of freedom and security . . . still burns brightly in the United States of America, sending its gleams of hope to the furthestmost points of the world." In the next paragraph Martin described the desperate domestic situation which the Republicans will solve for the comfort of the rest of the world: "Here at home we face grave and pressing problems. The debt into which this nation has been plunged is of such magnitude it cannot be paid off in more than a century. Our people are bowed down under a burden of taxation which is well-nigh intolerable."

Symbolically, House Resolution No. 1 in the Eightieth Congress was offered by Harold Knutson, the Minnesota Representative who has chafed for years to tear down the Democrats' tax structure and now has his big chance as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. The most apt local comment on Knutson's tax-cutting resolution was a Herblock cartoon in the Washington Post captioned "Something for Everybody!" Knutson was tossing a huge money bag to a well-stuffed upper-income bracketeer holding a bushel basket. A little guy in the lower brackets held out his hat for a single coin.

Knutson proposed to cut the government's income by more than $3,400,000,000, through a 20 per cent income-tax slash applicable to all incomes except those above $302,000, whose tax would be cut only 10 per cent. Earlier, in a tax seminar for reporters, Knutson said there were no immediate plans for further reductions in corporation taxes. He thought Congress had done enough for corporations for the present. This was taken to be proof of Knutson's restraint in the field of government economics.

Caricature by Seligson

Senator Taft

President Truman meanwhile was superintending the rewriting of his various messages—on the state of the union, on the report of his Council of Economic Advisers, and on the budget. The budget message was expected to be so long and exhaustive that its reading would take a working day in the Capitol. But from appearances on the Hill the three messages would be little more than footnotes in the history of the Eightieth Congress as written by the Republicans. This Congress is their property, and they intend to administer it as such.

The Senate, however, has one gold sticker on its first report card. Bilbo is out, and it looks as if he would not be back—or if he does come back, as if he wouldn't get in. A memory that opening-day visitors in the crowded Senate galleries will not lose is that of Bilbo standing in the aisle, his head bowed, piously mumbling the Lord's Prayer in concert with the chaplain: "... deliver us from evil." The Senate gave a needed assist.

This Brain for Hire

BY JOACHIM JOESTEN

MEMO to a would-be war criminal: If you enjoy mass murder, but also treasure your skin, be a scientist, son. It's the only way, nowadays, of getting away with murder.

It isn't safe any longer to be a warmongering politician. If you lose, they'll hang you. If you are a general and lose, they'll shoot you. If you are an industrialist, you'll go to jail. But if you are a scientist, you will be honored, regardless of who wins. Your enemies will coddle you, and compete for you, no matter how many of your countrymen you may have killed. You may even get the Nobel Prize. (Warning: Medicine isn't safe; you might be charged with sadistic experiments. Be sure to pick a nice, clean, safe job such as atom bombs or stratosphere rockets.)

You think I'm kidding? Then read and ponder the story of what became of the Nazi scientists.

In the climactic phase of the war Hitler had at his disposal what was probably the greatest pool of scientific and technical knowledge ever assembled in a single country. Thousands of nuclear physicists, rocket constructors, experts on ballistics, supersonic aerodynamics, jet propulsion, poison gas, were working for him. What he lacked was the capacity to make the right judgment as to which of the newfangled weapons was most likely to win the war at one stroke and therefore should be given top priority. He stunted the atomic scientists, allowing them only a measly $7,500,000 to spend during the war, and backed the rocket builders to the tune of $500,000,000.

The two principal nerve-centers of the Nazi scientific war machine were the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute in Berlin and the Peenemünde Experimental Station, where the V-2 rockets were hatched. These two institutions employed several thousand scientists and technicians; in the first, the emphasis was on theory, in the second on application.

The Kaiser Wilhelm Institute had two principal departments—the Institute for Physics, headed by Professor Werner Heisenberg, who had won the Nobel Prize, and the Institute for Chemistry, headed by Professor Otto Hahn. Both were eminent nuclear physicists, but the honor of being Germany's top atomic scientist passed to Hahn in January, 1939, when he discovered, in collaboration with Dr. Fritz Strassmann, the secret of uranium fission that started the world race for the atomic bomb. Hahn, who is now sixty-eight, and Heisenberg, who is forty-five, were both Nazi Party members, but Hahn has been given credit for being lukewarm in his political views since he long collaborated with Dr. Lise Meitner, the Jewish woman scientist who was instrumental in bringing Hahn's discovery to the attention of American scientists.

Top dog at Peenemünde was Dr. Werther von Braun, now forty-four, who invented the deadly V-2. Under Braun's management 3,600 of the winged monsters were made and launched at Peenemünde. He was an active Nazi.

Hahn, Heisenberg, von Braun, and scores of other Nazi scientists were all in the mandatory-arrest categories fixed by the Allies before Germany's surrender. Indeed, at the hour of the collapse they were eagerly hunted down by special pursuit teams composed, in the case of the United States army, of commando troops and War Department scientists. The latter, thirty eagle-eyed professors led by Dr. Samuel A. Goudsmit of the University of Michigan, formed the so-called ALSOS mission. (Alsos is a Greek word which means "Groves." Get the idea?)

JOACHIM JOESTEN is a journalist and author who has been contributing articles on international affairs to The Nation since 1935. He has just finished a new book which he expects to call "Germany on the Rebound."

By the time ALSOS went into action the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute and its personnel had been evacuated from Berlin to the little town of Tailfingen in southern Württemberg. The town was occupied by the French First Army in mid-April, 1945, but before the surprised Frenchmen knew what was going on, an ALSOS team from General Patch's Seventh Army, operating a little farther north, had appeared on the scene and nabbed Professor Hahn, along with some of his colleagues. Professor Heisenberg, the second most-wanted scientist, was not there, having established his headquarters in Copenhagen.

After his capture by the Americans Hahn vanished into the limbo of atomic secrecy. A few weeks later, after the liberation of Copenhagen, he was joined by his colleague Heisenberg. All inquiries about their whereabouts and fate were answered with shrugs and head-shakings. Insistent reporters were told, "Ask General Groves" (head of the Manhattan Project), which was tantamount to "Try to get past Cerberus."

Hahn, Heisenberg, and the others did not fare badly at the hands of their American captors. They were not maltreated; they were not lodged in a jail; they were not even held for trial before a war-crimes tribunal or a German denazification court. They were merely kept out of circulation for a few months while the American army prepared to drop the bomb on Hiroshima.

Hunted by the sleuths of the world press in the United States, France, Belgium, and other countries, the two scientists lived peacefully on a farm near London. Then late in January, 1946, they were returned to Germany. For the past few months they have been living in complete freedom in the university town of Göttingen, in the British zone. With them are a number of other well-known German atom scientists—namely, Max von Laue, Walter Gerlach, C. T. von Weizsäcker, Karl Wirtz, Erich Bagge, and Horst Korsching, all former members of the Kaiser Wilhelm Physics Institute.

That citadel of Germany's militarized science has been abolished by the Allied Control Council, and Germans have been forbidden to engage in any kind of war research. Law No. 25, which went into effect on May 7, 1946, specifically prohibits the study of applied nuclear physics, applied aerodynamics, rocket propulsion, jet propulsion, gas turbine engines, radar, under-water sounding devices, electric coding and decoding equipment, ship design, and the remote control of aircraft.

Nevertheless, Professors Hahn and Heisenberg, with their entourage of atom scientists, have just been granted permission by the British Military Government to continue their work at Göttingen, where they have founded the "Max Planck Society," named after the eighty-nine-year-old "father of German physics." Naturally their activities have only peaceful purposes, but who is going to draw the line, and where? Heisenberg now heads the "Department for Cosmic Rays" of the Max Planck Society.

That Hahn and his associates are now working for the British was clearly brought out in a United Press dispatch from Göttingen of November 2, which reported that Hahn had threatened to discontinue his research unless the British military authorities would let him go to Stockholm to receive the Nobel prize for chemistry awarded him in 1944. He got what he wanted and made the trip in December.

* Outside of Germany the edicts of the Allied Control Council have only limited effect, and today between two and three thousand German scientists are actively engaged not only in war research but in the actual development of formidable war weapons. They have been hired—in a few cases the word "drafted" would perhaps be more appropriate—by the United States, Britain, France, and Russia. If a larger number of them—and the more prominent ones—are at work in the Western countries than in the Soviet Union, the reason is simply that Nazi professors preferred to be in the western part of the Reich when the time for surrender approached.

The United States, which is long on atomic but short on rocket talent, took the pick of the German experts on guided missiles. Dr. von Braun, whom G. I.'s interrupted in the middle of the absorbing job of constructing a 100-ton rocket designed to deliver a "pay load" of six tons of explosives to our East Coast cities, is now employed by the Army Ordnance Corps at Fort Bliss, Texas. With Dr. Ernst Steinhoff, developer of V-2 remote controls, and Dr. Martin Schilling, he took a prominent part in the rocket tests conducted in December at White Sands, New Mexico.

Dr. Rudolf Hermann, former director of the Peenemünde Institute for Supersonic Aerodynamics and Ballistics, is one of eighty-six German scientists now working at the aeronautical laboratories at Wright Field, Ohio. Among the others are Dr. Alexander Lippisch, of the Messerschmitt Aircraft Works, who designed the Me-163, the only rocket fighter that saw combat service.

In all some 270 German war scientists, mostly rocket and aircraft specialists, are now at work in various parts of the United States, and the army plans to bring in at least 730 more in the near future. The hush-hush which surrounded the arrival of the first hundred German scientists, headed by von Braun, late in 1945, has been abandoned; the identity of the ex-Nazis working at Fort Bliss and Wright Field is a matter of public record, and the army even proudly announces that it hopes to save $750,000,000 in basic research by using the know-how acquired from Hitler's former minions.

The pay which Braun, Hermann, and company draw from the army is not high by American standards—from $2.20 a day for the small fry to $11 a day for the big shots, plus $6 a day for living expenses—but a much more alluring reward is dangled before the Nazi scientists. If they behave well—and why shouldn't they, now that the war is over?—they will be permitted eventually to take out citizenship papers. No one, apparently, finds anything incongruous in the idea that the men who spread death and disaster in London and Antwerp, and worked feverishly to do the same to American cities, will one day be United States citizens.

The British have fifty-six German scientists working for them in England, besides the Hahn-Heisenberg group in Germany. Most of the Germans in England are at the Royal Aircraft establishment at Farnborough, Hampshire, where they are engaged in aerodynamics, jet propulsion, helicopter development, thermodynamics, and related matters. Ten are employed at the guided-projectiles center at Westcott, Buckinghamshire; five turbine scientists work at Newcastle-on-Tyne. All receive the same salaries as British scientists and will be permitted to stay in the country if they make good.

Russia, where atomic research has an A-1 priority, has picked up all the German nuclear brains it could find in its zone or attract from the other zones. Since the fall of 1945 two groups of German scientists have been installed in tourist hotels on the eastern shore of the Black Sea. In one are the top-ranking physicists Professor Max Steenbeck, Gustav Hertz, and Fritz Vollmer. The other is headed by Baron Manfred von Ardenne, who used to operate his private laboratory in Nazi Germany; he is now building a cyclotron for the Russians. Two former associates of the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute, Peter Thiessen and Christian L. Develogua, have also been reported in Russia. Among the lesser lights in von Ardenne's group are Kurt Mie and Karl Bernhardt. The average salary offered these scientists by the Soviet government is said to be 2,000 rubles a month, or $500 at the official rate. The latest well-known German scientist to take a job in Russia is the physicist Wilhelm Burkhardt, who went to Moscow in October.

France has had to content itself with the crumbs from Germany's scientific table. No really big name is known to have taken service in France, but a recent Reuters report stated that 500 German ballistics experts had arrived at the military airfield of St. Raphael to work on rocket weapons.

The C. I. O. Southern Drive

BY A. G. MEZERIK

Atlanta, January 2

EVERY newspaperman along about last June was busily predicting that the C. I. O. drive to unionize the South would be a great headline maker. "Organizers driven out of Harlan County," "tar and feathers in Mississippi," "union representatives jailed in the Carolinas"—these were the very least of the expected sensations. More than a few editors and commentators foresaw killings. Instead, a dull series of collective-bargaining elections have been reported, with only now and then a spicier item about a beating. Many persons have assumed therefore that the widely heralded drive has been a fizzle. But the results, not headlines, pay off. Judged by the statistics at hand—the number of bargaining elections won, the number of union recruits enlisted—the drive to unionize the South is well on its way to success.

By December 15 more than 290 victories in National Labor Relations Board elections had been chalked up since the drive began. The biggest plants, such as the great atomic-energy plant of Carbide and Carbon Chemicals Corporation at Oak Ridge, are signing agreements, which indicates that the fruits of midsummer organizing are now being harvested and that the entire campaign is picking up momentum. Only fifty-four elections have been lost by the C. I. O.

Moreover, the loss of an election does not remain a permanent entry on the red-ink side of the C. I. O.'s ledger. Last spring employees of the Goodyear Rubber plant at Clearwater voted against C. I. O. representation. But the drive organizers had only just begun to fight. And on October 4 there was another election, with the result that Goodyear's 1,345 employees are now members of the United Textile Workers of the C. I. O. This may not seem spectacular; yet the gains are so sizable that they exceed the hopes of the veteran organizers, Van Bittner and Sherman Dalrymple, who head the drive. The younger organizers expected more, and because they have poured so much dynamic energy into each individual organizing effort, believe they should have achieved more. Objectively considered, however, it stacks up surprisingly well, in view of the traditions and circumstances of the South.

A. G. MEZERIK, author of "Revolt of the South and West," has been traveling through the South and the Middle West studying current political and economic developments.

In the past any effort at unionization in the South has been greeted by a militant and organized "hate" movement, financed by employers and supported in many cases by the political power of towns, counties, and whole states. This time the boys who make a living out of whipping up anti-Negro and anti-labor hatred were just as ready and willing as before. But the bulk of the population hasn't been so easily whipped up; many corporations have learned that money spent with the Ku Klux Klan can boomerang; and entire states have said "thumbs down"—as in Georgia, where the KKK was outlawed and the Columbians have just been administered a sound civic and legal thrashing.

Consider, in the light of what Northerners had been expecting in the South, Lucy Randolph Mason's report that up to now she has heard of so few clear-cut violations of the civil rights of organizers that they can be counted on the fingers of one hand. Miss Mason is in charge for the C. I. O. of investigating violations of civil rights. Consider also that in the twelve states included in the drive there have been only eighteen reported beatings—Detroit, during the 1937 automobile organizing drive, could have doubled that figure any week. Yet Northern employers have joined with Southern employers in trying to stop the drive and the KKK is working hard. The Klan and allied outfits have in many localities provided themselves with union suits which they wear under their more characteristic nightshirts. They now support trade unionism, insisting, however, that the unions be run by officers with certain qualifications—they must be white Protestant Gentiles.

The flirtation of the "hate" movements with unionism, perverted though it is, marks a new era, for it indicates that the most uninformed segment of the white Southern population, on which the KKK has always relied for its strength, knows the score at long last. This is not to say that the path of the C. I. O. will now be easy or that Bilbo and the hate-mongers have lost their punch. Nor have the industrial bourbons abdicated. They have put up here and there the bitter fight against unionism which everyone anticipated. In Alexander City, Alabama, the National Labor Relations Board hearing on charges of unfair labor practices brought against the town's big employer by the C. I. O. was denied the use of the City Hall (the mayor is a nephew of the company's head), the Disabled Veterans' Hall, a lodge building seven miles from the town, and a night club four and a half miles from town. But the company, for all its old-style bourbonism, isn't what it used to be, and the hearings are proceeding in the federal courtroom nearby.

For too many years Northerners have used the South as a scapegoat. The South and illiteracy, the South and barbarity, the South and reaction—the words have been coupled almost as synonyms. And this chorus of disapproval has reacted on the South, stiffening domestic isolationism in a population which has been inculcated with regional pride for generations. As a result the best citizens of the South, the authentic progressive leaders, have been frustrated. The North has not made the effort required to understand the forward developments in the South, and hence its present surprise at the pacific reception accorded the C. I. O.

For the record, let it be said that the C. I. O. has not made the same mistake. Because the C. I. O. is so largely made up of native Southerners, it has understood the habits and even the prejudices of the people among whom it is working. It has made no daring pronouncements on the place of the Negro in its organization and for that reason has been soundly condemned by some Northerners. Yet in practice the C. I. O. recruits without reference to color, and it goes to bat on color issues, major and minor, when they arise. For instance, when a Columbia, South Carolina, hotel refused to provide accommodations for a Negro business agent, the C. I. O. moved its headquarters from the hotel to the hall of a local union. It sounds like a little thing, but, multiplied many times, such a demonstration does more than words. The C. I. O. stands squarely on the proposition that the worker shall have his dignity and his rights. To win these for him in the South means a double fight, for the achievement will only be real when the Negro worker has the same measure of dignity and rights as others.

The C. I. O.'s policy of political aloofness has given rise to even more violent criticism than that aroused by its failure to make strong statements on the Negro question. The Southern organizing drive, through its directors, has ignored the entire left, including the constructive Southern Conference for Human Welfare. It has not even gone along with the P. A. C., which is hard to take. But the drive is designed to unionize. Until it does that, it cannot hope to influence the political pattern. The South is still hamstrung by voting restrictions, and the controlled electorate has a tradition both of violence and of welcoming a man on a white horse. These are ingredients of fascism, and they have been stimulated in the South many times by hatred of radicals and outsiders. In this context, the political strategy of the Southern drive makes sense.

One of the worst handicaps which the C. I. O. must struggle against is the label of "outsider." Only education and information will finally lay that ghost. Actually the C. I. O. is not an outsider at all, since its membership in the South is all Southern and the membership chooses its own leadership. The real outsiders are the Northern monopolists who, owning most of the plants, have controlled the Southern workers. They have so successfully used the cry of "outsider" to divide and rule that they have forgotten how vulnerable they are themselves. Recently at an NLRB hearing one of the attorneys defending a Northern corporation pointed to the C. I. O. organizers and shouted, "These men aren't Southerners. They are outsiders." The C. I. O. lawyer interrupted. "Where are you from?" he asked. "I'm from Boston," replied the discomfited attorney. Further questions brought out that the corporation was being defended by two Bostonians and three New Yorkers. "Outsider" wasn't heard any more that day.

But before the South as a whole will understand who are the real outsiders, the C. I. O. must do a big job. As the organizer of the resources and the man-power of the South for the betterment of Southerners, it must integrate itself with the community in which it works locally. The South is still predominantly rural, and its traditional back-country aversion to unions can be overcome only by proof that the C. I. O. is indigenous and working in the interest of the entire community. This will be the real answer to the cry of "outsider." It demands that the C. I. O. call the turn on the monopolies and promote home-owned business. It demands that the C. I. O. show the relationship between high wages and high-level industrialization. It demands that the C. I. O. promote technical schools and agitate against exorbitant freight rates, rigged prices, patent restrictions, and the other causes of industrial and agricultural backwardness.

All this has to be done in terms that can be understood by human beings who have been denied information and the education necessary for making use of information. High food prices, lack of schools and roads, eroded farms, low wages, migration of young people out of the South—all must be targets, and the reasons for the continued existence of these evils must be exposed. In this campaign educators, independent business men, professional men, and many farmers can be allies; and as these segments of the population recognize in the C. I. O. the champion of a better community and a better South, they will stop fighting its unionization efforts. The political quislings will take the opposite side—as indeed they must on the basis of their allegiances. The consequences of C. I. O. success will benefit the whole country politically.

All this is, I think, understood by the leaders of the C. I. O. Southern organizing drive. And if it were not enough to make the success of the drive imperative, one final item would clinch it. On the day that the South is finally organized, the death knell will sound for the elective restrictions which deprive the poor white and the Negro of their votes. More information and better education follow in the wake of unionization. The combination spells the beginning of the end of the long domination by prejudice—it means a happy goodbye to the Bilbos and the Rankins.

In the Wind

IN KEEPING with the holiday spirit, the Wind has spent the last fortnight riffling through old wastebaskets and conning the tattered productions of Hucksters, large and small. The Wind is now ready with its short survey of the ethos of American huckstering. Immediately following a brief talk by President Carpenter of the du Pont Company over the air waves on the night of December 23, for instance, the du Pont Cavalcade Choir spun into "Joy to the World, the Lord Is Come."

ALSO BRINGING joy to the world, the Granger Products Company of Floral Park, New York, advertised its men's jewelry this way in the December Farm Journal: "Luxurious Xmas Gifts at skinflint prices."

NOW FOR an extract from "A Short Course in Salesmanship" by F. C. Aspley, printed by the Darnell Corporation in Chicago: "When the upper lid covers about one-half the width of the top arc of the iris, you may be sure you have full attention and interest. When the lid lifts clear to the top edge of the color ring, [it] . . . should lead to a successful sale."

TRIUMPHANT publicity release from the Publicity Counsel for Art Competition of Loew-Lewin Productions, Hollywood: "Art Triumphs Over Censorship! Boston censorship has capitulated. Eleven new canvases by outstanding American and European painters [have] just completed a remarkably successful showing at the Stuart Art Gallery. All eleven pictures were painted in competition for the selection of one to be featured in 'The Private Affairs of Bel Ami,' a Loew-Lewin motion picture . . . starring George Sanders."

FROM a poop-sheet on "The Premises of the Declaration of Independence and Their Consequences," distributed gratis by Building Supplies Corporation of Norfolk, Virginia: "We may rightly 'hold these truths to be self-evident.' . . . The vote is not a constitutional right, but is a privilege controlled by each state. . . . The privilege . . . of voting . . . should be part of our educational system. But not how to vote—a present means of subversive infiltration by underpaid teachers and professors."

NAVY DEPARTMENT public-relations officers, by the way, must be having a hell of a time explaining how the Byrd expedition to the South Polar regions came to forget its 270 pairs of skis, which are now being rushed to the party by aircraft carrier, or icebreaker, or both.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

The People's Front

THAT nations of different political and economic structures can work together to secure peace has become a fixed belief. If this were not so, the entire idea of the United Nations would explode like a pricked balloon. But once established, the belief does not exclude a continuing contest between the capitalist nations and those of socialist tendency. It is not, in the last analysis, a competition carried on in the classic form of a balance-of-power struggle. The nations are not competing merely as nations, but also as representatives of opposing conceptions of life. Most of the recent surveys of world events in 1946 and forecasts for 1947 are meaningless precisely because they minimize the ideological factor in international relations.

Two nations symbolize the nature of this contest—the United States and Soviet Russia. This simplification ignores the middle-of-the-road philosophy evolved by Labor Britain and the efforts of various Western countries to find equilibrium on a socialist basis; but because peace depends above all on relations between America and Russia and on the use to which they put their immense power, people all over the world tend to judge events in their relation to the two giants. An objective look at international developments in the past year shows that the Soviet Union has scored more points than its rivals. The year 1946 opened amid loud denunciations of Russia: the Soviets were behaving badly in the United Nations—they should be put in a corner, isolated along with their eastern satellites, and forced to obey the rules laid down by their Anglo-Saxon betters; 1946 closed with Russia commanding respect in the councils of the United Nations, leading on the question of trusteeships, tossing into the international arena the explosive subject of general disarmament with its strong popular appeal, and handling the ticklish issue of the veto in a way that forced consideration of its arguments even though the vote went against it.

The anti-Russian policy backfired partly because its advocates failed to take into account the socialist factor. They did not see that mobilizing world opinion against Nazi Germany and against Soviet Russia are two very different matters. In Europe at least the workers cannot be won over to a program whose ultimate logic is war with the Soviet state. It is all very well for disillusioned left-wing intellectuals and disgruntled ex-Communists to base their thinking on the assumption that Russia is just another expansionist state, out to grab territory and establish its hegemony. The workers may listen to this bitter indictment, and even agree here and there, but when it comes to a possibility of war against Russia, their answer—whether they are Socialists or Communists or Anarchists—is "Merde."

There is nothing radically new in this attitude. I have been rereading lately the whole story of Western relations with Russia in the early years of the Revolution. Then, as now, the British workers, for example, disliked many things in Soviet foreign and domestic policy, but they liked still less the idea of sending troops against the new-born revolution to please the gentlemen of the City. It was their revolt that ended British intervention. Looking back at that period one realizes that then as now the promoters of the anti-Russian coalition had the same purpose behind their immediate objectives: to stop the advance of socialism.

Writing in the World-Telegram the other day, William Philip Simms observed sadly: "Moscow is expected to dominate the international scene during 1947 even more completely than in the past. . . . In 1946 Russia never, at any time—whether at London, Paris, or New York—yielded on a single fundamental point." Unlike Mr. Simms, I believe the anti-Russian trend was checked not by the intransigence but rather by the elasticity of Soviet foreign policy. Before my recent visit to Russia and after my return I dismissed as unfounded all rumors of an irreparable break. I was convinced that Moscow would never permit disagreements to be carried to the point of damaging the United Nations or risking war. Here again, in the matter of concessions, the socialist factor is too often forgotten. A socialist state, possessed of the vigor and imagination of a regime only thirty years old, is capable of far greater resiliency than the Western countries, saddled with a decrepit economic system and a tradition of striped-pants diplomacy. It was not a malicious columnist in Pravda but the highly informed correspondent of the New York Times, James B. Reston, who biting observed that the State Department was trying to "play a new role with an old team."

If the 1946 balance has been unfavorable to the anti-Russian crusaders, the outlook for 1947 is more dismal. At the Foreign Ministers' Conference in Moscow next March, the Russians are likely to turn up with a better plan for a German treaty than the British and Americans. For with rumors of imminent war discredited and tension noticeably relieved, the Russians are not as fearful as they were a year ago that western Germany may be utilized in an assault against their country. The bargaining positions of the three powers are more even.

If the Moscow conference is successful, it will give the Big Three a new opportunity to substitute cooperation for bloc-building. Differences in ideology need not be an obstacle. Recently a British magazine printed an account of the visit of a Labor delegation to Russia, written by the secretary of the party, Morgan Philips, who is described as "bitterly anti-Communist." According to Philips, Stalin said there were many roads—"not only the Russian"—to socialism; he paid tribute to the accomplishments of the Labor government in the domestic field, and expressed his belief in the possibility of a lasting collaboration among the victorious powers.

After all, if the Allies mean business, they still have two unfinished tasks—the liquidation of fascism, and the fulfillment of their promises of a better world made during the war. So please, gentlemen, during 1947 a little more reconstruction and less juggling with bombs and blocs.

DEL VAYO

Soviet Politics in Germany

BY JOEL CARMICHAEL

Paris, December 15

IN MY first article I showed how the Russians have reorganized German trade and industry and made the economy of their zone an adjunct of the Soviet Union's. Of even greater importance in the long view is the way they have changed the social stratification. The existing class society has not been destroyed, but its internal structure as determined by the distribution of power has been strikingly transformed. In the words of a German administrative official with whom I spoke, "The classes which are the natural enemies of democracy have been broken."

EXPROPRIATION OF LAND AND BUSINESS

The semi-feudal rural aristocracy has been liquidated by the agrarian reform, which was begun last year and is now practically completed. As is known, estates of more than 250 hectares were expropriated without any indemnification and parceled out to landless peasants. It is evident that this reform must have been based on political rather than economic considerations, for the great Junker estates were extremely efficient and well-run agricultural units, whereas the new "colonists," many of whom had been expelled from the east, were so totally without resources that a serious harvest deficit was inevitable. The new small landholders, lacking seed, tools, housing, and other necessities, were compelled to depend on a government bureau, the Bauernhilfe, and this bureau has retained extensive economic and political control of its beneficiaries. Thus the reform accomplished two purposes: it satisfied the landless and exiled peasantry at the expense of the great landlords, and it brought the peasantry under the blanket control of the state.

By another decree any property however small can be expropriated if it is not directly exploited by the owner himself. This measure was aimed against landholders who fled to the west and left their farms in charge of a friend or hired man, but it can be used against new German "kulaks," whose continued existence as a class is thus made dependent on an apparatus for which they no longer perform any indispensable social function.

Expropriation of stores and other business concerns belonging to Nazis, war criminals, and arms manufacturers has been legalized by a measure which was nominally submitted to the popular will in a referendum in Saxony. After being approved there, it has been applied throughout the zone. Possible loopholes in it are plugged by a general ruling (Law No. 24 of the Soviet Military Government) permitting expropriation of any business enterprise "needed by the community." Of course the needs of the community are ascertained by the occupation authorities.

I do not think that the process of general expropriation now in full swing should be regarded as the first step in a far-reaching nationalization program, though it evidently sets up an administrative base for a future program of that sort. Rather it is a method of lashing to the state apparatus a castrated remnant of the former middle classes by turning them into a managerial caste—a phenomenon which has been observed elsewhere. The expropriation, it should be noted, is not all-inclusive: certain notorious Nazis have kept their businesses, and well-known anti-fascists have lost theirs. The determining factor, so far as I could discover, is the individual's relations with the authorities, or what might be called pull. Some expropriated concerns are nationalized, some kept by the occupation authorities, and some sold. Occasionally the former owner turns up again as manager. The industrialists have become in effect the agents of the state economy.

The important point in all this is that the class from which the managers and technical experts spring is not being liquidated as such but simply purged; and the survivors are aware that they retain their privileges or authority, not by virtue of their position in a stable society, but through the tolerance of the authorities. In short, the principle of property, while juridically upheld, has been supplanted by the principle of patronage.

BLOCKED BANK ACCOUNTS

The class structure has been attacked at its very roots by the blocking of bank accounts and the closing of banks. These decrees are still in effect throughout the zone, and in consequence all fortunes except those in the form of personal belongings have disappeared. In what now seems to have been a final concession, the holders of less than 1,000 Reichsmarks were allowed to make one last withdrawal of 300 marks. It took the great German inflation of 1923 a year to wipe out the savings of the middle classes; the ruling which blocked all bank accounts accomplished the same thing at one stroke. True, inflation has been avoided, and with that in mind some apologists have called the operation effective "therapy," but if one considers what has happened to the middle classes as a result, its object cannot have been to save the patient.

JOEL CARMICHAEL, Nation correspondent for Central Europe, served during the war with the O. S. S. and the United States Navy. At the end of the war he was assigned to Army Intelligence in Berlin. This is the second of three articles on the Russian zone of Germany, from which Mr. Carmichael has just returned. Speaking both German and Russian fluently, he had access to information not usually open to American correspondents.

Old people who live on their savings are dying off. Others have become day laborers; still others gangsters. These new proletarians and the criminal elements which have emerged simultaneously will undoubtedly be a common social phenomenon for some time.

Even youth is subjected to the leveling treatment. An educational reform applied in the whole zone except Berlin sets up a single school system in which primary school is compulsory until the age of fourteen and secondary schooling is reduced to four years. Its avowed object is the abolition of educational privilege.

THE NEW ELITE

Yet to say that a classless society is being created in the Soviet zone would betray the observer's astigmatism. Along with the leveling process described above a development in the opposite direction is clearly visible. Out of the ruck of liquidation and impoverishment a privileged few are emerging—an élite composed of the German intellectuals who support the Soviet-approved Socialist Unity Party (S. E. D.). Among them are the more important party officials, the staffs of the journals, radio stations, and theaters sponsored by the Russians, the heads of women's and youth organizations, and of course the directors of the central administration in Berlin and their representatives in the provinces.

This élite has extremely tangible privileges—extra weekly allotments of food and liquor, special lodgings, and even automobiles. Indeed, its members enjoy much the same luxuries as the Soviet officials, whose social life they share to a certain extent. The Soviet authorities seem to be trying to create a new class entirely devoted to the new order—that is, to their position in it—and hence bound to defend it. The new class has not yet achieved a sufficiently broad base in the German community to stand on its own feet. Its origins are both too recent and too blatantly linked with a foreign power to give it the necessary self-assurance. It has a clandestine and apologetic air. Years of political evolution must pass before the red blood of a self-sustaining authoritarian caste flows in its veins.

THE POLITICAL OPPOSITION

At first sight the political scene in Germany appears similar to that in Western Europe, particularly in France and Italy. The former multitude of parties has been reduced to three big blocs—in western Germany the Communist and Social Democratic parties and a rightist party with a strong religious tinge. Any others are of little consequence. In Soviet Germany the fusion of the Communists and Social Democrats in the Unity Party further simplifies the pattern. There the whole of the left is counterpoised to the whole of the right—the Christian Democratic Union and the Liberal Democratic Party.

Politically the German bourgeoisie has been hamstrung by the destruction of the Nazi Party, to which one of its wings had given consistent and energetic support, and by the S. E. D.'s adoption of a social-reform program essentially similar to that of the bourgeois Social Democrats. Rightist middle-class groups have thereby been deprived of an openly reactionary party, and the Social Democrats have found themselves obliged to oppose policies they have traditionally favored.

The C. D. U. strongly objects to being called rightist, and in composition it is in fact extremely heterogeneous, containing former Christian trade unionists, members of the old Center Party, Democrats, and members of the Bavarian People's Party. It can be described as right-wing, however, in that it crystallizes the opposition of the middle classes to the program of the left groups and the influence of the Soviet Union. And it does include all the most reactionary persons in Germany today. In this respect it is similar to the French M. R. P., which has been explained as the Machine à ramasser les Pétainistes. But whereas the M. R. P. had its roots to some extent in the French resistance movement, and its chief figures are therefore more or less intimately acquainted with the left leaders, the C. D. U. has no bonds with the left.

The chief weakness of the C. D. U., that is, of the splintered and demoralized German middle classes, stems from the inadequacy of mere hostility to the left and the Soviet Union as a base for a bourgeois party. A genuine program is essential, and this the C. D. U. leaders, because of their extraordinarily diverse origins, cannot produce. The resulting flabbiness of purpose is made worse by the difficulty of maintaining contacts across zonal boundaries. I often heard the reproach that in Berlin, where it must compete with the S. E. D., the C. D. U. is progressive and even socialist; in Hamburg it is conservative and capitalist; in Cologne clerical; and in Munich counter-revolutionary and particularistic. Such variations are perhaps explained by the desire of the C. D. U. to stand above party in the narrow sense and become a union of all tendencies this side of Marxism. The charge of clericalism is denied by pointing out that for the first time in German history Catholics and Protestants are effectively combined under one banner. But the inherent instability of the party is so great that not even the necessity of making a united front against the Communists and Social Democrats in the west and the Unity Party in the east is likely to be enough to keep the Christian Democrats glued together.

ONE OFFICIAL PARTY

The S. E. D. is not only the instrument of the occupation; it is also the blatant organizational expression of the neo-élite the Russians have been systematically cultivating. No one but a professional supporter of the party could take seriously the official pretense that the S. E. D. is on an equal footing with other parties. "There are three parties, but one is the party," was a remark I heard frequently. And only in a purely formal sense does the S. E. D. represent a fusion of the Communists and Social Democrats. Its driving force is of course the Communist Party. Outside Berlin the fusion was compulsory; in Berlin, under the aegis of quadripartite control, some choice was possible. As a matter of fact there already existed a perfectly genuine quasi-ideological split within the S. P. D., and a great many Social Democrats in Berlin voluntarily acquiesced in the fusion because they were convinced that the only way to realize a reformist program was to participate in the bureaucratic power not so much of the occupation authorities as of the Soviet Union itself.

Their attitude of course was simply another reflection of the fact that Germany is too enfeebled to sustain any independent political activity. It is stretched taut and helpless between two magnetic poles, around which all political manifestations necessarily gravitate. To reproach the occupying powers with backing their own horses by favoring their "own" political parties is naive. Germany's present position makes that inevitable.

Commentators on German politics have been somewhat misled about the Unity Party by the language in which it clothes its purposes. Its leaders bend over backward to avoid saying anything that might be distasteful to more than the most ideologically hidebound of its opponents. This is probably one of the reasons why the extremely drastic social leveling that I described above has been so little emphasized; the authorities have been extraordinarily reticent about what is taking place. Nationalizations and economic reforms are seldom mentioned; the talk is always of "purging Nazis and war criminals," of "cleansing the economic apparatus of crypto-fascists," and so on. The radical alteration of the social structure which has already been carried out is cloaked in such euphemistic jargon as "rooting out the last vestiges of fascism," "economic denazification," or "the elimination of excessive purchasing power." These tactics can only be understood as a form of political cajolery. They represent the prudence not of a party campaigning for power but of one that is already firmly entrenched and seeking to broaden the base of its power.

Despite routine denials, the S. E. D. has the unmistakable aura of an official party. It is in control of the youth movement, the women's and peasants' organizations, and the highly centralized organization of labor. Outside the big cities there is no other effective party. Above all, it is recognized as the only channel for getting a respectable job.

THE S. E. D. AND THE OCCUPATION

The basis of the party's authority is its connection with the occupation forces. It is considered the chosen agent of the Russians, and hence any opposition to it is equivalent to an insurrectionary attitude to the conquerors. "Officially" of course the S. E. D. denies this and calls itself a national party, but its national pretensions are seriously weakened every time it denounces criticism of itself as an "intolerable anti-Soviet provocation." The Russians for their part emphasize their intimacy with the S. E. D. by announcing that many of their decrees are in response to the demands of the party.

While the S. E. D. derives strength and prestige from its close relations with the occupation authorities, it also shares their unpopularity. And with the majority of Germans in all zones the Russians are decidedly unpopular, not for political reasons but because of the disasters of the war, the atrocious conduct of the Red Army during its triumphal entry into Germany, and the ineradicable distaste of any people for foreigners in control of their country.

The party's official position with respect to former Nazis, as enunciated some time ago by Walter Ulbricht, its vice-president and real leader, is that there is a clear distinction between "big" Nazis, who are to be eliminated, and "little" Nazis, who may possibly be forgiven. In practice the concept of bigness is shaded by social considerations, and the term can be applied to any middle-class industrialist whether or not he was a party member. Social Democrats must exhibit superhuman devotion to the party in which they have been merged to mitigate their fundamentally suspect character. They can be held criminally liable for so-called diversionary activity—open criticism of the S. E. D. line—or fascist activity, such as an attempt to restore the S. P. D. The Russian political police determines the severity of their punishment, which may vary from bread-and-water rations for a few days to unexplained lasting disappearance.

The genuinely sincere political following of the S. E. D. in the zone is rather restricted. There are the actual Communists, who are entirely dependable but are handicapped by having to conceal their real aims—that is, if they are professional Communists and not merely communistic-minded Germans. In any case they are not numerous enough at present to fulfil their ultimate responsibilities. There are the German patriots who are speculating on the chance that the Russians will provide the props for the restoration of German power. If their guess seems good, their numbers will rapidly increase. And there are the usual opportunists, the largest group of all, who are simply waiting to see which way the wind will finally blow.

The Russians' attempt to cajole the Germans by favors to the S. E. D. is hampered by their material impoverishment, which bars any real liberality, and by the Germans' own invincible feeling of superiority, despite their respect for Soviet strength. The Russians have not yet benefited from the misery, industrial stagnation, and political gloom in western Germany. I found the atmosphere in their zone charged with hostility and distrust. Yet I believe their administration is more firmly established than that of any other occupied area.

American Students Talk It Over

BY JOHN CURTIS FARRAR

Chicago, December 30

IN The Nation of December 21 Harold J. Laski said that a student organization cannot be political without being partisan. Recently in the United States there has been the beginning of an organization whose founders know it must be political but at the same time are determined to keep it free of partisan control.

During the last few days representatives of almost two million college students have been meeting at Chicago; 295 colleges and 12 national student organizations sent delegates; both radical and conservative groups participated. The major decision taken by the conference, on which there was unanimous agreement, was to initiate the building of a secular, non-partisan national student organization based on the campus as a unit. Leftist elements did not in any sense control the proceedings.

The Chicago meeting was organized by members of the United States delegation to the International Students' Congress in Prague last August. They had helped form the International Union of Students at the Prague meeting, and believed that if the United States was to cooperate effectively with the I. U. S. in promoting international understanding, a new, all-inclusive national student organization was necessary. Various existing organizations, such as the National Federation of Catholic College Students, the National Intercollegiate Christian Council, American Youth for Democracy, and Unitarian Youth, agreed that some sort of over-all body was needed to coordinate their activities.

When this idea was presented to the conference, however, it was quickly taken out of the hands of the Prague delegation. Some 456 of the 475 delegates came directly from campuses, and many of them were wary both of the students who had planned the conference and of the organizations interested in it. The reports which had reached the United States about the International Union of Students had emphasized the communistic character of its executive board. The chairman of the United States delegation, moreover, was Russell Austin, who had been elected by leftist groups in the American Veterans' Committee to the chairmanship of the Chicago University chapter.

Mistrust of the student organizations came from various sides. American Youth for Democracy, Intercollegiate Division, which has more than 5,000 members at more than 75 colleges, is not predominantly Communist, but many of the leaders are. On campuses where it has well-organized chapters, as at Hunter and Cornell, it is able to control or at least influence the election of delegates to student conferences. One of its practices is to use the racial issue to its own advantage in elections. On the other hand, the leaders of the two large Catholic student groups, the National Federation of Catholic College Students and the National Federation of Newman Clubs, each with more than 150,000 members, though progressive in some ways, are bound by principles which are handed down to them as absolute and uncompromisable. They have employed what amount to obstructionist tactics in meetings where other points of view prevailed. And they have used red-baiting to their own ends. At the Chicago meeting both the Catholics and American Youth for Democracy were out to build up their own power in the new organization.

The general desires of the students from campuses were formulated by the delegation from the University of Texas. (Texas students had already entered the political field in an unsuccessful attempt to elect their candidate for governor of the state.) The Texans were led by George Nokes, one of the twenty-six members-elect of the Texas state legislature who attend the university, and by James Smith, president of student government and leader of the fight to gain admittance to the law school for a Negro student. Smith was elected president of the Executive Committee charged with putting on a convention next summer at which the new organization will be set up, defeating Russell Austin, who was afterward elected vice-president by a hundred-vote plurality. The Texas plan embodied many objectives on which there seemed to be general agreement—namely participation in the International Union of Students and in other international activities, increased educational opportunities, better living conditions for students, and the encouragement of self-government on the campus.

JOHN CURTIS FARRAR is back at Yale after serving in the navy during the war. He was one of the American delegates at the International Students' Congress in Prague last summer.

The conference panel on "aims and purposes" stated definitely that a primary aim of a national student organization should be to eliminate racial discrimination in education and suggested specific action for securing the repeal of the segregation laws in certain Southern states. Delegates from seven Southern states informed the plenary session that they would not be able to ask their universities to participate further in the organization if this were allowed to stand. Several Negroes from the North suggested that a middle course might be indicated. Finally a compromise was worked out which paid lip service to the ideal of equality but left the usual loopholes for segregation in the phrase "equal access to educational facilities." The question whether the white Southern schools will be admitted will be discussed more fully at the constitutional convention next summer.

In this matter, as in others, the delegates showed a healthy desire not to make important decisions quickly. They resolved to send the American vice-president of the International Union of Students, William Ellis of Harvard, to the February meeting of its executive board in Prague. On the basis of his report and of all other information that can be gathered, the convention will decide what the position of students in the United States should be with respect to the I. U. S. The exact extent to which the new organization will engage in political activity will remain under consideration.

The naive altruism which many people expect to rule student meetings was not in evidence at Chicago. The elections were decided in all-night private caucuses at which was formed a coalition between Catholics and liberal elements to keep the A. Y. D. from electing its candidates to important offices. The liberal group felt that in general the thing to fear was the left; the Catholic minority, they believed, could not retain control for very long even if it gained it temporarily. Russell Austin was the only candidate approved by the left who was elected to an executive office or staff position; he was made vice-president of the Executive Committee largely because he had done so much to assure the success of the conference. The A. Y. D. elected only two or three of their people to the thirty-three man Executive Committee; the Catholics have seven or eight members, most of whom come from church universities.

The Chicago conference highlighted two important qualities found in present-day college students. They have certain national and international objectives for which they are willing to work hard; and they do not intend to be used by partisan political forces. Because this attitude is exactly what the country needs, the student movement should make a valuable contribution to political life.

IN ONE EAR

BY LOU FRANKEL

FOR some time an extremely important minority in the radio industry has argued that radio's service to the listener was not what it should be, and that the industry ought to have some specialist examine it under the microscope and determine how good and how bad a job the broadcasters are doing. About thirteen months ago, after repeated needling by Dr. Frank Stanton, then vice-president and now president of the Columbia Broadcasting System, the National Association of Broadcasters took action. A survey was conducted by the National Opinion Research Center of the University of Denver, and a detailed analysis of the data assembled was made by Paul F. Lazarsfeld, director of the Bureau of Applied Social Research of Columbia University. Last November the results were published by the University of North Carolina Press in "The People Look at Radio."

The book pinpoints radio's weaknesses and suggests what might be done to remedy them. It presents the side of both the critics and the industry. It weighs the social responsibilities of radio against the claims of the advertisers.

About one-third of radio's audience were found to be really against commercials. The features most generally condemned—and this will surprise no one—are their length, their dulness, their overselling, and their use of noises to get attention.

The examination of newscasts indicates a need for more local news, but the book explains that stations use news services for national and international news coverage and would have to set up their own machinery for local news. It suggests that local sponsors might cover the cost.

In dealing with the fact that only 12 per cent of the respondents complained of inaccuracy or bias in radio newscasts, Mr. Lazarsfeld points out that although the question is now purely academic, the time may come when radio will have to prove its freedom from bias.

With respect to comedy, Mr. Lazarsfeld notes that "there is very little satire on American programs. A few comedians use their programs to show up prejudices, or move more or less timidly in the direction of social criticism. But the great educational power satire could have . . . is not fully utilized."

"The People Look at Radio" is well worth reading on many counts, but the most important statement it makes is this: "The volume and position of commercials and the tendency to oversell . . . are the two factors which the industry, by self-regulation, should do something about in rather short order." It will be interesting to see what action, if any, is taken by individual stations.

BOOKS and the ARTS

A Chancellor at Dachau

AUSTRIAN REQUIEM. By Kurt von Schuschnigg. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

ALMOST a decade ago Kurt von Schuschnigg, then federal Chancellor of Austria, in a large volume, "Dreimal Oesterreich," expressed his political philosophy, the creed of a highly cultured Austrian conservative strongly influenced by his early training at a Jesuit college, an admirer of Mussolini's corporate state, and a staunch monarchist. When the book appeared in Dorothy Thompson's English translation, the author was already a prisoner of the Nazis, whom he had vainly tried to appease by measures that were more than just conciliatory. Anyone expecting that Anschluss, captivity, and World War II would be able to change Schuschnigg's semi-fascist philosophy will be disappointed. Unlike Léon Blum, who as a prisoner of the Nazis revised some of his favorite opinions, the Austrian continued to cling to his pet ideas, to judge by his present book of memoirs. It is composed of excerpts from his prison diaries, lengthy political treatises also said to have been written in prison, and the transcripts of telephone conversations between Berlin and various capitals in the days of the Anschluss.

As if he were pleading for kindness on the part of reviewers and other readers, Schuschnigg insists that his book cannot claim to be "anything but a personal account and a human confession." But is there any reason why the book should be regarded as anything but a purely political apologia? The ex-Chancellor's sufferings in various Nazi prisons and camps were, at worst, of a psychological nature; after all, much of the time he was united with his family, and he had radio, books, and newspapers; for one who, like this reviewer, spent quite some time in the hell of Dachau, it is somewhat amusing to read that Schuschnigg, the privileged prisoner, liked it there: "Nowhere did we fare so well as here, and nowhere was the treatment so relatively decent."

The reader probably will be left cold by Schuschnigg's diaries if he has read such tragic documents as Langhoff's "Moorsoldaten" or Szalet's "Experiment E," but he will read with great interest Schuschnigg's long discussions of Austrian politics. The monarchist Schuschnigg regrets the destruction of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, asserting that the creation of new states carved out of its body merely aggravated the minorities problem, and endeavoring to show by means of some rather dubious mathematics that the number of "irredentist" people in Central Europe was greater in 1919 than it had been before. He naively traces the deep differences between the political parties in post-war Austria back to the lack of a personality who could have bridged them, like Vienna's "beloved" Mayor Luger, an arch-reactionary, or old Emperor Francis Joseph, one of the grave-diggers of Austria. He revives the myth that the peace treaty of 1919 "bereft" Austria "of the means to maintain her independence." Referring to Austria's internecine strife, he claims that "we had no intention in 1933-34 of dissolving the Socialist Party, of crushing their trade unions, or of changing the existing political position of the party," although nowadays nobody doubts that Dollfuss, Starhemberg, and Fey precipitated the tragic showdown. He maintains that the authoritarian regime had not destroyed democracy in Austria: "We retained the principle of free elections, not through political parties, but through corporate bodies," not mentioning the fact that these bodies were composed exclusively of protégés of government and clergy. He denies that there was any government-inspired anti-Semitism under his regime, especially in the economic field, although actually many Jewish physicians, teachers, and other experts lost their jobs. He calls the fears of a Hapsburg restoration, then held by many foreign observers, "hysterical" and "outright surprising," although Schuschnigg was more favorably inclined toward the old dynasty than any other chancellor of the republic.

Schuschnigg tries hard to convince the readers that in March, 1938, he could do nothing but yield to Hitler's demands in order to avoid useless bloodshed. That may be true, although it is thinkable that even then, in the twelfth hour, armed resistance to German pressure might have blocked Hitler's plans for a future "bloodless" conquest of Europe. But it is strange to note that an Austrian patriot like Schuschnigg should still cling stubbornly to the fallacious idea that Austria was and will always be "a German state." Millions of Swiss people protest that they are Helvetians, although they talk German.

Schuschnigg's language is clear and concise, and he seems to mean what he says. But his confessions do not exonerate him; he was a poor statesman, vacillating and wasting his opportunities, who permitted himself to be trapped by his "best friends," including fifth columnists. He was also a small man who worried more about his electricity bill than about the hecatombs that took place outside his own swanky "prison" in the Belvedere Castle. ALFRED WERNER

Innocence

The wisdom of the old will sometimes show
A kind of innocence, the gentle smiles
Hovering about the eyes that seek to know,
The veined, brown hand that yet beguiles
When it is lifted slowly from the knee
While the old voice with sudden richness rings.
Yet their hearts too may know a secret glee,
Seeing that fallen powers still have wings.
So Satan, after all that summer's day,
Found strength, though impotent, to fly from hell
To where the wisdom of experience
Might tempt us all. The old may still betray
The young, who, like the angels, cannot tell
The guile of conquest from old innocence.

ARTHUR MIZENER

Music and Society

MUSIC IN OUR TIME. By Adolfo Salazar. W. W. Norton. $5.

MR. SALAZAR believes that the "form society assumes at a given moment is reflected in the art of that moment. That art, so closely bound to the life it mirrors, is affected in an analogous way by the crisis through which the contemporary society may be passing. . . . And it is the object of this book to demonstrate this correspondence in the field of contemporary music." There can be disagreement enough about this whole conception of the relationship of art to society, but it might well be useful as a basis for a clear statement of the intention and the achievement of modern music. It is disappointing that Dr. Salazar has not really done anything with it in his book. Outside the introduction this "correspondence" seems, surprisingly, to be taken for granted; what the crisis in music corresponds to in society as a whole is never made explicit; and as a result the crisis in music seems, in Dr. Salazar's statement, not very clear, and not very exciting either. "The external forms of style are symbols which the artist uses to express, within the realm of each art, the way of life in his epoch. . . ." But Dr. Salazar talks only about these external forms of style. I am myself not satisfied enough with this version of the correspondence between art and society to be willing to supply the missing links in Dr. Salazar's argument by my own inference, and I doubt that other readers will want to either. It is by no means obvious what this inference should be. What exactly does the break-up of tonality parallel in the crisis of society as a whole? Without precise formulation of the "correspondence," the long discussion of musical nationalism lacks significance. (I think particularly of the misleading emphasis put on Debussy's nationalism.) And if we have to and want to make these large-scale inferences for ourselves, Dr. Salazar's statement and approval of Stravinsky's answer to the crisis—by a thorough eclecticism and a return to tonality and formal structure—can be interpreted as very dubious politics indeed. Dr. Salazar's theory of correspondence appears to be a superficial and arbitrary post facto frame, designed to give coherence to what is merely another history of musical styles during the last hundred years.

Nor as a history, with a simple chronological order, does the book seem particularly illuminating or incisive. Distinguished mainly by copious reference to the other arts and to biography, by its non-critical objectivity, by its sympathy with its material, and by its impressive array of sheer information, the book suffers from a loose and digressive structure and from imprecise terminology. Despite pages of analysis, "impressionism" and "expressionism" are not clearly defined; the analogies to the painting of the period introduce more examples instead of illumination. The word "poetic" is used as a technical term with an apparently precise meaning which is never made clear: this makes the discussion of Fauré's music difficult to follow. And there are other instances. Here, it seems to me, Dr. Salazar would have been more helpful if he had gone to what he admits is the root of the matter with a discussion of the "ways of life" which produced these different kinds of expression. One needs at least a sketch of his aesthetic to understand his terminology in the regions to which he seems to extend its implications.

Finally, a history of "tendencies" and "leading ideas" must maintain an equilibrium between the particular and the general; it cannot be true or useful unless it does justice to the individual composer and work in all their particularity. One cannot complain if in his chapters on nineteenth century background Dr. Salazar abstracts from the music of Berlioz, Chopin, and others only those qualities which contemporary music inherits and develops, although these qualities are not those which make Berlioz or Chopin uniquely themselves. But if in turn he abstracts from the music of modern composers only those qualities which will show the line of development from the nineteenth century through our century most clearly, then the tendency has become more important than the music, and the individual work has become, in fact, the "secondary source." It is doubtful that the layman reading this book for assistance in understanding modern music (why else?) will be helped by Dr. Salazar to come to that personal and individual experience with each work that is the real knowledge of music. For example, the pages on Satie, Chabrier, Fauré, Berg, even the whole chapters on Debussy and Stravinsky, in my opinion, do not succeed in defining exactly or even, sometimes (Satie, Chabrier), recognizing the unique characteristics of temperament and technique which distinguish each of these composers from the others who perhaps wrote in the same style. For this blindness, an awareness and even an incisive statement—which Dr. Salazar's book does not seem to me to be—of the development of forms and styles in a period is not an adequate compensation.

ROBERT E. GARIS

The People's Attorney

BRANDEIS: A FREE MAN'S LIFE. By Alpheus Thomas Mason. The Viking Press. $5.

DURING Brandeis's formative years, both as a lawyer and a public man, a revolution was taking place in America. With the absorption of free land and the closing of the frontier, industry replaced agriculture as the norm. The drift of population was from rural to urban areas, and the corporate form of business organization replaced individual enterprise. Accompanying this change in the picture of American society came the opportunity for the exploiter and the monopolist to grasp power.

Mr. Mason shows that Brandeis was one of the first lawyers to realize the implications of this new situation. He reacted unfavorably to the tendency of the prominent attor-

"The resolution of conflict in self is like the making one of opposites in art."

AESTHETIC ANALYSIS PUBLICATIONS by Eli Siegel

1. THE AESTHETIC METHOD in SELF CONFLICT: 50¢
2. PSYCHIATRY, ECONOMICS, AESTHETICS: 50¢

Eli Siegel won the Nation Poetry Prize in 1925 with Hot Afternoons Have Been in Montana. This fiercely discussed (and misunderstood) poem foreshadowed the present Aesthetic Analysis.

FREE PUBLICATIONS of the Committee for Aesthetic Analysis: "A Declaration of Purposes" and "Questions and Answers about Aesthetic Analysis." For copies of any or all of these, and for information as to the Aesthetic Analysis Poetry Group and lectures, write to MARTHA BAIRD, 67 Jane Street, New York City.

neys of his day to tie up with the dominant economic interests; he knew that the real conservative is he who is ready to adjust the status quo to the changing pattern of society. He was a practical man, and he gave warning that "there will come a revolt of the people against the capitalists unless the aspirations of the people are given some adequate legal expression; and to this end cooperation of the ablest lawyers is essential."

Against this background the author traces Brandeis's activities through four main periods. During the first period he was a practicing lawyer in Boston. Already the methods he used as a champion of public causes began to emerge. Engaged in such famous battles as the franchise contest with the Elevated Railway in Boston, the fight for savings-bank life insurance, the notorious New Haven Railroad case, and the United Shoe Machinery affair, Brandeis exhibited a tenacity which wilted his opponents. For nine years, from 1905 to 1914, he fought the New Haven Railroad in its attempt to absorb the Boston and Maine. He had many setbacks, with court decisions going against him and officials and newspapers publicly condemning him; but he fought back, rallied others to his side, and persevered, until his contentions were upheld and victory was complete.

In the second period he appeared as an attorney on the national scene, fighting the famous public-land controversies of the Taft regime. Two issues were involved—the defense of national resources against individual encroachment and the establishment of individual responsibility in public office. Brandeis held to a strict definition of individual responsibility, and he constantly emphasized moral law as the basis for good government.

By this time he was a rich man. Some saw a contradiction between his personal fortune as a corporation lawyer and his stand as the "people's attorney." He is "the most liked and the most hated man at the bar in America," said L. S. Richard. But Brandeis had no blanket social program to cover all the cases he handled; he was concerned only with specific causes, and was guided by an organic view of the law which considered that it needed to be adapted to social changes. He did not try to overturn the economic system but only attempted to make it work better.

Next he turned to the political stage, first attaching himself to La Follette progressivism and later becoming adviser and spokesman for Wilson's Administration. He was certain of the worth of democracy as a way of life, but realized that democracy is an empty word unless the people fulfil their duties as citizens. He therefore considered it necessary for men of independent thought to rouse the public from apathy to action; and that was the role he assigned to himself.

Last comes the period during which Brandeis was a Justice of the Supreme Court. Mr. Mason shows how he helped to shape the court's understanding of its own powers, how he worked with Holmes toward an application of law based on fact and democratic needs rather than on rigid precedent. The factual meaning of the famous phrase, "Holmes and Brandeis dissenting," is explained to the reader in terms of legal and socio-political history.

It is clear from this biography that the author has diligently uncovered most of the necessary documents. Mr. Mason has been studying Brandeis's life and work for a number of years and has acquainted himself with every relevant incident. But in his anxiety to leave out nothing he sometimes clouds the broader issues of Brandeis's life and leaves the reader with merely a sourcebook of details. He has tried to remain a neutral, content to present a vast mass of material from which the reader must make his own selection. But the details are too complicated: it would have been better to edit his material more severely.

H. DAVID DAVIS

Rimbaud in Exile

PROSE POEMS FROM THE ILLUMINATIONS. By Arthur Rimbaud. In a New Translation by Louise Varèse. New Directions. $1.50.

HELEN ROTHAM'S translation of Rimbaud's prose-poems was published by Faber and Faber in 1932. New Directions published a few selections from this book in 1943; it is hard to understand why, instead of reprinting all of the more accomplished Faber book, New Directions now publishes Mrs. Varèse's translation. A short review of this book could consist of a mere quotation: "La mer de la veillée, telle que les seins d'Amélie"—"The sea of the vigil, like Emily's breasts."

Louise Varèse is expert with the dictionary, but because grammar at times bores her she succeeds in spoiling one of Rimbaud's best poems: After the Deluge begins with the description of a fresh green world emerging from the purifying flood waters, makes a long contrast with the immediately consequent bloodthirst and sordidness of men, and ends with the invocation that the water may come to destroy

Russia and Her Geography . . . an interesting and stimulating study

THE U.S.S.R. A GEOGRAPHICAL SURVEY

By JAMES S. GREGORY, Formerly Geography Master, Trinity County School, Middlesex; and D. W. SHAVE, Senior Geography Master, Trinity County School, Middlesex Lecturer in Geography Method, Westminster Training College, London

Authoritative and interesting facts on one of the world's favorite topics of discussion—Russia. This unusual book presents a full survey of all important aspects of Russian geography at the present time—including many data never before available in America. There is a unique treatment of the growth and development of Russia during past centuries, from a geographical point of view. Special attention is given to its evolution since the 1917 Revolution. The material presented in this volume has been gathered chiefly from works published in Russia—much of it collected at first hand by one of the authors during his extensive travels throughout the U.S.S.R.

$4.25

At your bookstore or direct

JOHN WILEY & SONS, Inc.
440 Fourth Avenue New York 16, N. Y.

and cleanse again. "Dans la grande maison de vitres encore ruisselante, les enfants en deuil regardèrent les merveilleuses images" does not mean, however, "In the big house with window panes still dripping . . ." since the singular ruisselante applies to the house, and anyway means streaming not dripping as though with rain. Helen Rootham had at least said, "In the great house of glass still streaming with water. . . ." Rimbaud in his most visionary poems fires bursts of images in the chaos of the unconscious; the reasoning mind, even in spite of itself, tries for some association of ideas, rushing at any target offered—here, the words or the implication: water or rain. But Rimbaud does not tell what the house is streaming with, and no translator has the right to blur Rimbaud's or the reader's vision by decking out the original. Only a very few lines earlier in the poem Rimbaud has written: "Blood flowed, at Bluebeard's house—at the abattoirs, in the circuses, where the seal of God blanched the windows. Blood and milk flowed." It isn't impossible that the glass house containing the children is streaming with something else than water and may have something to do with birth, especially if one considers the poem's closing lines: "And the Queen, the Witch that lights her charcoal in the earthen pot, won't ever want to tell us that which she knows, and which we don't."

In the poem Enfance the opening lines set the scene—two revenants moving and watching as though still alive: "C'est elle, la petite morte, derrière les rosiers.—La jeune maman trépassée descend le perron." Translated by Louise Varèse: "It is she, the little girl, dead behind the rosebushes.—The young mama, lifeless, comes down the stoop." But Rimbaud wrote: "It is she, the dead little girl, behind the rosebushes." She may be standing there, watching her dead young mother descending the steps; trépassée means only one thing in French, dead; Mrs. Varèse's young mama seems only to be suffering from the vapors.

In Mystique, if Rimbaud had meant to say, "From the meadows flames leap up," he would not have written, "Des prés de flammes bondissent," which means "Meadows of flames leap up" and presents a different image. On the other hand, we have an exact if lifeless translation of "Des fanums qu'éclairaient la rentrée des théories" (Promontory), where théorie means a sacred embassy sent out to consult a Greek oracle: "Fanes lighted up by the returning embassies," and not, as in Helen Rootham's version, "Shrines illumined by the presence of a revived speculation." Whatever gratitude one feels toward Mrs. Varèse here soon collapses. "Rien ne bougeait encore au front des palais" is turned into "Nothing yet stirred in front of the palaces"; any schoolboy would have correctly translated in the forehead of, allowing one to see the façade of buildings as faces. "And the dream fades," we read for "Et le rêve fraichit."

If they had been the result of an attempt to convey some of Rimbaud's music and rhythms to the American reader, these mistakes would not matter in the least. But Mrs. Varèse is painstakingly uninspired. A single poem of Hart Crane's, for instance, though not at all derivative, can give you more of the essence of Rimbaud than all these translations together. They do, of course, keep one from having to turn too often to the dictionary.

RENÉ BLANC-ROOS

Hurry Up Please Its Spinach

HURRY UP PLEASE ITS TIME. By Elizabeth Hawes. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.50.

THIS curious little work is perhaps best treated as a unique type of mystery, in which the reader's object is to discover the point of the book. The title seems to present a clue, of course, and after you Hurry Up and read the volume you do discover that It's Time to fight for socialism. But there is nothing about socialism in the book except for a few remarks at the end expressing the author's unqualified and unanalyzed indorsement.

The jacket, which I consulted eagerly for a lead, says that in this, "her most important book" (more important even than "Fashion Is Spinach"), Miss Hawes "dares to expose our most carefully hushed-up ills." These appear to be, in rising order of gravity, the patronizing attitude of trade-union men toward trade-union women; marital infidelity in and out of the labor movement, or the "Great Bed Bug"; the congenitally fascist nature of employers; red-baiting in the unions; and, above all, Walter Reuther, who is not as hushed-up an ill, however, as Miss Hawes would like to make him.

The author is a passionate advocate of unity in the labor movement, and to this end she divides its members into four groups: red-baiters, a depraved lot who cannot be damned too heartily; "non-red-baiters," who are the salt of the earth; "catechismic Communists," eccentric but harmless folk who go about saying, "We must reach a broad section of the masses"; and "common Communists," staunch fellows who smile at their catechismic comrades, work faithfully with their non-red-baiting brothers, and bear cheerfully the burden of the day.

The way to achieve unity among these groups obviously is to get rid of the ones you don't like. Out of the depth of her two and a half years of experience in organized labor Miss Hawes is prepared to do the job of sifting. Reuther and his red-baiters must go. The Redhead, as she calls Mr. Reuther in her mellow moods, is "dangerous," and his loyalty to the union open to question. Miss Hawes suggests that he is angling for the Presidency of the United States

JOIN

THE BALLET SOCIETY

GEORGE BALANCHINE, Artistic Director

LEON BAZIN, Musical Director

Second Program:

Monday and Tuesday, January 13 and 14

Hunter College Playhouse, 117 East 68th Street

"RENARD" ("The Fox") (First U.S. Stage Performance)

Igor Strawinsky—George Balanchine—Esteban Frances

"PASTORELA" (Mexican Folk Opera) (First U.S. Performance)

Paul Bowles—Lew Christensen—Alvin Colt

RATNA MOHINI and her Javanese Court Dancers

Musical Arrangements by Colin McPhee

IRIS MABRY (Young American Dancer)

"DIVERTIMENTO" (Classic Ballet) (First Performance)

Alexei Haieff—George Balanchine

Admission by subscription only

THE BALLET SOCIETY

130 West 56th Street

Phone: Circle 6-7831

JOIN THE BALLET SOCIETY AT ANY TIME

and thinks he has the requisite skill in machine politics. His activities turn her "as cold as do those of the N. A. M.," and if we permit him to "mix us up by a red scare or individualistic behavior—then we may expect the U. S. A. to follow in the footsteps of Nazi Germany."

These remarkable bits of libelous passion, fully backed by strained inference and far-fetched anecdote, are in keeping with the vapory nature of the book, which in a disjointed way tells of the frustrations in educating women in the principles of trade unionism.

I do not profess to have discovered the point of the book, but since all mysteries are supposed to have a culprit, I pick Reynal and Hitchcock.

ROBERT BENDINER

The Queen and Columbus

FERDINAND AND ISABELLA. By Hermann Kesten.
A. A. Wyn. $3.

SEVEN years ago I reviewed in these columns Hermann Kesten's novel "The Children of Guernica," the book with which that author introduced himself to the American reading public. "Ferdinand and Isabella" testifies once more to the freshness and originality of his talent.

The events described in this historical novel are known to any college student—Spain's ruthless and tenacious struggle for power started by Queen Isabella toward the end of the fifteenth century, the inhuman persecution and expulsion of the Spanish Jews and Arabs under the Inquisition, the crucial deed and personal drama of Christopher Columbus. ("A world is my monument," muses the unfortunate discoverer. "Spanish chains are my reward.") But the familiar characters and situations assume an entirely new relevance and fascination as a truly creative writer depicts them with poignant wit and profound compassion.

There are heart-breaking scenes dramatizing the martyrdom of Isabella's victims—the Moors whom she was determined to exterminate, the Jews whose tormented outcry, "God, You see and are dumb?" resounds through the pages of the chronicle. In spite of all its moral indignation, however, the chronicle treats the blood-stained heroine with fairness and understanding. The Isabella it portrays is not just a monster of greed and fanaticism; she is a live woman, a human being—complex, contradictory, problematical. At times she is almost lovable; in other moments she has tragic grandeur. And again there are hours when she becomes puny and pitiful. There are hours of doubt. Looking at a "gouty old man," a "sublime, ridiculous old man" by the name of Christopher Columbus, the Queen of both the Spains wonders, shuddering: "Are all great men mad? Have I been mad, too? Is madness greatness? Is greatness madness? Poor, poor old man!"

A skeptic and moralist in the Voltairean tradition, Kesten seems to tell us that madness was ruling the world four hundred and fifty years ago as it is today. Which is not to say that we should acquiesce in madness. Kesten, for one, does not—as he has proved once more by writing the frightening and edifying, bitter and entertaining story of Queen Isabella and her beloved Ferdinand, nicknamed "King Petticoat."

KLAUS MANN

The Catholic Church--Its Nature and Purpose

Factually and Objectively Discussed

Without Offense to Catholic People

You Should Know--

? HOW THE CATHOLIC CHURCH EXISTS IN A DEMOCRACY
WHAT THE STEPINAC CASE MEANS TO US
MUST WE CHOOSE BETWEEN ROME AND RUSSIA
CAN PROTESTANTISM SURVIVE THE POPE'S BID FOR WORLD CONTROL

For First-hand Information on These and Other Questions of Vital Importance to Every American

Read THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC MAGAZINE

Edited by Former Roman Catholic Priests

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE $1.00 A YEAR (10 issues) — Canada and Foreign $1.25

Order from CHRIST'S MISSION, 229 West 48th Street, New York 19, N. Y., Dept. TN

Name..... Address.....

City (Zone)..... and State.....

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
51st ST.
56th ST.
58th ST.
59th St.
60th St.
61st St.
62nd St.
63rd St.
64th St.
65th St.
66th St.
67th St.
68th St.
69th St.
70th St.
71st St.
72nd St.
73rd St.
74th St.
75th St.
76th St.
77th St.
78th St.
79th St.
80th St.
81st St.
82nd St.
83rd St.
84th St.
85th St.
86th St.
87th St.
88th St.
89th St.
90th St.
91st St.
92nd St.
93rd St.
94th St.
95th St.
96th St.
97th St.
98th St.
99th St.
100th St.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE
HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

"COMPELLING THRILLER."—New York Herald Tribune

OLIVIA DE HAVILLAND
LEW AYRES
'THE DARK MIRROR'

—AND—
'GENTLEMAN JOE PALOOKA'
LEON ERROL • JOE KIRKWOOD

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER GREENPOINT
KEMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island

Queens
MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Kelt's
FLUSHING
Kelt's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

Manhattan
COLONIAL
B'way & E. St.

"HARDBOILED DRAMA OF MURDER AND LOVE"
—N. Y. Sun

GEORGE RAFT
LYNN BARI

'NOCTURNE'

—AND—
JAMES MASON
'THEY WERE SISTERS'

PARAMOUNT Presents

BETTY HUTTON • SONNY TUFTS

'CROSS MY HEART'

A PARAMOUNT PICTURE
—IN PERSON—

ANDREWS SISTERS

TONY PASTOR and His Orchestra

PLUS
LES PAUL & HIS TRIO

NOW
TIMES SQUARE

PARAMOUNT

Midnight
Feature
Nightly

STAGE PLAYS

RICHARD RODGERS & OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN, 2nd, present

"SUPERB SPOOFING."—Walter Winchell

HELEN HAYES

'HAPPY BIRTHDAY'

A New Comedy by ANITA LOOS • Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN

BROADHURST Thea., Matinee: Wednesday and Saturday 2:40.

"MERMAN'S A WOW."—Chapman, News

ETHEL MERMAN

IN THE MUSICAL SMASH

'ANNIE GET YOUR GUN'

Music & Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN • Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS

with RAY MIDDLETON • Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN

IMPERIAL Theatre 45th St., West of Broadway, Evenings at 8:30.

Matinee: Wednesday and Saturday at 2:30.

STAGE PLAYS

"A smash hit of enormous proportions."—
Ward Morehouse, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way, CH 4-4230
Evenings 8:40. Matinee Wednesday & Saturday 2:40.

"RATTLING GOOD THEATRE."—Atkinson, Times

JOSE FERRER IN
CYRANO de BERGERAC

FRANCES REID • RALPH CLANTON • MIRIAM SHERMAN
PAULA LAURENCE • FRANCES COMPTON
ERNEST GRAVES • WILLIAM WOODSON
BARRYMORE THEA., 47th Street West of Broadway, CH 4-0390
Eves., incl. Sun., 8:30. Mats. Sat. & Sun., 2:30

"Loaded with laughs! Bert Lahr puts it over with a bang."

—O'CONNOR, Journal American
BERT LAHR with JEAN PARKER in
BURLESQUE The FAMOUS COMEDY

By George Manker WATERS and Arthur HOPKINS
BELASCO Thea., 44th St., E. of B'way, BR 9-2067
Evenings: 8:40, $1.20-$4.80; Saturday Evenings $1.80-$5.40
Matinee: Thursday and Saturday 2:40. $1.20-$3.00 tax included

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE Nation

Money-Saving Magazine
Combinations

with Harper's Magazine $8.50
You save $2.50

with Consumers Union $9.25
You save $1.25

with Harper's Magazine and Consumers Union $11.75
You save $3.75

with Free World $8.50
You save $1.50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses. Canadian and foreign postage extra.

THE NATION by itself:

☐ 1 Year $6 ☐ 2 Years $10 ☐ 3 Years $14

☐ Servicemen's Rate $4 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage—$1 a year extra

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed. ☐ Bill me.

NAME _____

STREET _____

CITY _____ ZONE _____ STATE _____

1-11-47

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

THE Bignou Gallery's announcement of Pierre Bonnard's first one-man show in this country (through January 31) may have struck some of us as presumptuous in its bland statement that Bonnard is the greatest living French painter. One's first impulse is to bring up Matisse, whom many—and I among them—consider perhaps the greatest living painter in the world. The fact is, however, that the Bignou announcement merely echoes an opinion that has spread wider and wider in France during the last fifteen or twenty years and that represents a kind of hostile criticism of Matisse, cubism, and cubism's aftermath—that is, of everything the School of Paris has done since fauvism. This opinion rejects what it holds to be the shock and flash effects of Picasso and Matisse and prefers the "solidity" of French "tradition."

Bonnard is indeed solid painting. He is also late impressionism plus Toulouse-Lautrec, Gauguin—and Matisse. Originally one of the "Nabi" group founded in the 1890's under the inspiration of Gauguin's flat, decorative painting, Bonnard has devoted himself to gathering up the loose strings left around by the School of Paris's too rapid transition from impressionism to abstraction. Bonnard, for his part, has worked toward the abstract in a slower and, in a sense, more organic way than did the cubists. Before 1910 or so he painted in rather darkish tones, heedless of the fauves, but flattening his canvases more and more as he went along; by 1915 he seems to have felt Matisse's influence—he himself may have influenced Matisse previously—and his palette brightened up radically and his painting blossomed into big, boldly cut-out pictures that resemble screens or panels more than easel-paintings but are too hot in color to stay in place as mere decoration.

It is to this last phase that Bonnard owes his present renown among those who profess to know and like painting for painting's sheer sake—for the poetry of the immediate medium, of cuisine, paint texture, manual sensitivity. And it is precisely this concentration on his stuff, on juice and matter, that seems to have led Bonnard to paint more and more abstractly: the greater the attention to pigment and brushstroke the less becomes the concern with the original data of the subject in nature. Thus Bonnard's conceptions have become steadily more summary; he simplifies shapes into flat areas of unbroken color modulated by nothing more than the brushstroke, and arranges these areas into patchwork patterns in which all planes merge into one, with no single color or shape receding or advancing too far or too dramatically and the human figure becoming but one more object among others. Warm colors, crimsons, oranges, pinks, yellows, mauves, acid viridians, and emeralds in off shades, all these are crowded close to one another—sometimes at dangerously close intervals that threaten to turn the effect into mud. And yet it is one of the tensions and dramatic virtues of Bonnard's art that such bright, hot colors should come so close to mud.

Here, moreover, is a way of approaching abstract painting that makes a detour around cubism and yet arrives at almost the same place in the end. But Bonnard never abandons the object, and never will—nor does he violate it as Picasso has done, while still retaining it. He holds on to the third dimension more tenaciously. He may simplify nature but he does not reorganize it with respect to anything except color; and so the world he shows us disorients no one familiar with that of Monet or Renoir. This is the main reason why conservative connoisseurs have found Bonnard easier to take than Matisse, despite the fact that the latter has never gone so far toward the abstract. But Matisse is no longer an impressionist, and he imposes his temperament too radically and inflexibly. Besides, abstractness, taken by itself, has never been a measure of the radicalness of art; if it were, Magnasco would have been more of an innovator than Delacroix. The abstractness of the cubists and Matisse's flatness are the symptoms of a new vision of art, whereas Bonnard's is an extension of the same vision by which Monet painted his lily-pads.

But the intimacy and calmness of Bonnard's art, its concentration on gentle pleasures, and the fact that it smells permanently of the fashions of 1900-14, expressing as it does the desire of the French middle classes to make history stop and stand still at 1912, and leave them undisturbed in the enjoyment of the modest but refined amenities that the Third Republic had permitted them to accumulate—all this should not mislead us into thinking that he lacks ambition as a painter. Bonnard has not been content to have his art called French and to let it rest at that. He can paint "French" easily enough and turn out any number of sure-fire successes; and from time to time he does, indeed, paint little landscapes and still lifes that Manet or the early Corot or even Courbet or Boudin would have been glad to call his own: pictures, precious enough in themselves, that depart from the standard traditional qualities of French painting only by their directness and by the fast, loose, modern execution which achieves their paradoxical delicacy. But these are in the nature of relaxations, and Bonnard also seeks to realize a more monumental art through his instinct for large-scale decoration. What he seems to want is a big flat picture with the massiveness and weight of Tintoretto or Veronese. Here he must gamble; there are no certain successes in this unexplored territory, and he makes many mistakes and paints many failures. But the audacity with which he cuts out his canvases and the no less audacious monotony with which he designs them are an effort to express something profound and entirely new and contemporary, and when success comes, the result is an important masterpiece and a further advance on the part of the total tradition of Western painting.

"Visual imagery caught in a net of music"

ROYAL MURDOCH'S

New Book

GARGANTUA'S MOUTH

Provocative and arresting poems in the modern vein. 112 pp. cloth, stamped in gold. $3.00

THE FINE EDITIONS PRESS
227 EAST 45TH STREET, NEW YORK

Alas, the present exhibition at the Bignou contains little but a selection of Bonnard's failures—and they are not even important failures, except for "The Open Window" of 1924. The two best canvases hung, "Cannes, the Harbor" (1919) and "Still Life with Fruit" (1926), are in Bonnard's relaxed vein; as exquisite as it is, the seascape might have been painted by a latter-day Descamps, and the still life by Renoir himself. One can, provisionally, explain the weakness of this show only by the assumption that the artist's best work has remained in France.

Bonnard is not the only contemporary to show that impressionism still has something left to say, even in the presence of cubism and post-cubism. There is Victor Pasmore in England—and there was Arnold Friedman here in America. Friedman's death last week at the age of seventy-four closed the career of one of the best painters this country has ever produced—one who in a place where people were less illiterate in terms of painting for its own sake would have received far more recognition and understanding than he did. Only illiterates could ever have called a painter so completely in possession of his means as Friedman a "primitive." Forced to earn his living as a post-office clerk and to paint in his spare time until his retirement in 1933, Friedman took a long time to develop. But he did develop, and always in a determined direction, a direction that took him toward an abstract impressionism more radical than Bonnard's. In the last years of his life he painted a series of landscapes that for color and texture are without equal in our time. But they lack shock effect, they are too solid and complete to be "brilliant," and therefore his art may have to wait a long time before it receives its just recognition in this country. But I have enough confidence to add his name right now to those of Eakins, Ryder, Homer, Blakelock, Cole, Bellows, Eilshemius, and Hartley.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

BALANCHINE, for me, stands out among the best choreographers—even the way Picasso stands out among even the best painters: by the power in manipulation of his medium and the power of his mind and imagination that yield the prodigal abundance of his invention, its constant development and originality. fact Balanchine is, for me, an artist of the same magnitude as Picasso, and the only one I can think of now working in any of the arts. He is, it seems to me, even more disciplined in his exercise of his powers than Picasso: the originality, no matter how astounding, always remains part of the continuous development; a work as singular as "Dances Concertantes" is only a special use of the permanent but developing elements of the idiom and style of other works.

The occasion for these observations is Balanchine's latest ballet, "The Four Temperaments." From the very first movements of the motionless pair of dancers revealed by the rising curtain it has the striking impact of the powers I have mentioned—the powers which begin at once their fascinating transformation of the familiar elements of the Balanchine idiom and style, and which overwhelm one in the end with the richness, the complexity, the originality, the power of the succession of dances they produce with those elements. It is a work that, in the words of Edwin Denby, "holds one spellbound by the constant surprise of its dance development, by the denseness and power of the dance images which the figures on stage create from moment to moment"; and this sustained power makes it grand and imposing.

Except for its conclusion Hindemith's score is excellent for Balanchine's purpose. But Kurt Seligman's costumes are extravagant and undisciplined in their boldness of color and design—some of them obscuring the body that should be clearly outlined. His decor is good.

As presented by the Ballet Society to its subscription audience (for which it will be repeated on January 13) the work was danced with precision and brilliance by graduates and students of the School of American Ballet—the soloists being Mary Ellen Moylan, Beatrice Tompkins, Elise Reiman, Gisella Caccialanza, Tanaquil Le Clercq, Todd Bolender, William Dollar, Fred Danielli, José Martinez, Lew Christensen, and Francisco Moncion. And the dancers benefited by the excellent performance of the music under the direction of Leon Barzin.

The students of the school also danced in a performance of Ravel's "L'Enfant et les sortilèges" that I thought was a waste of everyone's time and talent. I would rather have seen a repetition of the lovely ballet that Balanchine created to a Mozart Sinfonie Concertante for the students' performance with the National Orchestral Association a year ago.

I am grateful to Laszlo Halasz of the City Center's opera division for the opportunity to hear the beautiful and expressive music of Tchaikovsky's "Eugen Onegin," and for his decision to give the work in Russian—though I suppose some of my gratitude should go to the person who drilled the Americans in the cast in the Russian words. Only William Horne's American accent remained noticeable; and I was bothered less by that than by the unsuitable and unchanging middle-aged appearance of Ivan Petroff as Onegin, the sudden introduction of comic stylization in the impersonation of one of the seconds in the duel scene, and the redistribution of scenes among the acts. The faults of the production were in fact mostly dramatic; the musical performance under Mr. Halasz's direction was quite good. And fortunately, if one could not believe in Mr. Petroff as Onegin one could certainly believe in Vera Bryner as Tatiana: she looked and acted the part convincingly in addition to singing it effectively, though with a voice of no great sensuous beauty and a strong vibrato. Mr. Horne also sang well with a voice that was rather dry; but Margery Mayer's voice was fresh and lovely.

Mr. Halasz being a man of enterprise and energy, I call on him to produce Mussorgsky's—not Rimsky-Korsakov's, not Shostakovich's—"Boris Godunov" in Russian.

Szigeti's performance of Bach's Chaconne seemed to be very fine. I say "seemed" because I had difficulty in getting hold of it, so to speak, as the attenuated sound of the unaccompanied

Buy Your Books through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price post-free if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D. No C. O. D.'s outside of United States. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible.

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street New York 7, N. Y.

violin reached me in the vast space of Carnegie Hall (I think it a mistake for a soloist to play there, and especially for Szigeti, whose small tone loses its radiance in a large hall). But in addition there was the difficulty that I had just heard a performance of Mozart's D major Quintet by the Budapest Quartet and Katims that had had me all but exclaiming over its exciting ensemble miracles. Szigeti also played a Stravinsky Divertimento that was an astonishingly effective arrangement of some of the fascinating music of "Le Baiser de la fée."

The list of HMV importations that I mentioned last week was one printed by Victor. I have just seen a mimeographed list issued by the New York Band Instrument Company on which are the great Cortot-Thibaud-Casals recordings of the Schubert and Beethoven trios. And also these outstanding recordings, among others: the John McCormack Il mio tesoro from "Don Giovanni" and Una furtiva lagrima from "Elisir d'Amore" (DB-324; $2.50), the Elisabeth Schumann Deh vieni, non tardar from "Figaro" and L'amerò, sarò costante from "Il Re Pastore" (DB-1011; $2.50), and the Roswänge Gott! welch' Dunkel hier from "Fidelio" (DB-4522; $2.50).

Columbia has issued Milhaud's "Bal Martiniquais," performed by Robert and Gaby Casadesus (71831-D; $1). It is the only work of Milhaud that I have enjoyed listening to; the performance is expert; and the sound of the pianos on the record lacks the rich resonance it should have but is otherwise good. On another single (7479-M; $1) is the Ebony Concerto that Stravinsky composed for the Woody Herman Orchestra, in which bits of jazz melody and rhythm are subjected—unsuitably and pointlessly, I would say—to the Stravinsky ostinato treatment. It is put together, of course, with all the Stravinsky precision, and performed with equal precision by the Woody Herman Orchestra under Stravinsky's direction.

Victor's remaining December releases offer two works, each of which in its own way is not worth the performers' time and effort, Victor's machinery, materials, and labor, and listeners' attention: Brahms's "Liebeslieder" Waltzes Opus 52, beautifully sung by Robert Shaw's Victor Chorale with Luboshutz and Nemenoff (Set 1076; $3.85), and Louis Gruenberg's Violin Concerto, written for Heifetz, who plays it with brilliance of tone and technique with the San Francisco Symphony under Monteux (Set 1079; $4.85). The performances are excellently recorded.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

The Record of the Arab States

Dear Sirs: It is a pity that Alvarez del Vayo in his excursion into Arab politics in your issue of December 7 should not have acquainted himself better with the facts before drawing his conclusions. As examples of his lack of information in this field, the following errors may be pointed out:

1. When he says that the Arab League was "whole-heartedly on Hitler's side" until Germany began to lose the war, he seems not to know the Arab League was only formed in March, 1945, that is, less than two months before the defeat of Germany.

2. As "proof" of the above statement he says that Syria and Lebanon under the Vichy regime became the chief Middle Eastern base of the German command. He is apparently unaware that under Vichy neither the Syrians nor the Lebanese had independent representative governments and therefore shared no responsibility for what happened in their territory.

These are only minor examples of the author's inaccuracy. I have the feeling that he has swallowed whole the contemporary "liberal" myth about Arab politics, which is based not on a study of the facts but on Zionist propaganda. That propaganda attempts to prove (a) that the Arabs do not really object to Palestine being given to the Jews, and (b) that what appears to be Arab resistance to Zionism is only the artificial creation of the British. The impression is thereby given that Zionism is fighting a heroic battle against British imperialism, and the Arabs scarcely come into the picture at all.

This line of propaganda deliberately glosses over the fact that it is all along Zionism which has been the pampered child of British imperialism; that but for the armed might of Great Britain there would today be no Zionists in Palestine. If there is a temporary estrangement between the British government and the Zionist leaders, that is merely because these leaders are not satisfied with the pace at which their movement is being allowed to grow. In all this it is the Arabs who have been the victims and the attacked; they are therefore unable to understand the attitude of liberals like Mr. del Vayo who appear to think clearly and with a passion for freedom and justice about other parts of the world but to lose these qualities when it comes to the Palestine question.

CECIL HOURANI,

Secretary, the Arab Office

Washington, December 17

[It is unnecessary to say that Mr. del Vayo did not depend for his facts on "Zionist propaganda"; that those facts were accurate, despite Mr. Hourani's remarks, can easily be shown. Mr. Hourani tells us that "the Arab League was only formed in March, 1945." As secretary of the Arab Office in Washington he should know his dates, but they do not coincide with those accepted by even higher authorities. The Arab League emerged from a series of conferences among Arab leaders called by Mustapha Nahas Pasha, head of the Wafd Party in Egypt, shortly after Mr. Eden, in January, 1943, had repeated an earlier suggestion that Britain would view with sympathy a movement to achieve unity among the Arab states. The conferences led to the conclusion of a protocol formally establishing the Arab League. The protocol was signed on October 7, 1944. Azam Pasha, secretary general of the Arab League, in an interview published a few weeks ago in the Egyptian daily Al Kutla, spoke of the beneficial effect of the league's activities "during the twenty-eight months of its existence." That would fix the founding of the League at about August, 1944, or two months before the protocol was signed—and eight months before the date given by Mr. Hourani.

But, dates aside, Mr. del Vayo's assertion that "until Germany began to lose the war it [the Arab League] was whole-heartedly on Hitler's side" referred in fact to the states now composing the Arab League; they were pro-Nazi long before they were formally united.

As for the question of the responsibility of Syria and Lebanon for German activities in the Levant, the facts are as Mr. del Vayo stated. Although the Levantine republics were under Vichy control, both their governments and the dominant political parties were flagrantly pro-Nazi. The "Military Handbook" published by the G. H. Q. of the British Army in the Middle East in June, 1941, gave a table of Syrian and Lebanese parties and characterized their political aims and affiliations. For almost

Crossword Puzzle No. 194

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Pastry is not plentiful here
5 S A A
10 Place where you consign things you want to forget
11 Love may take away the sight, but this restores it!
12 To return on a ship of the desert to King Arthur's court 13 What you need to start in the writing business
14 Avaricious
15 Without them, can becomes can't, you might say
18 She has our sympathy
21 Bread not recommended for pies
24 Lvov
26 Chirped
27 Having rusty locks
28 This balance is not at the bank
29 "Capers ----- in a lady's chamber To the lascivious pleasing of a lute"
30 Treat as an alien

DOWN

- 1 Choice
2 The old school (4 and 5)
3 Inflated
4 Grass much favored for feeding cattle
6 Tipples (anag.)

- 7 Here and there; now hither and then thither
8 Not necessarily what enabled the enemy agent to be far-sighted
9 They plaster it on some houses
16 Neither legal nor tender means of acquiring legal tender
17 Men can't bear them
19 The champagne bucket, perhaps (3-4)
20 Where the eggs are laid 21 Chirpy insects, these
22 He owes most of his illegal position to a moneylender
23 Become attached to 25 A woman of fashion

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 193

ACROSS:—1 BADMINTON; 6 CHEKA; 10 ORGANO; 10 BETHUNE; 11 DRAGNET; 12 TYRANNY; 13 SOS; 15 DISUSE; 17 TRIXIE; 18 ARMOR; 19 PRIEST; 22 YAFFLE; 25 ANT; 27 TIFFANY; 29 UNSWEAR; 30 OARLAPS; 31 FIGHTER; 32 GLOVE; 33 ATTAINDER.

DOWN:—1 BROOD; 2 DOG DAYS; 3 INNINGS; 4 TENETS; 5 NO BUTS; 6 CATERER; 7 EQUINOX; 8 ACETYLENE; 14 OSMAN; 15 DIPHTHONG; 16 EAT; 17 TRY; 20 INFERN; 21 SWANAGE; 23 ASSEGAI; 24 FRETTER; 25 AYESHA; 26 TUFFET; 28 RARER.

every party mentioned the comments run as follows: "German connections, pro-Nazi"; . . . "with strong Nazi-Fascist tendencies"; . . . "under the direction of von Heutig," etc. About the National bloc headed by Shukri Kuwatli, today President of the Syrian Republic, the "Handbook" remarks, "The party is pro-German." Apart from the records of parties, the period referred to by Mr. del Vayo is studded with the pro-Nazi acts of most of the prominent Arab leaders in the Levant; Mr. Hourani has apparently forgotten, for example, the close collaboration of most of these leaders with the German-Italian Armistice Commission in 1940-41, the speeches and direct help given to the Iraqi rebels by Riad al Sulh, now Prime Minister of Lebanon, by Hashim Atasi, ex-President of the Syrian Republic, by the late Emir Shekib Arslan, who headed the Mufti's espionage office in Geneva, and by many others whom lack of space prevents us from citing.

Mr. del Vayo's theme was not the battle of Zionism against British imperialism but rather the reactionary role played in the United Nations by the Arab states. It seems unnecessary, therefore, to comment on Mr. Hourani's last paragraph except to say that the record of the past seven years, since the White Paper was issued, would seem sufficient answer to his contention that Zionism "has been the pampered child of British imperialism."—EDITORS THE NATION.]

ADVERTISEMENTS

LANGUAGES

LINGUAPHONE MAKES LANGUAGES EASY. At home learn to speak Spanish, French, German, Russian or any of 29 languages by quick, easy Linguaphone Conversational Method. You learn by listening. Save time, work, money. Available under GI Bill of Rights. Send for FREE book. Linguaphone Institute, 81 R C A Bldg., New York 20, N. Y.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

SCIENTIFIC HANDWRITING analysis. Alfred Kanfer, 62 Leroy St., N. Y. C. Tel. WA 5-0976. Cooperating with doctors, psychologists, schools, firms, industries. Lessons. By appointment, evenings. Marital, educational, vocational, psychological problems. Fee $3.00.

MAGAZINE SUBSCRIPTIONS

SUBSCRIBE FOR PERIODICALS simply by asking me for them; any number in one order. Pay after I bill you at publishers' lowest prices. Catalog NA, Free. John Crehore, Walpole, N. H.

BOOKS

OUT-OF-PRINT and hard-to-find books located free of charge. Send list of wants to J. Thompson, 1 Hillside Avenue, Pelham, New York.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 164

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 18, 1947

NUMBER 3

The Shape of Things

WE SALUTE LEON BLUM, PREMIER OF FRANCE, who on the insistent orders of his physicians will retire from public life on January 14. On that day the interim government which he so courageously formed a few weeks ago, when all efforts to create a broad coalition administration failed, must in any case resign. For the French Parliament then meets to elect a President of the Fourth Republic whose first task will be to consult with party leaders on the composition of a new cabinet. But if Blum's last spell of office has been brief, it has also been notable. He and his colleagues energetically tackled the thankless task of stabilizing the budget and checking the rise in prices. They obtained the approval of the National Assembly for increases in taxes and economies in governmental costs. But their most dramatic move to stem the inflationary tide was a decree ordering an immediate 5 per cent cut in all prices, to be followed by a similar reduction on March 1. Cynics said this was a futile gesture, but the decree, reinforced by appeals from Blum and other ministers for public cooperation, is beginning to show signs of effectiveness. By providing a "psychological shock" it seems to have countered to some extent the fatalistic idea that inflation could not be ended and that individual security, therefore, could only be achieved by hoarding goods and foreign currencies. A sharp break in the black-market quotation for dollars since the decree came into force may prove significant. But the present effort needs to be sustained, for the hopes which Blum has rekindled could easily collapse in the absence of a determined government. Another prolonged ministerial crisis would be disastrous to France.

Léon Blum

THE PRESIDENT'S PROPOSALS FOR LABOR legislation in his "state of the union" message proved far from satisfying to the diehards of Congress and the business world. These men barely disguise their desire for the kind of "vindictive laws" which Mr. Truman rejected. They want, as a minimum, the revived Case bill, if possible with the addition of bans on the closed shop and industry-wide collective bargaining. Mr. Truman, on the other hand, suggested that legislation should be restricted to the remedying of such ills as jurisdictional strikes and to the provision of compulsory arbitration when disputes over the interpretation of existing contracts could not be settled by other methods. In addition, he asked Congress to facilitate an extension of federal mediation machinery, to extend social-security legislation, and to convene a temporary joint commission to inquire into the whole field of labor-management relations. It might prove a wise move by the unions if they all joined together in giving general support to this program; it would be their best hope of staving off much more drastic measures. Unfortunately, even in this hour of crisis, there is no sign of any sort of united labor action. Senator Murray, who arranged a dinner to discuss ways of combating the anti-union drive, was unable to persuade A. F. of L. leaders to join those of the C. I. O. at his table. This is the kind of thing that encourages such rumors as that of a Taft-A. F. of L. deal on a measure designed to cripple C. I. O. industrial unions without seriously hurting craft unions. We can well believe that Taft, a very smart operator, might concoct such a divide-and-conquer scheme. But surely the A. F. of L. leaders are not so blinded by hate of the C. I. O. that they could fall into so palpable a trap.

✱

IN THE PRESENT CONDITION OF EUROPEAN affairs, the State Department's protest against electoral abuses in Poland is likely to have more ill effects than good. The ruling factor in the Polish situation is surely that Moscow will never permit the establishment of a regime that it considers likely to be unfriendly to the Soviet Union. In effect that means that it will not consent to a restoration of the old church-dominated, landlord capitalism. Obviously, and with some reason, the Soviet

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	57
The Secretary of State	59
G. O. P. Budget Problem	60
Mugwumps in Action by Freda Kirchwey	61

ARTICLES

What Will Your Dollar Buy in 1947? by Simon O. Lesser	63
The Revolt of the Middle by Robert Bendiner	65
The Republicans and the First Freedom by Bryant Putney	67
Montgomery in Moscow by Alexander Werth	68
The People's Front by Del Vayo	70
Crude Oil Politics by Keith Hutchison	71
In One Ear by Lou Frankel	73

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

From the Kingdom of Necessity by Randall Jarrell	74
Briefer Comment	78
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch	81
Records by B. H. Haggin	82

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 83

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 195 84

by Jack Barrett

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor J. King Gordon Literary Editor Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo
Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart
Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors
Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer
Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside, Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting, Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx
Advertising Manager: William B. Brown
Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 319 Kelllogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

government considers that a victory for the Polish Peasant Party might lead to such a restoration. Mr. Mikolajczyk's alleged complicity in the terroristic campaign of the so-called resistance movement is only a facet of the larger issue. Two things appear certain. It was foreign pressure which prevailed upon Mr. Mikolajczyk to withdraw from the Warsaw coalition. And in certain districts the Polish Peasant Party leadership is more or less identical with that of the underground, whose aims are certainly not democratic. We believe it would be wise to recognize that the Western powers can hope to have little influence over Polish affairs until a solution of the social problem of Europe is in sight. At present Moscow is all too likely to interpret our demands upon Poland in the light of our practices elsewhere. In Germany we have failed to carry out the promised denazification, and only now are we beginning to move against the cartels. Events in Italy and Greece and our reluctance to take action against clerical fascism in Spain tend to confirm the impression in Moscow and Warsaw that we are less interested in Polish democracy than in setting up a conservative opposition.

★

WE HAVE OFTEN BEEN SHARPLY CRITICAL of the British government's policy; and we are under no illusion that Britain is already an enchanted isle of Socialist prosperity. But an article in the Saturday Evening Post purporting to give an accurate picture of life in Britain seems to us so wilfully dishonest that it is worth while answering its main points. The author, who writes in the style of a soured business man replying to charges of breaches of promise, declares that "under the present government England has become a nation of pilferers and house-breakers." This accusation, which would otherwise be merely grotesque, is coupled with the advice not to send relief packages to Britain, not only because they are stolen but because the British government "diverts them to needier cases . . . few arrive at the addressed destination." Both assertions are deliberate falsehoods. The writer also implies that Mr. Churchill's prophecy that the Labor Party would set up a Gestapo regime has been fulfilled. It is true that every person must possess an identity card. This is not a police requirement, however, but a necessary protection for the rationing system. The statement that no one is allowed to leave England without government permission is also mendacious. So far, the only person who has been refused a passport is Sir Oswald Mosley. The article shows no sympathy with labor; yet the writer states that "many Britishers are still working compulsorily in industries they dislike." True, war-time compulsion still exists in three critical industries—building, coal mining, and agriculture—to the extent that workers engaged in them cannot take jobs in other industries. This measure, accepted as an unpleasant necessity by the unions, is slated to disappear in the near future. There are many other distortions in this nasty piece, the intention of which is clearly to arouse American antagonism against the Labor Government.

✱

MEMO TO WILLIAM H. HASKELL: SORRY, OLD boy, but it doesn't pay to tweak the nose of the Golden Calf. When you told the judge in the Alvin Paris "football fix" trial in New York that you were unfit for jury duty because you were "in a gambling business" yourself and "might be a little prejudiced one way or the other," you probably were pretty pleased with yourself—you had successfully begged off serving as jurymen. As a customer's man for E. F. Hutton and Company—the E. F. Hutton who runs personally paid full-page ads extolling the virtues of the American Way—you ought to have known better. When you got fired the next day, and when the Stock Exchange, that over-sensitive plant, canceled your registration, it was just what you had coming in the way of "straight-from-the-shoulder education"—one of Mr. Hutton's favorite phrases. Consider yourself educated, Mr. Haskell.

The Secretary of State

GENERAL MARSHALL has qualities we admire in an American officer: he is a big man without arrogance, an efficient organizer with no inclination to run a one-man show, a war leader who understands the basis of global peace, a soldier who appreciates the essentially civilian character of a democratic state. In his one important post-war assignment he brought credit to himself in a mission that failed. Moreover, he displayed political understanding and courage in assessing the complex Chinese situation in language of more than diplomatic frankness. These qualities will serve him and his country well in his new post as Secretary of State.

Having said this, we must express our hearty disapproval of the Administration's action in breaking the tradition of civilian leadership in the conduct of foreign affairs. This tradition is all the more important in a nation which has brought foreign affairs closely under the supervision of the executive branch and removed them from the day-to-day responsibility of the elected Congress. It is a serious criticism of this Administration that no civilian, either in the State Department itself or in some other branch of public life, appeared a logical choice for this position of critical importance.

The Marshall appointment emphasizes both organizational and policy deficiencies in the State Department. President Roosevelt, especially during the war, personally directed the conduct of foreign affairs. After his death there was no unifying force in American foreign policy.

President Truman was ill equipped to give direction; Stettinius was a weak and unhappy stop-gap; Byrnes, who must be given much credit for the ultimate outcome of the Big Five negotiations, was occupied almost solely with immediate European crises. The State Department, left rudderless, developed a disconcerting tendency to sail off in all directions. In such a situation it is perhaps natural that Mr. Truman, having made one brilliant improvisation in picking Patrick Hurley's successor in China, should make the same improvisation in picking Mr. Byrnes's successor in State. One of Marshall's first big jobs will be to reorganize the department and clarify its policy; for the latter, if it has existed at all, has been carried around during the last year or two under Mr. Byrnes's hat.

The new Secretary's first big foreign assignment will of course be the Moscow conference to draft the German settlement. It will be a severe test of his abilities. Lacking first-hand contact with European affairs after the war, General Marshall will be able to draw upon a rich experience gained during the war-time meetings he participated in at Casablanca, Teheran, Yalta, and Potsdam. Not only did he become familiar with the basic issues in the big-power relations, but he was in a position to study the constructive and imaginative approach of President Roosevelt in seeking basic agreement. Marshall is not Roosevelt; but in foreign affairs he is likely to be a Roosevelt man.

George C. Marshall

We must end on a note of warning. The influence of the army and navy on post-war American policy is no myth. Our Pacific policy is built around the necessity of American bases. Our South American policy is immediately threatened by the pressure to reach a military agreement with the fascist Perón. General Leahy is a painful actuality in the White House family. Marshall, as an army man, is going to have his troubles, and it will be difficult for him not to approach many international matters primarily as problems of national security and military strategy. We hope he will be able to resist army pressure and to detect military maneuvers which may cancel out policies of the State Department and its representatives on various United Nations bodies. We suggest he should put up over his desk two sentences from his report on China: "Though I speak as a soldier, I must also deplore the dominating influence of the military. Their dominance accentuates the weakness of civil government in China." And in the United States, Mr. Secretary.

G.O.P. Budget Problem

IN HIS economic report to Congress the President declared that while employment and national income were high, as they are today, it was sound public policy to provide for a budget surplus and reduction of the national debt. Practically all economists will agree, including those who are often charged with cherishing deficit financing for its own sake but who, in fact, view the budget as a mechanism for releasing purchasing power when inflation threatens and absorbing it when the danger is deflation.

There is, therefore, no controversy about Mr. Truman's attempt to keep expenditures within the limits of expected revenue. What is debatable, from our point of view, is the question whether within these limits he is giving the taxpayers the best value for their money. For every dollar of expenditure, we notice, just eight cents is allotted for social security, welfare, health, education and research, housing and community facilities. This seems a disproportionately small amount to spend on what are the most important and, in the long run, the most remunerative functions of government. In his Economic Report Mr. Truman pointed out that there is a direct connection between health and education on the one hand and labor efficiency and productivity on the other, and suggested that welfare programs should be integrated with proposals for maintaining general prosperity. Yet the fact is that all too many people regard welfare expenditure as a luxury and the first objective in any economy campaign.

This spirit, we are well aware, animates the President's Republican critics who complain that the budget has been balanced at far too high a level. Expenditure, they say, ought to be reduced by another four or five billion dollars, making possible not only debt repayment but the cut in taxes they have so recklessly promised. They are the men, they have lost no time in announcing, who are going to prune expenditure in really drastic fashion. This operation promises to be a fascinating, if unedifying, spectacle, for there is a good deal of disagreement among the surgeons about how to make their cuts without shedding too much political blood. Representative Taber, who comes from a safe Republican district in upper New York State, wants to use an ax; Senator Taft, whose ambitions necessitate a broader view of the national scene, promises more scientific methods.

Obviously, debt interest cannot be cut, and veterans' benefits will not be. Those two items account for about a third of the total expenditure contemplated by the President. The army and navy together will take almost another third. They are to have about $3½ billion less than in the current year and will certainly protest to Congress that they are cut to the bone. That, we believe, is not so; the War and Navy departments are the most extravagant of all the government agencies and would be all the better if deprived of superfluous flesh. Nevertheless, we shall be agreeably surprised if the Republicans make any effort to economize in this direction. Presidential hopeful Harold Stassen, we notice, while proposing that the budget be slashed by $5 billion declines to "substitute the judgment of our party for that of the military authorities." The same "liberal internationalist" wants to cut international expenditure by some 25 per cent. Since the bulk of the $3½ billion earmarked under this head represents credits already authorized, such as the British loan, occupation costs, and the expenses of the State Department, his proposal would mean practically no further foreign credits or relief grants.

Apart from a few hundred millions which might be saved on foreign assistance—at the risk of great suffering in many countries and of tremendous damage to our prestige—practically all the Republican cutting will have to be at the expense of the domestic agencies and departments. The following broad classifications together are estimated by the President to require $8,329,000,000 in fiscal 1948: social welfare, health and security; housing and community facilities; education and general research; agriculture; natural resources; transportation and communication; finance, commerce, and industry; labor; general government. How is nearly $5 billion to be saved on these activities without wrecking the government and imposing untold damage on the public interest?

The allowance for housing, for example—$539,000,000—is a few millions less than last year, when, as we know, little enough was done to solve what is perhaps the most immediately pressing of all social problems. How much dare the Republicans save on this item? Or take agriculture, scheduled to receive $1,381,000,000, or $264,000,000 more than last year. This includes $360,000,000 for support of farm prices under the war-time law pledging a 90 per cent parity price for a number of leading farm products. Many agricultural economists consider that this pledge will become operative in respect of some of our most important crops this year, and if they are right, the sum allotted is likely to prove too little rather than too much. What do the Republicans propose to do about this?

No doubt when they reach expenditures affecting groups less politically powerful than farmers, the Republicans will use their knives ruthlessly. But we do not believe that they can provide the pound of flesh that the N.A.M. has demanded. We suspect that they are going to face an awkward choice between responsibility for unbalancing the budget and reduction of their much-publicized tax cuts to token dimensions.

Mugwumps in Action

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

American progressives are incorrigible mugwumps. They fight shy of party affiliations for the same reasons that the town freethinker shuns the church. Like most of their fellow-countrymen, they join organizations, but they prefer the short-term commitment, the specific issue, the lively fight—and then a quick retreat to everyday "personal" affairs. Politics isn't personal in America, unless you are a politician.

This temper of mind is one of the things that have prevented the growth of solid progressive political movements on a national scale, comparable to the Labor and Socialist movements in Britain and on the Continent. Profound or lasting changes in the party structure in this country have come about only in times of great economic stress, such as before the Civil War or the period when Populism, represented in modified form by William Jennings Bryan, captured the Democratic Party. Other national movements have spent themselves in a single unsuccessful foray.

Franklin D. Roosevelt adopted the Bryan strategy of attempting to dominate and use the Democratic machine. He was elected, however, not through the efforts of an organized progressive movement but by Herbert Hoover. The New Deal was depression's child. And the progressives who flocked to jobs in Washington, from Brain Trusters to clerks, were never really incorporated in the Democratic Party. Most of the prominent New Dealers looked upon themselves as guest artists, serving under the baton of Roosevelt while the show lasted.

Don't Fence Me In! might be the motto of the American progressive, and it defines his virtue as well as his weakness. But the bad results of this will to independence are visible today. The progressives are not only divided, they are heterogenous and without any philosophy or coherent program. Where their European counterparts too often get bogged down in doctrinaire factionalism, they form loose alliances to carry through specific reforms. Such alliances seldom make a lasting impact on the old parties.

These general remarks are intended to carry forward the ideas discussed in two earlier editorials on post-election politics. In the first I described the need for collective thinking on the left in order to create a positive program which does more than recapitulate the largely improvised measures that composed the New Deal. In the second I analyzed the difficulties in the way of new national parties, both under our laws and in the context of our habits. Since then the rise of two progressive or liberal organizations, the Progressive Citizens of America and the Americans for Democratic Action, has made an understanding of the anatomy of political movements in America even more essential, for the prospects of the new organizations will be determined in large measure by these basic biological factors.

It was inevitable, as it is certainly desirable, that the progressives should try to regroup their forces after the defeat of November. The consolidation of right-wing control in Congress and in the country is driving politically conscious liberals to make a defensive stand. Whatever either of the new groups may adopt by way of a positive program—and one has only to look at the variety of views represented in both to be sure their programs will be magnificently broad—their real job will be to organize resistance to the Taft-Vandenberg reaction. From tariffs and deals with Perón to laws hamstringing labor, the Republican Old Deal must be fought. It is a fight in which American progressives can unite, and should, if the war won in Europe and Asia is not to be lost in Washington. Even separately the new groups can doubtless do a fair job of lobbying and educating the public, and can mobilize some strength behind the efforts of the small bands of progressives still holding the front in Congress. This is their real job. For neither one looks like an embryo third party, and both, at this stage, disclaim the intention to become one. Nor is the time appropriate for such an effort.

They should be taken for what they are: typical progressive-action committees, imbued with generous liberal purposes; lacking any consistent economic policy and incapable, because of their amorphous nature, of formulating one; useful in a time when opposition is the primary need; not very important in terms of long-range left-wing planning. It is unfortunate that they cannot tackle the job under one name—and one overhead. The right is going to handle its internal disagreements more shrewdly, we can be sure. But American progressives are not only incorrigible mugwumps; they are mavericks as well, unbroken and unbranded.

The issue that divides the P. C. A. and the A. D. A. is not primarily one of program. Their central difference is on the issue of the Communists. The P. C. A., composed of the old Citizens' P. A. C. and the Independent Citizens' Committee, accepts as members everyone who supports its program, a category that includes Communists and all their allies. The A. D. A. repudiates this popular-front theory and rejects Communists and fellow-travelers as members. Since Communists usually don't wear buttons or other stigmata, the A. D. A. apparently hopes to make its exclusion act effective by writing specific anti-Communist points into its program. No doubt some party adherents will hop right over these verbal obstacles, but for the most part the A. D. A. will correspond, on a national scale, to the Liberal Party in New York.

The important factor in this division is its relationship to a similar change in the ranks of organized labor. The C. I. O., from its start a focus of Communist activity, is reacting strongly, union by union, against methods which have come to be regarded as diversive—to use a good party word—or at the very least irrelevant. This reaction is bound to affect a political organization like the Progressive Citizens, whose constituent committees, particularly the P. A. C., had cooperated intimately with the C. I. O. Many labor leaders and New Dealers previously close to the P. A. C. or the I. C. C.—and even some politicians who had gladly accepted support from those committees—were active participants in the Washington meeting which set up the Americans for Democratic Action. This demonstrated, I suspect, not merely the mercurial nature of progressives but also their desire for a political affiliation free from factional control of any sort. If this is what they achieved in Washington, the new organization should grow and flourish. Judging by Mr. Bendiner's enthusiastic report on another page, I fear they did not achieve just this.

But it is a fact that the two new organizations are so similar in purpose and in most of their personnel that their permanent separation seems as unnecessary as it is unfortunate. If the factional elements in both—a small fringe numerically—were eliminated, the committees could certainly work together on a common program of energetic opposition to the gang now in power in the country. The hope of this sort of cooperation is dimmed, unfortunately, by the presence in the P. C. A. of genuine Communist sympathizers who, whether they control the organization or not, would naturally resist a realignment that excluded them; and in the A. D. A. of a group who believe that communism and fascism are indistinguishable and equally to be fought. It was perhaps in deference to this group that the A. D. A. program issued to the press contained such phrases as, "We reject any association with Communists or sympathizers with communism in the United States as completely as we reject any association with fascists or their sympathizers." To many non-Communists, among them myself, a program which equates Communists with Fascists and proposes that this country should direct its help to "democratic and freedom-loving people" distorts the meaning of history and the plain lesson of present-day realities. It is hard to believe that such sweeping implications will be allowed to remain when the full program is worked out by the organizing committee for this body has on it many first-rate and balanced progressives.

It should be possible, if the counsels of leaders like Eleanor Roosevelt prevail, to unite or coordinate the activities of the most effective forces in the two organizations. Before the lines of demarcation become too tightly drawn, while many individuals of like minds are still active in both groups, I urge that informal, private talks be held among the leaders to try to effect a union—or at the very least a method of liaison between the P. C. A. and the A. D. A. which will eliminate only those few, at both ends of the line, who prefer factional infighting in support of their own interests to common action against the new Old Deal.

[Miss Kirchwey will be away for several weeks on a holiday. After her return, she will continue the political discussion with an article on the Premises of a Progressive Program.]

What Will Your Dollar Buy in 1947?

BY SIMON O. LESSER

Washington, January 13

BUSINESS must immediately lower prices if our present prosperity is to be maintained in 1947.

That is the basic thesis of President Truman's surprisingly courageous Economic Report, the first to be made to Congress under the Employment Act of 1946. The report also stresses the need for industrial peace, selective wage adjustments, and various legislative measures designed to increase buying power. But lower prices are singled out as the primary imperative of the present economic situation.

Stripped of mumbo-jumbo, the reason for expecting a business recession in 1947 is that prices are so high, and some prices so out of line with others, as to retard consumption. That was not fatal so long as replenishment of inventories was helping to absorb goods. But sooner or later it will mean falling demand, lower production, fewer jobs—the whole downward cycle which spells recession, or worse.

The need for lower prices has been acknowledged by the United States Chamber of Commerce and other business groups and emphasized by many economists. Even the National Association of Manufacturers, which was huffing and puffing for higher prices only a little while ago, has suddenly recalled the economic advantages of low prices. But such tardy admissions—all too obviously intended to prejudice labor's demands—are hardly a reliable guaranty that price slashes are imminent. The $64 question is: Will business reduce prices soon enough and sharply enough to stave off a recession, or shall we get more favorable prices only through a recession, with all its attendant unemployment and suffering?

Price decreases, because they would be felt by everyone, would be even more effective than wage increases in bolstering purchasing power and maintaining prosperity, as probably most labor leaders would privately agree. They are fighting for higher wages because it is unrealistic to expect price decreases and they think that the only way to get a better balance between prices, profits, and wages is to exert pressure where it will be felt—on the wage front. A one-year moratorium on wage and price increases, as proposed by Charles E. Wilson of General Electric, would hardly meet the requirements of the situation. What is needed—and soon—is higher wages or lower prices, or a combination of the two.

For some companies this will mean slimmer profit margins. But with sales at the present levels, margins can in most cases be pared considerably and still yield very satisfactory dollar profits. A reduction in the present abnormally large margins does not seem too high a price to ask business to pay to avert a setback from which it would suffer along with everyone else.

Excessive profits are one of the chief causes of business depressions: they reduce the buying power of most consumers and give the few more money than they can either spend or invest productively. It is a matter of record that a very high level of corporate profits generally presages trouble. It did in the 1920's and again in 1936-37. And despite what they say for public consumption, business men are uneasily aware that present high margins cannot be maintained indefinitely. That is one of the reasons current profits are being appraised so conservatively in the stock market.

To be sure, business has not yet become sufficiently uneasy to adopt the pricing policies that would help sustain our present precarious prosperity. Is there any reason for thinking that it will be ready to do so this year? I believe it will, but anyone foolhardy enough to make economic predictions is entitled to a little hedging, and I hasten to add that the balance is so delicate it could easily tilt either way. There are good grounds for expecting business to initiate sounder pricing policies. But it is anyone's guess whether the adjustments will be prompt enough and large enough.

There are always certain pressures which make a business firm seek the highest prices the traffic will bear, whether or not such a policy is in the public interest or in its own long-range interest. These pressures are among the most important influences at work in our economy and are worthy of far more study than they have received. The "profit motive" is compounded not simply of the desire for gain, but of what sometimes seems an almost panicky fear of the future. Such fear is understandable enough in an economy of rapid technological change and sharp cyclical ups and downs, but it often has pernicious effects: the large sums each firm feels it necessary to put in reserve against future contingencies may, in the aggregate, help to precipitate the difficulties feared. Yet we all—the public at large, as well as stockholders and bankers—tend to judge a management not only by how much it makes but by the "conservatism" of its financial practices.

SIMON LESSER was in the domestic branch of the OWI during the war, working on information about economic stabilization, and after the war was with the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion. He is the coauthor, with Dr. George A. Works, of "Rural America Today—Its Schools and Community Life."

Under normal circumstances the urge to seek the highest possible profits is held in check by competition. Business men know that if they overprice their product they run the risk of losing sales to competitors, freezing out marginal consumers, and making fewer dollars—even though profit margins may be satisfactory—than they might at a lower price level. But in 1946 the competitive pressures which would normally restrain a firm from overpricing its goods were almost entirely absent. By and large, business had an assured market for all the goods it could produce. Demand was so urgent that price became a secondary consideration. Supply, furthermore, was rigidly limited by the shortage of materials, reconversion difficulties, and the necessity of filling the distribution pipe lines.

Other forces were also at work in the immediate post-war period which made business less responsible in its pricing policies than it normally is. During the war patriotism had acted as a brake on selfishness, and the relationship between various groups in the economy—business, workers, and farmers—remained relatively static. Peace disturbed this nice balance and inclined us—in a sense forced us—to think again in terms of our own self-interest. Each group began to maneuver for a favorable position in the post-war economy. In this environment business was in no mood to try to absorb higher wages or to see how closely it could price its goods.

As a matter of fact, it appears that even during the war many firms were getting set for a killing when peace came. Despite the importance of economic stabilization, and despite the fact that net profits would have been little affected by more conservative pricing, business in general set prices on both war supplies and civilian goods which yielded extremely large gross profits. Renegotiation and the excess-profits tax whittled these down, and the question arises why business did not content itself with lower gross margins in the first place. Granting that prices on some war supplies were set high because of the difficulty of estimating costs accurately, a strong presumption remains that the major factor was the desire to perpetuate a price structure which promised huge profits when the excess-profits tax was repealed.

There are, after all, two ways of looking at profits in a period of high production. To persons concerned with the continuing health of the economy, it seems reasonable to expect business to limit its "take"—and imperative that it do so if prosperity is to be sustained. But some business men may look at it differently: "If we can't make good profits in times like these, when can we?" During the war many concerns chafed at their inability to carry high gross profits down to net; they were determined to earn greater net profits once the war was won.

Box Score on Price Prospects

Food

After a sharp rise in the months following the end of control, food prices moved downward between November 15 and December 15. This decline, and the recent weakness in many wholesale markets, may indicate lower food prices in 1947. By the middle of the year, if production continues high, lessened foreign demand combined with static domestic demand should cause farm prices to weaken. If we are to avoid a recession, it is extremely important that these declines find rapid and full reflection in retail food prices. About 40 per cent of the budget of low-income families goes for food; lower food prices mean more money for buying other things.

Clothing and Textiles

In 1947 the consumer will benefit in two important ways. Staple items, such as moderate-price shirts and slips, will be available in larger quantities; so that it won't be necessary to take expensive substitutes. And the quality of clothing and other textile products, particularly "low-end" merchandise, will improve. Actual price reductions will be sharpest at the upper end of the price scale, where they have least significance for the average consumer. In the middle and lower price ranges reductions on some items will be offset until midyear by firm and even rising prices for such things as shoes and men's suits.

Durable Goods

The best that can be hoped for until the middle of the year is that the prices of most products in this class will stay where they are. Demand is strong. Steel, copper, and lead prices have been recently raised. Additional wage increases are in prospect. For some time longer certain materials will remain in short supply. However, production difficulties are gradually being overcome and labor productivity is rising. By summer a number of consumer durables may be cheaper—prices of table radios and electric irons have already been shaded—and consumers will find it easier to buy standard models.

Rents

Despite President Truman's plea for the extension of rent control, a 5 to 15 per cent increase in rents may be authorized at any time. It will be a miracle if rent control is continued much longer, and even if it is, some increase in rents is almost a certainty.

Houses

The scrapping of the Wyatt housing program means that fewer of the homes to be constructed in 1947 will be in the lower and middle price range. But the cost of building a house of a given quality will not be subject to much further increase and by late spring may begin to decline. The prices of expensive existing houses have already reached the top, and prices in all ranges may be expected to begin a slow decline as more new houses are finished.

After the war, too, some elements of the business community were willing to go to any lengths to weaken and discredit labor. This tendency, as much as the desire for profit, explains the fantastic insistence of various leaders not only that wage increases always necessitate price increases but that prices must be raised by the same amount, as if wages were the only element in the cost of production.

These influences will obviously be by no means absent from the 1947 scene. General Motors' Charles E. Wilson is still maintaining that a 25 per cent increase in wages means a 25 per cent increase in the price of cars. But I believe that in 1947 far fewer business men will be disposed to talk this way or to dramatize the nefarious effect of wage increases by hiking up prices again. And I think it improbable that labor will press for pay raises likely to be used to justify higher prices. Another favorable factor is that business is in an even better position to absorb wage increases this year than last, when many firms were experiencing reconversion difficulties. Production is high and profit margins are ample. The main reason, however, for expecting business to follow more conservative pricing policies in 1947 is simply that competition is going to make itself felt again.

At the same time that more goods become available, demand will taper off. For certain kinds of luxury goods —furs, expensive sport clothes, jewelry, three-dollar men's shorts, and high-priced houses—a weakening of demand is already evident. The lists of persons willing to buy new homes or automobiles regardless of price are growing rapidly shorter. All during 1947 and afterward there will be plenty of people eager for such products, but some will be unable to enter the market at all and the others will be more price-conscious. Under these conditions companies will begin to worry again about selling all they can make—and prices will tend to drop.

Of course, this shift in the supply-demand balance could lead not simply to more rational pricing but to the feared recession. But it looks now as if not all types of goods would experience a weakened demand at the same time; the demand for some products—textiles may be the first—will falter, while that for others continues strong. If things work out in this happy fashion, and if, in addition, each industry affected responds to a decline in demand almost before it is manifested in the market place, we can avoid a "bust" in 1947. Demand for capital goods, export demand, and the high level of construction activity in prospect will be bolstering influences throughout the year.

Revolt of the Middle

BY ROBERT BENDINER

WHEN Franklin D. Roosevelt died, nearly two years ago, the progressive forces of the United States went into a retreat that by last November 6 had reached the proportions of a near-rout. With the creation of Americans for Democratic Action in Washington on January 4, that retreat, I believe, came to a halt. It may be a long while before the lost ground is regained, and we may well have to go through hard times again before the right is unseated, but the counter-attack, I think, will be said to have dated from this occasion. If it is sustained enough and sufficiently supported, we shall not merely return to the New Deal but begin where the New Deal left off.

If this interpretation of the A. D. A.'s organizing conference sounds a bit lyrical, it is because I think we have here something new in the history of American politics—a movement on the left that is free of the orthodoxies of Marxism and yet looks clearly beyond the anarchy of what, by rote rather than by reason, is called "free enterprise"; a movement that is neither the projection of one man's personality nor the organized promotion of an economic cure-all; and, finally, a group that, being genuinely committed to political as well as economic democracy, is neither inspired by the Communists nor open to their manipulation.

This is a combination for which politically mature Americans have long been waiting—a movement that, in Reinhold Niebuhr's telling phrase, drives toward freedom within a framework of security and security within a framework of freedom. We have made countless false starts in this country in conscious or unconscious pursuit of this political Grail. Aside from the Socialists, these movements have been the kind of one-man operation that bound the Bull Moose to Theodore Roosevelt, the Progressives to the elder La Follette, and, in a sense, the New Deal to Franklin Roosevelt. Or they have been organizations for the promotion of an economic nostrum, like the wild money of the Populists. Or, more recently, they have been "popular-front" groups, addressing themselves to particular issues as they arose, and with no more underlying core of belief than one could expect from memberships that ranged all the way from Communist Party officials to Republicans of good-will.

For lack of alternatives, Americans with decent social instincts have been joining these front organizations, on and off, over the past two decades, and always with the same result. Whether or not they achieved this or that immediate purpose, they inevitably found themselves, in a matter of months, in an unenviable position. They could defend the Communists who invariably run such groups, strictly for their own purposes and with a program subject to change without notice; they could avert their eyes from such stark reality and, having been fooled into joining in the first place, go on deceiving themselves indefinitely; or they could get out, embittered and with no place to go. The Communists, for their part, continued in this way to pick up adherents, or at least defenders; while the liberals, gradually bereft of a principled movement of their own, merely went on dividing on the question of whether or not to cooperate with the Communists. Some abandoned every principle of liberalism to plump for the comrades without accepting the onus of a party card; others developed an obsession on the subject and saw every issue in terms of how to oppose the Communists; and a few went about with a micrometer to measure the obsession of their fellows and a compass and sextant for charting their personal course through the shoals.

The net result of all this fitful fever was that the Communists made appreciable advances toward the realization of what has become the immediate objective of both political extremes everywhere: to destroy the middle, and thereby to impose on the world a choice between communism and fascism.

Too many liberals, tired, discouraged, and with no place to go, have come perilously close to accepting the choice. They point, for example, to the absence of an established social democratic tradition in parts of Europe and Asia as a valid reason for supporting Communist domination in those areas. As though that tradition could ever come into being without the freedom to make its own false starts and tentative gropings; as though it would ever be given a chance to make such starts under the steadily hardening mold of the police state. One may, of course, have legitimate reasons to prefer the Communists and to resent a formula that equates the two extremes, but this seems to me irrelevant and certainly not an issue. The police state, both Communist and fascist, is a slave state. A slave may have his preference of masters, but the question of choice is a strange preoccupation for men determined to keep their freedom.

The A. D. A. unequivocally rejects this choice, and in so doing it brings to an end a shoddy era in the history of American progressivism. It serves notice on both extremes that social democracy is not ready for self-liquidation, that it has, in fact, a dynamism of its own, rooted in conviction and capable of contending for the minds of men.

Aspiring to more than the kind of ad hoc activity that concerns itself solely with bills on the Congressional calendar, the A. D. A. deliberately refrained from rushing before the public with a detailed platform. That will be worked out carefully in the weeks ahead, but the basic principles on which it will be based were laid down by the initiating conference. In essence, these principles, and the attitude that I heard expressed on all sides, point to a vast expansion of the New Deal in all its phases and to political and economic support for social democratic forces throughout the world. Significantly, it was the British Labor Party that came in for informal eulogy at the conference, and even more significant was the new note that was sounded on the subject of social change via the state. Civil liberties, the conference warned, must be protected not only from "concentrated wealth" but also from "overcentralized government." It is not too much, I think, to read in this an appreciation of the narrow gap between socialism and the all-powerful state; an indication that the A. D. A. conscious of the experiences of European socialism, seeks that combination of public ownership and democratic local controls that have been the glory of the TVA.

When the Union for Democratic Action called the January 4 conference, out of which the A. D. A. emerged, it expected nothing like the overwhelming response and attention it received, and nothing like the far-reaching results. What started out to be a small closed meeting on how the defeated progressives might best proceed turned into the spontaneous launching of a movement that must hearten the non-Communist left everywhere. The genuine enthusiasm of top leaders of the C. I. O., the A. F. of L., and other mass organizations gives promise of that broad base without which little can be accomplished. The equal enthusiasm of the most militant and far-seeing of Roosevelt's New Deal lieutenants, and of independent progressives of unquestioned stature, relates the movement closely to the powerful political currents of the country.

The newly formed Progressive Citizens of America, by way of contrast, is a traditional popular-front organization, that is, an aggregation of people whose fundamental aims are irreconcilable. It is in the tradition of a fast fading era, and, with or without the support of Henry A. Wallace, I believe it is already anchored in a political backwater. American progressives have rediscovered their own character and purpose. They are ready to put forth a dynamic program of their own and to provide leadership. And they reject utterly the choice of totalitarian extremes.

HOMELESS AMERICA

A number of our readers have asked for additional copies of Charles Abrams's series of articles on housing. An expanded version of the series is available in a pamphlet published by the League for Industrial Democracy, 112 East Nineteenth Street, New York City.

The Republicans and the First Freedom

BY BRYANT PUTNEY

Washington, January 13

BY A quick job of hatchet work, plus a neat double-cross, Republican leaders in the Senate have managed to head off what would have been the first thoroughgoing Congressional inquiry ever conducted into the economic forces limiting a truly free press in America. The day after the new Congress convened Senators Taft and White of the Republican Steering Committee, aided by the ubiquitous Senator Wherry, forced the cancellation of hearings scheduled for this week before the Senate Small Business Committee on "obstacles to free competition" in the newspaper and magazine industries.

Monopoly of the printed word is, of course, the most dangerous monopoly of all. As such it is at any time a proper subject for Congressional attention. Right now an investigation is the more urgent because, to quote Chairman James Murray of the Small Business Committee, "small dailies and weeklies face more serious threats to their existence than ever before."

The hearings were originally scheduled for last December but were postponed by Senator Murray until January 7 at the request of Wherry, a member of the committee. Wherry promised Murray his full support and assured him there would be no Republican interference. On January 4 Wherry conferred with Taft and White on the Senate floor, then walked across the aisle to inform the astonished Murray that the hearings would again be postponed, this time until after the committee's future has been decided by the Senate.

Two circumstances illuminate the motives of the Republicans. One is that the large newspaper and magazine publishers, the national advertisers, the newsprint manufacturers, and other big publishing interests have looked upon the proposed investigation with a jaundiced eye from the start, although they have not openly opposed it. The other is that Senator Murray is known to be a man who does not pull his punches. As a liberal from a state where all the larger dailies except one are either owned outright or controlled by the Anaconda Copper Company, Murray has good reason to know the ominous power of a press dominated by big business. Replies to questionnaires he sent last year to 10,000 newspapers scattered over the country have convinced him that this power is growing rapidly. "Small papers," he says, "are caught right now in a terrible squeeze, which many of them may not survive. Their costs are steadily rising, but they cannot expand their advertising or circulation because they don't have the paper for it."

The newsprint shortage—caused mainly by increased demand resulting from improved economic conditions in this country and rising literacy here and abroad—is being used to extend monopoly control in the publishing industry. Yet already 200 large users consume 85 per cent of the country's newsprint, and the small supply remaining must be parceled out among the 24,800 small newspapers and magazines registered at the Post Office Department for the second-class mailing privilege. During the war, quota regulations on newsprint gave small publishers some protection against unfair distribution of the limited stocks. But since the abandonment of inventory and price controls last year, newsprint prices have skyrocketed, and the jobbers who supply small consumers are being cut off by the big paper companies so that the increasing wants of large users can be met.

The newspaper and magazine chains and the large independent publishers have an immense advantage over their small competitors in the contest for newsprint. Most of them have long-term contracts with American and Canadian paper companies—over three-fourths of all our newsprint comes from Canada—under which they can buy their entire requirements direct from the producer. At least thirty big independent and chain publishers have their own pulp mills and in some cases their own timber lands. A recent news item in Editor and Publisher illustrates the trend. Norman Chandler, publisher of the Los Angeles Times, one of the largest papers west of the Mississippi River, is lining up thirty West Coast publishers to raise 5 per cent of the cost of a $28,000,000 newsprint mill to be built at Thomas Bay, Alaska. Although 95 per cent of the cost is to be financed by "outside capital," the publishers will contract to buy the mill's output for the next fifteen years. Said Editor and Publisher: "Although the output is not necessarily limited to these publishers, it is believed their demands will absorb the full production." Small papers please copy.

Even before the war the Federal Trade Commission considered the newsprint situation serious enough to warrant an exhaustive study. Its report, completed in 1939 and then suppressed, details the steady concentration of control in a few big paper companies and the growth of vertical combinations through publishers' purchases of newsprint-producing facilities.

Fear that the newsprint quota system might be revived in this country—it is still in force in Britain—was one of the principal reasons why the big publishers and advertisers heaved a collective sigh of relief when the Republicans scuttled the Murray investigation. But there were other reasons. The publishers don't have to dig into their morgues to recall what happened as a result of Charles Evans Hughes's inquiry into the practices of life-insurance companies, the Pecora banking probe, and a long list of similar investigations.

The first witness scheduled to appear before the Murray committee was Morris Ernst, one of the country's leading crusaders against monopoly control of our national media of communication. Ernst's book "The First Freedom," published last year, traces the frightening growth of such control over press, radio, and movies, and suggests means for curbing it. The prospect that his views might gain wider currency as a result of the proposed investigation threw a bad scare into the big publishing firms. Among the reforms Ernst proposes is a requirement that all the facts of newspaper and magazine ownership be fully disclosed; it is next to impossible at present to find out who really controls large sections of the press. Ernst believes also that the second-class mailing privilege should be revised to aid small publishers. Why, he asks, should the biggest subsidies go to the biggest publications, which are best able to pay their own way? He proposes that small publishers be encouraged through enactment of a law under which papers would be carried free up to a certain minimum circulation.

Officially of course the newspaper monopoly has merely been postponed—"until further notice." The Republicans may decide later to go through the motions and conduct some sort of whitewash proceedings. But no one here believes that in this event Senator Wherry can be depended on to carry out the original purpose of the inquiry—"to determine what can be done to preserve the vitality of the smaller newspapers of the nation."

Montgomery in Moscow

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Moscow, January 10

THIS week's greatest event is of course the Montgomery visit. Nobody thinks of it as epoch-making, but it is hailed as symptomatic of the present drift toward greater good-will among the war-time allies. Monty is doing his stuff proudly. He smiles and bows and seems to be enjoying himself thoroughly in this strange atmosphere, surrounded by Marshals Vasilevsky, Konev, and Govorov, Tank Marshal Rybalko, and other soldiers whose professional qualities and war records he certainly respects and admires. "Nothing but the greatest good can come of such contacts between war-time comrades," he said, and he was most gratified that his invitation to Vasilevsky and the other members of the Soviet High Command to visit England in the spring or early summer was promptly accepted. In a world where there is so much nervous talk, especially in Germany and in those other countries where people are banking on the "inevitable" conflict between East and West, the mutual cordiality displayed is bound to have a salutary effect.

The visit was undoubtedly more successful than it would have been a few months ago owing to the agreement on the peace treaties with the satellites, by which the United Nations session has on balance proved its usefulness, and Bevin's recent conciliatory speech, the friendliest gesture he has made toward Russia in his whole career as Foreign Minister. Montgomery also took a line which pleased the Russians—that his visit was of exactly the same nature as his visit to the United States and "Ike's" to England. His speech paying tribute to the Red Army and expressing a desire to establish close bonds with it made an excellent impression, especially since, perhaps by coincidence, it came right on top of a Pravda article repeating rumors about a secret Anglo-American alliance and arms standardization. The article took issue sharply with a British newspaper which had declared the Anglo-American alliance the best safeguard for world peace; Pravda's rejoinder was that the best safeguard was the United Nations.

One cannot help being amused by certain reports published abroad which seem to have tried to give readers what they would expect to hear about "Montgomery in Moscow." Thus it was said that the Bolshoi Theater, where Montgomery, accompanied by Russian marshals, saw Prokofief's "Romeo and Juliet" with Ulanova dancing, was "packed with uniforms." Actually there was the same sprinkling of uniforms in the theater as on any other night, and no more. The overwhelming majority of the audience were civilians who had come first and foremost to see Ulanova dance. In the intermission one diplomat observed, "It is a pretty healthy country where the public doesn't go into a wild frenzy whenever some generals show up."

It was interesting to see that Marshal Sokolovsky, commander of the Soviet forces in Germany, was in Montgomery's box. The meeting of the two men suggests strongly that questions connected with the future co-operation of the Allied forces in Germany may have been discussed in a general way—not in detail, for Montgomery brought no experts with him. Any agreement on purely military matters may be regarded as a small but useful preliminary to the Foreign Ministers' conference here in March.

ALEXANDER WERTH is special correspondent in Moscow for The Nation, the Manchester Guardian, and the British Broadcasting Corporation.

There is evidence that the Russians do not consider the German problem insoluble, difficult as the going will be for the peace discussions. Russian comments on the merger of the British and American zones are symptomatic and may perhaps be viewed as promising. A recent Izvestia article stressed the fact that Russia has always favored the political and economic unity of Germany and said the real objection to the Anglo-American agreement was that Russia had been left out; when that agreement was made, the Soviet Union's position was misunderstood. This indicates the line the Russians are likely to follow. While the article was in places highly critical of the Anglo-American denazification policy and the interest big business has shown in preserving the industrial strength of western Germany, it could not be called truculent. And as a whole, at any rate by implication, it was constructive. It hoped that the Foreign Ministers' conference would not be confronted with too many faits accomplis in western Germany; the virtual incorporation of the Saar into France, for example, was not welcomed here.

Meanwhile Russia and the other fifteen Soviet republics are preparing to elect the members of their respective Supreme Soviets on February 9. I do not suppose there is any doubt that the outcome of the elections will be an overwhelming victory for the Communist and non-party bloc. The Russian argument is, of course: Why have competing parties when we are all agreed on the fundamentals? But aside from being a reaffirmation of the practically 100 per cent loyalty of the Soviet people to their regime, the election is important as part of another great ideological and production drive.

The centers of this drive are so-called agitpunkts, or agitation points, scattered thickly over the country—in Moscow there is one in almost every street. They are usually a room decorated with banners and with portraits of party leaders and supplied with papers and pamphlets on the latest topical subjects, where anyone can drop in for a few hours of reading or conversation with the person in charge. Here also the part-time "agitators" of the district meet and are given the main lines of their talks with the voters. Then in factories, shops, and even in private houses, the agitators discourse on the Soviet constitution—"the fairest and most democratic of all constitutions"—and teach the candidates how to deal with "housewives' questions" concerning ration cards, housing, damaged plumbing, and other more or less personal matters. Some candidates take a good deal of trouble to show that they are closely concerned with their constituents' immediate problems.

After the nomination of candidates, as the result often of lengthy parleys between the local trade-union, the party, the Komsomol, and other committees, numerous election meetings are held and the voters are exhorted to work hard to carry out the Five-Year Plan. "Back to 1940" may be said to be the first objective, and "Onward to 1950" the next. In the consciousness of rank-and-file Russians 1940 is something concrete—a year in which, after all the ups and downs of more than twenty years of revolution, the wheels of industry, trade, and distribution were at last turning well. This was a period when there were few bottlenecks, when transport was efficient, and when food and clothes were becoming less and less of a problem for the Soviet citizen.

Although Bevin's speech of December 22 was generally welcomed, it contained one passage which must have sounded strange to even the least optimistic Soviet citizen: "Soviet Russia, which evolved an entirely different system but which has been invaded and suffered terrible destruction that has undone practically the whole of the great economic work she accomplished between the Revolution and Hitler's attack, has now to re-create herself again." This is clearly an enormous exaggeration, for it amounts to saying that Russia is practically back at the 1914 level. There was great destruction, notably in the Ukraine, of much that was built in Soviet times, but immense industrial power had been built up in other parts of the Soviet Union which suffered no destruction. With the intensive training of man-power, the weak point in Russian industry, it is expected that the factories in these regions will soon be running full blast again. No doubt the restoration of transport and of the devastated areas will take longer, but in two or three years everybody is expecting something approaching a return to the 1940 level in most parts of the Soviet Union.

A question asked by some Russians is whether there is not a tendency to go from one extreme to another. Whereas in early 1945 Russia was the colossus casting its shadow over the whole of Europe and Asia, the tendency now is to think of Russia as a terribly weakened country—industrially as well as militarily. Both ideas are baseless. There is hardship, which has been accentuated by the bad harvest; there is a labor shortage. But fundamentally there is nothing seriously wrong, and there are no insuperable obstacles to the country's fairly rapid recovery. The technical cadres are there, and recruits to skilled labor are being rapidly trained. There is nothing even remotely reminiscent of the economic and social chaos of, say, 1918, when Russia had to start almost from zero. What puzzles Russians who see the foreign, and especially the American, press is that the great majority of these publications no longer report facts about Russia but spend their whole time sneering. One Russian comment I heard was: "They are so happy sneering that they have stopped taking any intelligent interest in our country at all."

The People's Front

LAST week I discussed the continuing contest for world leadership between the capitalist nations and those of socialist tendency and the impact on American foreign policy. A few days ago the John Day Company published a book by Fritz Sternberg, "The Coming Crisis," which adds an important new argument to my thesis. Sternberg points out that if the rivalry between the nations which represent the past and those which are striving toward a new society has been intense in a period of prosperity, the capitalist countries will find the going even more difficult in a period of economic crisis. And as the title of his book implies, he believes the United States is approaching just such a period. Clearly his warning cannot be dismissed by any cheerful admonition, such as that of Studebaker's President Hoffman, that talk of a crash in this country is "un-American."

People tend to think of economic crises in terms of the boom-bust cycle that has characterized the last hundred years of capitalist growth in America. There may be a depression in 1948 or 1950, they say, but afterward will come an inevitable period of prosperity. Perhaps the most important contribution of Sternberg's book is to question the validity of this concept. He shows that the 1929 crisis never really ended until a war economy had been established—in Germany considerably before the outbreak of hostilities and in the United States after the war in Europe was under way. And he suggests that when the next crisis comes, the capitalist world will adopt the only solution that proved effective before.

If Sternberg's thesis is correct—and he buttresses it with a good deal of economic data intelligently interpreted—the political implications are terrific. In 1932 the Republican Party paid for its lack of initiative and imagination in 1929; it lost the election to Roosevelt and the New Deal. In the light of this costly experience, the Republicans may very well seek an escape from unemployment and idle factories by shifting to a war economy. This somber possibility explains in part why certain European nations which at the end of hostilities were strongly attracted by the idea of economic ties with the United States have lost their enthusiasm.

THE other evening I went to a private preview of "Man's Hope," a film André Malraux made in Spain in 1938, during the war. As a member of the Spanish Cabinet in charge of propaganda services in those days, I can testify that this movie is the very antithesis of a Hollywood production. It is a simple, direct account, without a trace of melodrama, of a single episode in the war. The actors are the Spanish people themselves—army officers, milicianos, campesinos—the common men of freedom's battle. "Man's Hope" records not only the injustice perpetrated against them by America's embargo and Britain's non-intervention policy but also the magnificent courage of the Republican fighters. No written page could have reproduced so faithfully, so starkly, the tragedy of Spain.

At the end of the performance a well-known radio commentator remarked to me, "They should have shown this at Lake Success." The episode recounted in "Man's Hope" shows the absurdity of trying to end the Spanish drama with a vaudeville skit in which a caretaker regime approved by international reaction takes power in Madrid. Perhaps after seeing it, Mr. Van Kleffens or Senator Connally might answer, "But that all happened during the war. Now nine years have passed and the Spaniards are hungry. Give them a halfway reasonable government and the possibility of buying food abroad, and the matter will be settled."

True, nine years have passed—and they are another piece of evidence against those who helped establish Franco in power—but it would be easy to bring the film up to date by simply inserting two recent episodes of the Spanish resistance. They took place last month and have been related by an important British business man just arrived in New York from Madrid. He has spent most of his life in Spain and is appalled by the stupidity of Anglo-American diplomacy. Here are the stories:

One of the directors of the Bank of Spain, a friend of the Englishman, returned to Madrid after a visit to his country estate in Andalusia. Through some mix-up his chauffeur failed to meet the train; so the banker took a taxi from the station. "Nice weather we're having," he remarked to the driver by way of conversation. "Here we don't talk about the weather but about hunger," was the reply. "Well, in a few months things will be better; a lot of food is coming in from Argentina," said the banker. The driver gave him a grim look: "Things will be better the day we hang Franco. And if you want to call a policeman, go ahead—I'll tell him the same thing." Somewhat disconcerted, the banker cast around for a safer subject. It was close to Christmas, and the idea occurred to him that he might make at least one Spanish family happy. He handed the driver a five-hundred-peseta note and said, "For your kids." The driver pointed to the meter: "The fare is fourteen pesetas, and the usual tip if you like. We Republicans cannot be bought."

The British business man witnessed the second incident himself while motoring in the Sierra de Guadarrama near Madrid. Suddenly a band of men armed with machine-guns and pistols surged down from the hills and stopped the three cars ahead of him. The motorists were forced to hand over whatever money they were carrying, several thousand pesetas in all. "Now," said the man in command, "your names." The names were taken. Each of the tourists received a small piece of paper on which was written:

Received from Mr. . . . pesetas.

To be returned after the restoration of the Republic.

[Signed] The Army of Liberation

"Only idiots," I am quoting the Englishman, "can possibly believe that the problem will be solved by imposing a wretched little king and a puppet regime on the people of Spain."

DEL VAYO

Crude Oil Politics

By KEITH HUTCHISON

IN 1943 E. L. De Golyer, the distinguished oil geologist, reported to the Department of the Interior that the center of gravity of world oil production was moving from the Gulf of Mexico-Caribbean area to the Persian Gulf. That shift will be rapidly accelerated by two pending deals which will make available to the worldwide marketing organizations of Standard Oil of New Jersey and Socony Vacuum immense quantities of Arabian and Iranian petroleum and so displace a large part of the Venezulean production now sold by these companies in Europe. But even more important than the economic implications of these deals are their political consequences, for they suggest that the United States has become the senior member of the partnership which rules the oily destinies of the Middle East.

For a good many months negotiations have been in progress between Standard Oil of New Jersey and Socony Vacuum on the one hand and Standard Oil of California and the Texas Company, joint owners of a vast, rich, and rapidly developing concession in Saudi Arabia, on the other. While final details have still to be arranged, it appears that an agreement has been reached which will give the New Jersey concern a 30 per cent and Socony a 10 per cent interest in the Arabian-American Company—the subsidiary through which the California and Texas companies are exploiting the concession. The advantage to the sellers in this transaction is perhaps primarily financial; they are believed to have spent some $150,000,000 on development and will need at least as much more to build the projected pipe line across the Arabian desert to the Mediterranean. The practically unlimited resources of the two top Rockefeller concerns which are now joining them should insure against any financial difficulties in raising the required capital. In addition, the political reinforcement that the alliance provides probably proved an important consideration.

To Standard Oil of New Jersey and Socony the agreement offers a stake in what may turn out to be one of the most prolific oil fields of all time. Even more important, it assures them of a large supply of oil to feed to their distributing subsidiaries around the world. It is true that Standard of New Jersey owns a major share of Venezuelan oil, the chief source of supply for Europe at present. But rising demand in the Western Hemisphere, coupled with the possibility of lagging production in the United States, may mean that Caribbean supplies will be absorbed by nearer markets. Meanwhile the New Jersey company cannot draw on its fields in Austria, Hungary, and Rumania, which, for the time being at least, are under Soviet control, and Socony is handicapped by difficulties in the Netherlands East Indies that are retarding the reconstruction of its properties there. From Iraq, their only assured Middle Eastern supply until the new agreements become effective, the two companies are obtaining 10,000 barrels a day each—a drop in the bucket compared with average consumption outside the United States and Russia of some 2,400,000 barrels daily.

This unassuaged thirst for oil suggests at least a partial explanation for the second deal, which provides for the purchase by the same two American companies of a large but unspecified quantity of the Anglo-Iranian

Courtesy New York Times

Company's production and for their participation in the construction of yet another trans-Arabian pipe line if terms can be arranged with the Arab rulers through whose territory it will pass. I say partial explanation, since it is possible that Anglo-Iranian pressed for a long-term contract of this kind as a quid pro quo for its approval of the Arabian-American deal.

Its bargaining power stemmed from the American desire to abrogate the "Red Line Agreement," which was signed in 1928 by all the participants in the Irak Petroleum Company. These consist of the four following national groups—the Near East Development Company (controlled jointly by New Jersey and Socony), the D'Arcy Exploration Company (controlled by Anglo-Iranian), the Anglo-Saxon Petroleum Company (controlled by Royal Dutch-Shell), and the Compagnie Française des Pétroles (controlled by the French government). Each of these groups owns 23¾ per cent of Irak Petroleum, the remaining 5 per cent being in the hands of a rather mysterious Armenian gentleman named Gulbenkian, who obtained the original Mosul concession from the Turks and has hung on to his interest like grim death.

These groups, joined together under political pressure for the exploitation of the northern Irak oil deposits, decided that they had better make a pact to abstain from bidding against each other for new concessions. The upshot was the "Red Line Agreement," a long and detailed document which has never been published. In oil circles, however, it is well known that its central feature was an undertaking by the signatories that they would not enter separately into any crude-oil production arrangements within the territories of the old Turkish Empire. Also included, it is believed, were restrictions on competition in the sale of Middle Eastern oil.

Iran, by definition, was outside the Red Line territory, while Kuwait, the small British protectorate at the head of the Persian Gulf where Anglo-Iranian shares a rich concession with the Mellon family's Gulf Oil Company, was expressly excluded. Hence the prospective deal between Anglo-Iranian and the New Jersey and Socony companies does not violate the Red Line Agreement. But the case of the Saudi Arabian concession is very different. That is definitely within the Red Line area, and, in fact, the Irak Petroleum Company, acting as agent for its shareholders did attempt to secure it from King Ibn Saud. However, while it was cumbrously consulting its members, Standard of California and Texas nipped in and obtained the prize.

It has proved a prize indeed. Annual output from the handful of wells drilled has reached 27,000,000 barrels. Proved reserves total six billion barrels; probable reserves are immensely larger. And now Standard of New Jersey and Socony have cut themselves in on this wealth, leaving their fellow-signatories of the Red Line Agreement out in the cold. It is understood that the American companies take the view that the agreement lapsed when France was occupied by the Germans and became technically an enemy. The French government, on learning of this argument, which seems morally dubious even if it is legally sound, protested through its ambassadors in London and Washington. The Compagnie des Pétroles is reported to be starting a lawsuit in London with a view to establishing the currency of the Red Line Agreement. Probably it will be joined in this endeavor by Mr. Gulbenkian. Royal Dutch-Shell has not been heard from, but its interests would also appear to have been damaged by an arrangement which adds enormously to the crude supplies available to its chief rivals in the petroleum-distribution business. Anglo-Iranian, on the other hand, supports the American position; as we have seen, it will be compensated by a twenty-year purchase contract for its own output.

It badly needs such an arrangement, for Anglo-Iranian has never built up a really large sales organization of its own, and having more than doubled production in Iran during the war, it must now find additional outlets. Moreover, it is beginning to obtain an increasing flow of oil from the Kuwait field.

In the years before the war the effect of the Red Line Agreement was to slow up Middle Eastern oil development. Indeed, that may have been one of its purposes, for the big international oil concerns were all anxious lest too rapid an increase in supply should endanger a profitable price structure. But since the war's end, demand both in the United States and abroad has proved well beyond expert estimates, and barring a worldwide depression, increased Middle Eastern production should find an eager market. In any case a policy of checking development is no longer very feasible. The appetites of the Arab potentates have been whetted by news of the rapidly expanding royalty income of King Ibn Saud. They are urging concessionaires to get on with production and hinting that delay might induce them to deal with other oil-thirsty parties—Soviet Russia, for instance.

One group, alarmed by Middle Eastern developments and resentful of the encouragement given to them by the American government, consists of the independent producers of this country. They do not fear the entry of Arabian or Iranian oil into the United States, but they see it filling European needs and so depriving Venezuela and other lands bordering the Caribbean of one of their chief markets. The result, they suspect, will be to divert increasing amounts of Caribbean oil to American consumers and so intensify domestic competition. Undoubtedly the Navy and Interior departments hope that just this will occur. Although spokesmen for the independents insist that talk of declining American reserves is "propaganda," government experts feel that it is necessary to conserve domestic resources for both economic and strategic reasons. It is this difference which underlies the controversy over the Anglo-American Oil Agreement. The independents, charging that the agreement will facilitate both more government regulation and more foreign competition, have lobbied hard against its ratification by the Senate. The success they have scored appears to have been vain. The private treaties which have been discussed in this article seem likely to achieve many of the objectives of the Anglo-American Oil Agreement, and they do not require the approval of the Senate.

Internationally, the consequences of the new Middle Eastern deals may well prove far-reaching. It is useless for the Foreign Office to assert that the agreement between Anglo-Iranian and the American companies is "purely commercial," or for the State Department to pretend that it has merely been "kept informed" about either this or the Arabian-American contract. It is all too obvious that deals of this nature impinge on high policy and equally obvious that the oil companies would not dare to go ahead with them unless sure of government support. And, it must not be forgotten, Anglo-Iranian is controlled by the British government.

The fact is that the United States has now been placed right in the center of the Middle Eastern picture, with the cheerful acquiescence of the British government. This is not likely to alleviate the suspicions of the Soviets, and it will almost certainly spur their efforts to nail down the Azerbaijan concession. The French, as we have noticed, are furious. They see the new deals as part of a sustained effort by the Anglo-Saxon powers to squeeze them out of the Middle East. Moreover, they need more oil that does not have to be paid for in scarce dollars.

There is also the question of Palestine. The enlarged American stake in the Middle East does not necessarily mean greater appeasement of the Arab rulers; they may make threats but they do not want to risk the loss of the wealth which increased oil production promises them. But with three more pipe lines planned to reach the Levantine coast—the existing line from Irak to Haifa and Tripoli is now being duplicated—the strategic and economic importance of Palestine for both Britain and America is greatly enhanced. It would be naive to suppose that the protection of that interest will not prove a major consideration in any program for the solution of the Palestine problem.

IN ONE EAR

BY LOU FRANKEL

ONE of the strong points of radio has been its ability to bring the listener to the ringside of everything from a political convention to D-Day. But with few exceptions the so-called "actuality" programs produced by radio have been flops. Among the exceptions were the front-line war shows and Norman Corwin's British-produced "People to People" series.

So when CBS late in 1946 announced "Cross-Section—U. S. A." in which teams of reporter-interviewers were to bring individuals from various social and economic levels to the microphone to discuss prices and wages, some of us anticipated a dull program. Instead, on Saturday, January 4, at three o'clock E.S.T., we heard one of the best actualities ever broadcast.

Last year CBS did three similar series called cross-sections of the A. F. of L., N. A. M., and C. I. O. This year's expanded program is made possible through the cooperation of the United States Chamber of Commerce, the New Council of American Business, the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, the National Grange, the American Farm Bureau Federation, and the National Farmers' Union.

On the table for the first performance was "the cause and cure of runaway prices." Normally this would have given dull opinions mouthed by people with no ability to project them interestingly. The very different type of show that was put on is what makes "Cross-Section—U. S. A." so important. It had the polish of a studio re-creation, it had pace and contrast, and it had a punch finish—all most unusual qualities in out-of-studio productions, especially when the scene is switched from one place to another.

To get what it wanted, CBS decided that five groups—farmers, production-line and white-collar workers, large and small business men—should be represented, and it sent its reporter-interviewer teams out to find the people. On a farm outside Kansas City they talked with a member of the Grange and his wife; in a kitchen in Detroit, with an automobile worker and his wife. A manufacturer spoke from his plant in Los Angeles and was answered by a member of the New Council of American Business from his wholesale and retail shoe-repair shop in Washington. A Chicago teacher belonging to the American Federation of Teachers spoke from a bowling alley where he works nights. Naturally each participant had a different slant on why prices were zooming and what might be done about it. And that diversity of approach and opinion is what "Cross-Section—U. S. A." hopes to get across to the listener.

Everyone worked from a skeleton script, flexible enough to allow for asides and interruptions. The interviewers adeptly limited themselves to keeping the show moving. Each speaker saved his strongest fact for the end, thus giving the next speaker a logical point to enter the program. There was none of the usual, "And now we switch to John Doakes in Chicago for his views on this subject." The Detroit union man tackled the last thing the farmer said, was in turned tackled by the manufacturer, and so on. After the audience had the feel of the new participant—perhaps thirty seconds of talk did it—the interviewer came in and made the identifications.

It took a lot of preparation and cost a potful of money, for full remote equipment was sent out for each job. By this means the background noises were held down to recognition without intruding: in the Detroit kitchen, for example, when a youngster started to cry, the sound came through effectively without fouling up the show.

It was the little individual touches that made this broadcast the whopping success it was. The farmer told how much he had to pay for overalls and a reaper, compared with a few years ago; the autoworker's wife said that they now eat macaroni instead of meat and the kids get three instead of five quarts of milk a week; the shoe-repair man rapped the meat packers for holding back cattle—and keeping him from getting leather—until they killed the OPA, and then boosting prices; the Chicago science teacher complained that the white-collar worker was caught between the big unions and big business.

In addition, the show had Ed Murrow to give it financial and man-power support, Dwight Cooke as narrator and associate producer, and Bill Downs to put good crews in the field.

BOOKS and the ARTS

From the Kingdom of Necessity

LORD WEARY'S CASTLE. By Robert Lowell. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

MANY of the reviews of "Lord Weary's Castle" have been conscious that it is an event of the order of Auden's first book; I know no poetry since Auden's that is better than Robert Lowell's. Everybody who reads poetry will read it sooner or later. I hope that I can help readers by pointing out its distinguishing features, by tracing its development, and by analyzing the themes that unify it.

Underneath all these poems "there is one story and one story only": when this essential theme or subject is understood, the unity of attitudes and judgments underlying the variety of the poems becomes startlingly explicit. The poems understand the world as a sort of conflict of opposites. In this struggle one opposite is that cake of custom in which all of us lie imbedded like lungfish—the stasis or inertia of the complacent self, the satisfied persistence in evil that is damnation. In this realm of necessity the poems place everything that is closed, turned inward, incestuous, that blinds or binds: the Old Law, imperialism, militarism, capitalism, Calvinism, Authority, the Father, the rich who will "do everything for the poor except get off their backs." But struggling within this like leaven, falling to it like light, is everything that is free or open, that grows or is willing to change: here is the generosity or willingness or openness that is itself salvation; here is "accessibility to experience"; this is the realm of freedom, of the Grace that has replaced the Law, of the perfect liberator whom the poet calls Christ.

Consequently the poems can have two possible movements or organizations: they can move from what is closed to what is open, or from what is open to what is closed. The second of these organizations—which corresponds to an "unhappy ending"—is less common, though there are many good examples of it: The Exile's Return, with its menacing Voilà ch'entraine that transforms the exile's old home into a place where even hope must be abandoned; that extraordinary treatment of the "Oedipus complex," Between the Porch and the Altar, with its four parts each ending in constriction and frustration, its hero who cannot get free of his mother, her punishments, and her world even by dying, but who sees both life and death in terms of her, and thinks at the end that, sword in hand, the Lord "watches me for Mother, and will turn/The bier and baby-carriage where I burn."

But normally the poems move into liberation—even death is seen as liberation, a widening into darkness: that old closed system, Grandfather Arthur Winslow, dying of cancer in his adjusted bed, at the last is the child Arthur whom the swanboats once rode through the Public Garden, whom now "the ghost of risen Jesus walks the waves to run/Upon a trumpeting black swan/Beyond Charles River to the Acheron/Where the wide waters and their voyager are one."

(Compare the endings of The Drunken Fisherman and Dea Roma.) The Death of the Sheriff moves from closure—the "ordered darkness" of the homicidal sheriff, the "loved sightless smother" of the incestuous lovers, the "unsearchable quicksilver heart/Where spiders stare their eyes out at their own/Spitting and knotted likeness"—up into the open sky, to those "light wanderers" the planets, to the "thirsty, Dipper on the arc of night." Just so the cold, blundering, iron confusion of Christmas Eve Under Hooker's Statue ends in flowers, the wild fields, a Christ "once again turned wanderer and child." In Rebellion the son seals "an everlasting pact/With Dives to contract/The world that spreads in pain"; but at last he rebels against his father and his father's New England commercial theocracy, and "the world spread/When the clubbed flintlock broke my father's brain." The italicized words ought to demonstrate how explicitly, at times, these poems formulate the world in the exact terms that I have used.

Where the Rainbow Ends describes in apocalyptic terms the wintry, Calvinist, capitalist—Lowell has Weber's attitude about the connection of capitalism and Calvinism—dead end of God's covenant with man, a frozen Boston where even the cold-blooded serpents "whistle at the cold." (Lowell often uses cold as a plain and physically correct symbol for what is constricted, static, turned in upon itself.) There "the scythers, Time and Death,/Helméd locusts, move upon the tree of breath," of the spirit of man; a bridge curves over Charles River like an ironic parody of the rainbow's covenant; both "the wild ingrafted olive and its root/Are withered" (these are Paul's terms for the Judaism of the Old Law and the Gentile Christianity grafted upon it); "every dove [the Holy Ghost, the bringer of the olive leaf to the Ark] is sold" for a commercialized, legalized sacrifice. The whole system seems an abstract, rationalized "graph of Revelations," of the last accusation and judgment brought against man now that "the Chapel's sharp-shinned eagle shifts its hold/On serpent-Time, the rainbow's epitaph." This last line means exactly what the last line in The Quaker Graveyard—"The Lord survives the rainbow of his will"—means; both are inexpressibly menacing, since they show the covenant as something that binds only us, as something abrogated merely by the passage of time, as a closed system opening not into liberation but into infinite and overwhelming possibility; they have something of the terror, but none of the pity, of Blake's "Time is the mercy of Eternity."

The worshiper climbs to the altar of the terrible I AM like a victim, to breathe the rarefied and intolerable ether of his union with the divinity of the Apocalypse; he despairs even of the wings that beat against his cheek: "What can the dove of Jesus give/You now but wisdom, exile?" When the poem has reached this point of the most extreme closure, when the infinite grace that atones and liberates is seen as no more than the bitter and useless wisdom of the exile, it opens with a rush of acceptant joy into: "Stand and live,/The

From the grass roots of America to the brass tacks of politics!

MINERS AND MILLINERS... farmers and physicians... steelworkers and stenographers... artists and scientists... veterans... Negroes and whites... Protestants, Catholics and Jews... they're in the march! And they want you to join them!

These people came from 21 states of the union... from hundreds of community political action groups... to organize the voice of the common man in our land:

PROGRESSIVE CITIZENS OF AMERICA

PCA is your kind of an organization, formed not by top-level names alone (although some of the outstanding people of the nation are among its founders) but by community leaders from California to Rhode Island who have been fighting for progressive government, not just during election years, but all the time! These people feel—just as you feel—that mere TALK about the rise of reaction is not enough. They feel—just as you must feel—that if we want positive, affirmative government policy to make America the great democratic nation it should be, then it's time for action!

That's why these people have organized PROGRESSIVE CITIZENS OF AMERICA... the membership organization that stands for progressive unity. And that's why PROGRESSIVE CITIZENS OF AMERICA is not torn by internal squabbles... for its founding members well remember Hitler's "divide and conquer" technique.

As Fiorello La Guardia told the founding convention of PCA: "We want action now. The country needs the solution of its economic problems now."

This is PCA's program—your program:

1. To combat reaction's most potent weapon—political apathy—by enlisting millions of people in day-to-day, year-round action on national, state and local issues.
2. To expand the existing progressive groups into a nationwide frame-work of community political organizations which can challenge reaction's machines on their home grounds.

It's a realistic, workable program... a desperately needed program... but it can succeed only with your help... because it's your program.

Remember the slick, masterfully-organized machine the reactionaries have built to defeat you and your ideas. Will you sit on the sidelines while that machine crushes everything you believe in? Or will you join your fellow progressives in a toe-to-toe fight against anti-democratic forces? Remember: there's a job for you in PCA, within the limits of your time, interests and inclination. And if you can't fight in person—let your dollars fight! Think for a moment about how much your ideas, your beliefs, your personal liberties are worth. Then send your contribution to the one organization which has the facilities, the experience—and above all the will—to fight your fight for a better America and a better world.

Listen to Henry A. Wallace:

"Your job as a progressive organization is to reach that majority of the population which is potentially progressive but, which due to lack of information, is in the hands of the conservatives at the present time. If you succeed, the pattern of Post-War II will be different from that of Post-War I. In your hands rests the responsibility for leadership."

—from Henry A. Wallace's address at the founding convention of PCA

Let Your Action Fight Reaction

Join Progressive Citizens of America now and watch your contribution—of time, talent, money—turn America back toward its democratic goals. PCA needs every bit of support you can give. If you can't work actively in this new and vital organization, at least get out your check book and let your dollars work for you! Make your check out now and get your dollars into the fight!

PROGRESSIVE CITIZENS OF AMERICA

Join with such Progressive Citizens as these:

Partial List

JO DAVIDSON
DR. FRANK KINGDON
MICHAEL NISSELSON
HERMAN SHULMIN
ELMER A. BENSON
VAN BROOKS
EVANS F. CARLSON
NORMAN CORWIN
BARTLEY C. CRUM

CLARK FOREMAN
ROBERT F. KENNY JACK KROLL
FREDRIC MARCH
PAUL ROBESON
EDWARD G. ROBINSON
DR. HARLOW SHAFLEY
J. RAYMOND WALEH
A. F. WHITNEY

ARE UNITING FOR ACTION!

SIGN UP FOR ACTION!

PROGRESSIVE CITIZENS OF AMERICA
205 East 42nd Street, New York 17, N.Y.

☐ Enroll me as a member of PCA. Enclosed is $3.00 annual dues, $1.00 of which covers a year's subscription to The Progressive Citizen. But dues alone can't carry on the full fight. Enclosed is my additional contribution of ☐ $5, ☐ $10, ☐ $25, ☐ $50, ☐ $100, ☐ $250, ☐ $500, ☐ $1000.

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

ZONE _____ STATE _____

OCCUPATION _____

dove has brought an olive branch to eat." The dove of Jesus brings to the worshiper the olive branch that shows him that the flood has receded, opening the whole earth for him; the olive branch of peace and reconciliation; the olive branch that he is "to eat" as a symbol of the eaten flesh and blood of Christ, of atonement, identification, and liberation. Both the old covenant and the new still hold, nothing has changed: here as they were and will be, are life and salvation.

Lowell seems a strange opposite of the usual Catholic convert, who distrusts freedom as much as he needs bondage, and who sees the world as a liberal chaos which can be ordered and redeemed only by that rigid and final Authority to which men submit without question. Lowell reminds one more of those heretical enthusiasts, often disciplined and occasionally sanctified or excommunicated, who are more at home in the Church Triumphant than in the church of this world, which is one more state; a phrase like Lowell's "St. Peter, the distorted key" is likely to be appreciated outside the church and overlooked inside it, ad maiorem gloriam of Catholic poetry. In Lowell's poems the Son is pure liberation from the incestuous, complacent, inveterate evil of established society, of which the Law is a part—although the Father, Jehovah, has retained both the violence necessary to break up this inertia and a good deal of the menacing sternness of Authority as such. (It is interesting to compare the figure of the Uncle in early Auden, who sanctifies rebellion by his authority; the authority of Lowell's Christ is sanctified by his rebellion or liberation.)

Anyone who compares Lowell's earlier and later poems will see this movement from constriction to liberation as his work's ruling principle of growth. The grim, violent, sordid constriction of his earliest poems—most of them omitted from this book—seems to be temperamental, the Old Adam which the poet grew from and partially transcends; and a good deal of what was excessive in the wonderful rhetorical machine of a poem like The Quaker Graveyard in Nantucket, which catches and twists to pieces the helplessly enjoying reader, is gone from his latest poems, or else dramatically justified and no longer excessive. The Quaker Graveyard is a baroque work, like "Paradise Lost"; but the coiling violence of the rhetoric, the harshly stubborn intensity that accompanies its verbs and verbals, the clustering stresses learned from accentual verse, come from a man contracting every muscle, grinding his teeth together till his shut eyes ache. Lowell's later work has moved in the direction of the poem's quiet contrast-section, Walsingham; the denunciatory prophetic tone has disappeared, along with the early satiric effects that were one of the poet's weaknesses. The later poems depend less on rhetorical description than on dramatic speech; their wholes have escaped from the hypnotic bondage of the details. Often the elaborate rhetorical stanzas have changed into a novel sort of dramatic or narrative couplet, run-on but with heavily stressed rhymes. A girl's nightmare, in the late Katherine's Dream, is far more open, classical, and speech-like than the poet's own descriptive meditation in an earlier work like Christmas at Black Rock. It is important to understand this development; the reviews I have read have not realized that it exists.

Lowell has a completely unscientific, but thoroughly historical mind. (It is literary and traditional as well: he uses the past so effectively because he thinks so much as it did.) Lowell's present contains the past—especially Rome, the late Middle Ages, and New England—as an operative skeleton just under the skin. This is rare among contemporary poets, who look at the past as Blücher looked at London: "What a city to sack!" (Actually he said, "What a mix-up!" But this fits, too.) War, Trade, and Jehovah march side by side through these centuries: it is the fundamental likeness of the past and present, and not their disparity, which is brought out. "Cold/Snaps the bronze toes and fingers of the Christ/My father fetched from Florence, and the dead/Chatters to nothing in the thankless ground/His father screwed from Charlie Stark and sold/To the selectmen." This is the history of New England's nineteenth century in a sentence. Lowell's period pieces, which range from Propertius to Jonathan Edwards, are notable partly for their details—which are sometimes as magically and professionally illusionary as those of "I, Claudius"—but mainly for the empathy, the historical identification, that underlie the details. These period pieces are intimately related to Lowell's adaptations of poems from other languages; both are valuable as ways of getting a varied, extensive, and alien experience into his work. Dismissing these adaptations as "translations" is like dismissing To Celia or Cathay, and betrays an odd dislike or ignorance of an important and traditional procedure of poets.

Lowell is an extremely professional poet, and the degree of intensity of his poems is equalled by their degree of organization. Inside its elaborate stanzas the poem is put together like a mosaic: the shifts of movement, the varied pauses, the alternation in the length of sentences, the counterpoint between lines and sentences, are the outer form of a subject matter that has been given a dramatic, dialectical internal organization; and it is hard to exaggerate the strength and life, the constant richness and surprise of metaphor and sound and motion, of the language itself. The organization of Lowell's poems resembles that of traditional English poetry—especially when compared to that type of semi-imagist modern organization in which the things of the poem seem to marshal themselves like Dryden's atoms—but often this is complicated by stream-of-consciousness, dream, or dramatic-monologue types of structure. This makes the poems more difficult, but it is worth the price—a great many of the most valuable dramatic effects cannot be attained inside a more logical or abstract organization. Lowell's poetry is a unique fusion of modernist and traditional poetry, and there exist conjoined in it certain effects that one would hitherto have thought mutually exclusive; however, it is essentially a post- or anti-modernist poetry, and as such is certain to be influential.

Lowell is wonderfully good at discovering powerful, homely, grotesque, but exactly appropriate particulars for his poems. "Actuality is something brute," said Peirce. "There is no reason in it. I instance putting your shoulder against a door and trying to force it open against an unseen, silent, and unknown resistance." The things in Lowell's poems have, necessarily, been wrenched into formal shape, organized under terrific pressure, but they keep to an extraordinary degree their stubborn, unmoved toughness, their senseless originality and contingency: no poet is more notable for what, I have read, Duns Scotus calls baeccitas—the contrary, persisting, and singular thinginess of every being in the world; but this detailed factuality is particularly effective because it sets off, or is set off by, the elevation and rhetorical sweep characteristic of much of the best poetry of the past. Lowell is obviously a haptic rather than a visual type: a poem like Colloquy in Black Rock has some of the most extraordinary kinesthetic effects in English, perfect duplications of what is being described. It is impossible not to notice the weight and power of his lines—most others look a little threadbare or transparent beside them. Because of passages like

In the great ash-pit of Jehoshaphat
The bones cry for the blood of the white whale,
The fat flukes arch and whack about its ears,
The death-lance churns into the sanctuary, tears
The gun-blue swingle, heaving like a flail,
And hacks the coiling life out . . .

the smooth, calm, and flowing ease of some passages, the flat ease of the ordinary speech of others, have more than their usual effectiveness: the dead mistress of Propertius, a black nail dangling from a finger, Lethe oozing from her nether lip, in the end can murmur to the "apple-sweetened Anio":

. . . Anio, you will please
Me if you whisper upon sliding knees:
"Propertius, Cynthia is here:
She shakes her blossoms when my waters clear."

The poems' wit is often the wit of things: the "poised relations sipping sherry/And tracking up the carpet," the "postgirl sounding her French horn" over the snows of Maine, the "stern Colonial magistrates and wards/of Charles the Second." The "corn-fed mouse/Reined in his bestial passions"; the "red-flanneled madmen looked through bars." One laughs out in church.

Lowell, at his best and latest, is a dramatic poet: he presents people, actions, speeches, things as they feel and look to people; the poet's generalizations are usually implied, and the poem's explicit generalizations are there primarily because they are dramatically necessary—it is not usually the poet who means them. He does not present themes or generalizations but a world—and the differences and similarities between it and the ordinary one bring home to us themes, generalizations, and the poet himself. There is never any exploitation of the "personality" of the poet; the I who stands meditating by Hooker's statue or the Quaker graveyard is closer to the different I's of the dramatic monologues than to the man who wrote them. It is partly because of this that atheists are vexed by his Catholic views, and Catholics by his heretical ones, so much less than they normally would be.

But there are other reasons. The poet's rather odd and imaginative Catholicism is thoroughly suitable to his mind, which is so traditional and dramatic that no images from the sciences, next to none from philosophy, occur in his poems. Such a Catholicism is thoroughly suited to literature, since it is essentially literary, anthropomorphic, emotional. It is an advantage to the poet to have a frame of reference, terms of generalization, which are themselves human, emotional, and effective as literature. "Bodily Changes in Fear, Rage, and Hunger" may let the poet know more about the anger of Achilles, but it is hard for him to have to talk about adrenalin and the thalamus; and when the arrows of Apollo are transformed into "a lack of adequate sanitary facilities," everything is lost but understanding. (This helps explain the dependence of contemporary poetry on particulars, emotions, things—its generalizations, where they are most effective, are fantastic, though often traditionally so.) Naturally the terms of scientific explanation cannot have these poetic and emotional effects, since it is precisely by the exclusion of such effects that science has developed. Lowell's Catholicism represents effective realities of human behavior and desire, regardless of whether it is true, false, or absurd; and, as everyone must realize, it is possible to tell part of the truth about the world in terms that are false, limited, and fantastic—else how should we have told it? There is admittedly no "correct" or "scientific" view of a great many things that a poet writes about—values, emotions, and so forth—and he has to deal with them in dramatic and particular terms, if he has foregone the advantage of pre-scientific ideologies like Christianity or Marxism. (Of course it seems to me an advantage that he almost necessarily foregoes; I remember writing about contemporary religious poems, "It is hard to enjoy the ambergris for thinking of all those suffering whales," and most people will feel this when they encounter a passage in Lowell telling them how Bernadette's miraculous vision of Our Lady "puts out reason's eyes." It does indeed.)

It is unusually difficult to say which are the best poems in "Lord Weary's Castle": at least a dozen are realized past changing, triumphs that vary only in scope and intensity—a number of others are poems that almost any living poet would be pleased to have written. But certainly some of the most wonderful things in the book are Where the Rainbow Ends, Between the Porch and the Altar, The Quaker Graveyard in Nantucket, Colloquy in Black Rock, The Death of the Sheriff (especially the first of the two poems that compose it), and At the Indian-Killer's Grave. Close to these are The Exile's Return, The Ghost, Charles the Fifth and the Peasant, Death from Cancer, Mr. Edwards and the Spider, Christmas Eve under Hooker's Statue, Mary Winslow—and I cannot leave unmentioned poems like After the Surprising Conversions, The Drunken Fisherman, The Blind Leading the Blind, The Shako, France, and New Year's Day. I do not list a number of small or partial successes that will delight anyone who loves poetry.

When I reviewed Lowell's first book I finished by saying, "Some of the best poems of the next years ought to be written by him." The appearance of "Lord Weary's Castle" makes me feel less like Adams or Leverrier than like a rain-maker who predicts rain, and gets a flood which drowns everyone in the county. A few of these poems, I believe, will be read as long as men remember English.

The Hindemith-Balanchine-Seligman ballet, "The Four Temperaments," will be repeated by the Ballet Society on May 14, not—as was announced by The Nation last week—on January 14.

BRIEFER COMMENT

Growing Up in Salonika

IN MARCH, 1936, upon a morning of crystalline sunlight, as I was walking down a main street in Salonika toward the waterfront, I heard behind me a group of men talking in Spanish. It was not a contemporary Castilian, yet it was a cultured and precise language they were speaking; having read Menéndez Pidal's marvelous work on the Spanish romances preserved by the Jews of the Spanish diaspora, I turned and boldly addressed the group in the language of the country from which I had just arrived. As a result of that somewhat brash confrontation my memory of the four days I spent in Salonika is among the pleasantest memories of my life. "Farewell to Salonika" by Leon Sciaky (A. A. Wyn, $2.75), might almost have been written for my pleasure. As I read it I was often tempted to write to the author and tell him some unimportant fact about his city as it was in 1936; that the White Tower erected by a Venetian architect for a seventeenth-century despot was then in use as Boy Scout headquarters, that the removal of the great triumphal arch was in debate, and so on.

Yet my pleasure cannot have been a purely personal one, for "Farewell to Salonika" is an altogether charming book, so simply and truthfully written that it demands no intimate knowledge of the place and persons presented. It is a record of growing up, a family portrait in which the history of a Jewish family, of Spanish Sephardim, is given its proper social context. The Salonika that one reads about is not only a fascinating and complex city in which many national and cultural strains run side by side, but it is the critical city of Aegean politics. The breakdown of the Turkish Empire and its consequences for Balkan affairs are better understood when one has read this book.

But it is not the political value of the book that should be emphasized so much as its quiet charm, its unpretentious and easy portrayal of a cultural pattern through an account of an engaging family. "Farewell to Salonika" is a warm and softly luminous book. I am grateful for the chance that brought it my way.

RALPH BATES

A Summary of the Recent Past

IN "THE FUTURE IN PERSPECTIVE" (Putnam's, $4), Sigmund Neumann provides a concise recapitulation of how we traveled to the present moment in history from the beginning of World War I. Describing the era as the Second Thirty Years' War, Mr. Neumann writes in the sober manner of a Dutch uncle explaining things "To a Friend in Need of an Answer." Those who have made it their business to keep informed on current affairs and their background will probably find nothing newly enlightening in the book, and its scope is too modest to make it useful as a reference, but as an introduction to the study of our times and the peace it must devise "The Future in Perspective" is sound and solid, altogether commendable.

Most of the text is concerned with the interplay of the national forces of Germany, France, Great Britain, Russia, and the United States; the affairs of other European states are sketched in more briefly, while the Far East does not come into the picture until 1931. Mr. Neumann gives social and economic matters adequate attention. The book abounds in lively characterizations of the leading statesmen and politicians of the time.

Mr. Neumann interprets the Second Thirty Years' War in terms of "three aspects—international, national, and personal." Now, at the war's end, if it is the end, nationalism "is on trial as the organizing principle of world order." Admitting at the close of the volume the difficulties of Big Three collaboration in making peace, Mr. Neumann, who began on a higher note of optimism in this connection, admits that "the list of missed opportunities is appalling and the agenda of unsolved matters still growing. We have come dangerously close to losing the fruits of victory altogether." But he assures his friend that "an international development beyond the existing competition of the powers seems to be assured." Democracy, he points out, must "succeed in re-integrating the amorphous millions." The book is written in the faith that "neither anarchic nor totalitarian existence is the design of our age."

W. J. GOLD

A Lower-Case Santa Claus

THIS MORALITY in five scenes—"Santa Claus," by E. E. Cummings (Holt, $1.50)—contains some moving passages but seems on the whole one of the author's less happy efforts. Perhaps the tradition of the morality play requires a certain grimness: the devil in red, or death in black or a skeleton rig, making with antics, and the sermon coming down like a club on the heads of the audience; perhaps this particular morality would play better than it reads. The gospel of love, the good Lord knows, is a fine thing to preach, but here Mr. Cummings, it seems to me, is at once too simple and too ecclesiastical, lacking the lyrical lift and lilt which made his "1x1," for instance, a much more joyous invitation to become converted.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

Modern Migrations

DURING THE TIME of the religious wars in feudal Europe the prevailing rule was, Cuius regio, eius religio—in whose region I live, his religion I profess. After the birth of the nation-states such ideological adjustments became less frequent. When in World War I the three multi-national states of Europe—the Russian, the Ottoman, and the Austrian empire—collapsed, quite a number of new national states with national minorities rose from their ashes. Special minority treaties attempted to protect the rights of these minority groups with more or less success. The victors of World War II, realizing the failure of these treaties, agreed to get rid of the troublesome minority groups by voluntary or compulsory resettlement. The Convention of Lausanne of 1923, exchanging Graeco-Turkish minorities, had set a precedent for the German-Italian agreement of 1939, and thus inaugurated the vast transfer program of the Third Reich. In "European Population Transfers, 1939-1945" (Oxford, $5) Joseph Schechtman proves that two transfers "to which no blitz tempo was applied," namely, the Tyrolean and the Graeco-

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
51st ST.
86th ST.
86th ST.
near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th St.
RECENT RIVERSIDE
ROYAL

RKO NOW

"Exciting . . . dialogue is terse, intelligent and amusing."
—New York World-Telegram

JOHN GARFIELD • GERALDINE FITZGERALD

'Nobody Lives Forever' with WALTER BRENNAN • FAYE EMERSON

— AND —

"PLAINSMAN AND THE LADY"

WILLIAM ELLIOTT • VERA HENNA RALSTON

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE
HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
WYNERS

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island

Queens
MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

Manhattan
COLONIAL
B'way & 62 St.

"COMPELLING THRILLER."—New York Herald Tribune

OLIVIA DE HAVILLAND
LEW AYRES

'THE DARK MIRROR'

with THOMAS MITCHELL

— AND —

'GENTLEMAN JOE PALOOKA'

LEON ERROL • JOE KIRKWOOD Jr. • ELYSE KNOX

20th CENTURY-FOX Presents

James CAGNEY

13 RUE

MADELEINE

with RICHARD ANNABELLA • CONTE • FRANK LATIMORE

Directed by Henry Hathaway • Produced by Louis de Rochemont

— On Stage —

GRACIE FIELDS

THE DEBONAIRS

BEATRICE SECKLER JEAN GRAMAS

Extra Added Attraction

ARTHUR BLAKE

Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th Street

PARAMOUNT Presents

Loretta YOUNG • David HIVEN

In HAL WALLIS' Production

'The Perfect Marriage'

Directed by LEWIS ALLEN

A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

— IN PERSON —

THE MILLS BROTHERS

OLGA SAN JUAN • TIM HERBERT

EXTRA ADDED ATTRACTION

ELLIOT LAWRENCE

AND HIS ORCHESTRA

NOW
TIMES SQUARE

PARAMOUNT

Midnight
Feature
Nightly

STAGE PLAYS

RICHARD RODGERS & OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN, 2nd, present

"A NEW HIT"—Morehouse, Sun

HELEN HAYES

— in —

"HAPPY BIRTHDAY"

A New Comedy by ANITA LOOS • Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN

44th St. West of Broadway. Evenings 8:30.
BROADHURST Thea., Matinees: Wednesday and Saturday 2:40.

"BULL'S EYE"—Barnes, Herald Tribune

ETHEL MERMAN

IN THE MUSICAL SMASH

"ANNIE GET YOUR GUN"

Music & Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN • Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS

with RAY MIDDLETON • Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN

IMPERIAL Theatre 45th St., West of Broadway. Evenings at 8:30.
Matinees: Wednesday and Saturday at 2:30.

"A smash hit of enormous proportions." —
Ward Morehouse, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN

LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way. CH 4-4255

Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wednesday & Saturday 2:40.

"Must be seen. . . . Warming, charming chuckling."
—Morehouse, Sun

MAX GORDON Presents

FREDRIC MARCH • FLORENCE ELDRIDGE in YEARS AGO

The New Smash Hit by RUTH GORDON

Directed by Garson Kanin

MANFIELD THEA., 47th St. W. of B'way. CI 9-9056

Evgs. 8:40 Mats. Wed. & Sat. at 2:40

MELVYN DOUGLAS & HEERMAN LEVIN present

"CALL ME MISTER"

THE NATION'S TOP MUSICAL REVUE

Songs by Harold Rome • Sketches by Arnold Auerbach • Staged by Robert Gordon

New York—NATIONAL Thea.—with Jane KEAN
Boston—SHUBERT Thea.—with Betty KEAN

"BROADWAY'S BIGGEST REVUE HIT!"—Life Magazine

"RATTLING GOOD THEATRE."—Atkinson, Times

JOSE FERRER IN
CYRANO de BERGERAC

FRANCES REID • RALPH CLANTON • HIRAM SHERMAN

PAULA LAURENCE • FRANCES COMPTON

ERNEST GRAVES • WILLIAM WOODSON

BARRYMORE THEA. 47th Street West of Broadway. CI 4-0390
Eves., incl. Sun., 8:30. Mats. Sat. & Sun., 2:30

Buy Your Books through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price post-free if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D. No C. O. D.'s outside of United States. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible. Make checks payable to The Nation.

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION

The NATION

20 VESEY STREET

NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

Bulgarian exchanges, "failed to achieve their objective of eliminating the minority groups." After a conscientious examination of the German resettlement program and of the transfer of German and non-German minorities, the author concludes that populations should not be transferred until all other agencies have been explored. If the transfer becomes an inescapable last resort, then it should be an all-inclusive measure, since its objective is not to remove a minority group but to remove a minority problem. It is a pity that this well-documented, scholarly study was not available at the time of the Potsdam declaration. Perhaps the framers of the peace treaties will read it and do their best to eliminate the clash of national emotions in order to avoid the cruelties of population transfers.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

Ave Atque Vale

TO AVOID THE SNARES of metaphysics in the face of approaching death is the supreme test for the atheist, the hedonist, the scientific philosopher, or the writer whose search for truth has led him into the jungle of empirical fact. At some crucial point in his existence, when death quite suddenly becomes an inevitable and personal event, there is apt to be a retreat, more or less dignified, from the defiant frontier reached by the bold and more youthful mind: Aldous Huxley abandons his brave new world for the timeless truths of the neo-Buddhists; Somerset Maugham in his premature valedictory pays graceful lip-service to the Great Unknown; and only a courageous few, like Lord Chesterfield, bow themselves out to the same tune to which they danced in youth.

It is to the eternal credit of H. G. Wells, who spent most of his highly profitable seventy-nine years in a ceaseless pursuit of truth and a relentless attack on human stupidity, bigotry, and bogus morality, that his final conclusions on the nature of life as expressed in "Mind at the End of Its Tether" (Didier, $2.50) yield not an inch to the terrors of the grave. Though he wrote the book after his doctor had informed him of his imminent death, he died with the full courage of his conviction that there is no particular reason for life, that the general prognosis for the future history of man is discouraging, and that the reign of Homo sapiens on this planet is probably nearly over unless he pulls himself up sharply by his own boot-straps.

How much more stimulating to be told to face the facts and to be given to understand that the ultimate responsibility is a personal one than to listen to Mr. O'Neill's lengthy sermon to the effect that to retire into an ivory tower and lock the door is one solution, or to read Gerald Heard's "Pain, Sex, and Time," based on the same initial premises of the breakdown of evolution and the atrophy of Homo sapiens, and then be offered the sop of westernized Yoga. Mr. Wells extends no comfort and quibbles not at all; he simply states that he has lived cheerfully and abundantly and enjoyed it, and that, despite all the evidence to the contrary, it is in his nature to believe that man will struggle on to accompany the planet to its end. Such conclusions demand real courage, and it enhances Mr. Wells's reputation and the value of his previous work that his final testament is so uncompromising.

The book also contains a short fantasy, The Happy Turning, described by the author as "a dream of life." It is a sharp little satire in which Wells attacks the divines, the politicians, the B. B. C., and everything else he can lay his hands on. It is extremely witty and leaves one with an acute sense of loss that H. G. Wells will write no more.

ANTHONY BOWER

Dos Passos and the War

WHETHER HE IS WRITING about the adventures of Roger Williams in Winthrop's Boston and Cromwell's England, as in his strangely neglected "The Ground We Stand On," or about his own adventures in World War I and the fantastic between-wars world, John Dos Passos has a way of getting at the roots of the matter which makes his reporting, historical or contemporary, a creative art. Myopic as an owl, Dos can nevertheless spot those flying fragments, overlooked by the run of his fellows, which will build up into a memorable whole under his sensitive artistry.

He had come back from covering the domestic war scene in "The State of the Nation" and was digging around in the library doing research for a book on Jefferson when he took an assignment from Life as a correspondent, starting for the Pacific islands in December, 1944. What he saw and heard and felt in the last days of the war and the start of the international crack-up called the peace he has put down stirring in "Tour of Duty" (Houghton Mifflin, $3).

It may be that, like this reviewer, you don't want to learn about war any more. Just the same you should go along with Dos Passos, hearing big guns and little fired in anger, talking to G. I.'s and officers, "strangers and afraid in a world they never made," getting down the authentic speech of admirals and ensigns and gobs and seabees and the type-writing men of the "chair-borne divisions," and you will like the going, rough as it often is.

There will be many, though, who won't like this book. Some of the stuffed shirts in the AMG, for example, and all the Communists who have long had Dos on the index expurgatorius and will put him further into the Thirteenth Street doghouse after reading what he has to say about the Russians in the occupied areas. Now I hope Dos Passos can get back to Jefferson. Jefferson is a pretty good man to get back to these days, and John Dos Passos is the man to bring the Virginian, with his "passion for peace," alive in our times.

MCALISTER COLEMAN

GIFT PARCEL

FOR OVERSEAS (All 4 Zones in Germany)

No. 35A $7.68

including postage, packing, insurance, etc.

1 lb. butter	1/2 lb. milk powder
1 lb. honey	1/2 lb. sweet cocoa milk
2 oz. instant coffee	1 lb. cream of rice
1 lb. beef roast	1 lb. dried fruits
1/4 lb. chocolate bar	2 packs cigarettes

We specialize in making up parcels to order

Ask for further information

J. KOHLS, Personal Parcel Service
315 W. 102 St., New York 25, N. Y. AC 2-3844

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

GEORGE KELLY'S "The Fatal Weakness" has now been running at the Royale Theater for some time. It is not, I believe, one of the outstanding hits, but Mr. Kelly is too interesting and too original a playwright not to deserve notice even at this late date. Moreover, the play gives Miss Ina Claire an opportunity to demonstrate that she is still quite the most accomplished comedienne on our stage.

Mr. Kelly had his great and apparently easy success a generation ago. Then, by what seemed like deliberate intention, he changed his whole manner, and after a series of failures stopped writing entirely until "The Deep Mrs. Sykes" had a success of esteem some eighteen months ago. The new play is lighter in tone than the last-mentioned piece, but it is obviously the product of the same unusual kind of interest in the same unusual kind of character problem, and in both cases too large a part of every audience seemed to find itself in a state of minor bafflement. Either, it seemed to feel, it did not quite know what Mr. Kelly was driving at or, if it did, it failed to share his interest in the subject under examination.

Any attempt to state even the main features of the story is bound to create a false impression. If I say, for instance, that it is about a middle-aged woman who rather sadly agrees to divorce her husband when she learns that he is in love with someone else—that will sound like a very commonplace domestic drama. If, on the other hand, I should choose to explain that the story deals with an attractive but infantile sentimentalist so devoted to weddings that she insists upon dressing very much like a bride to attend the marriage of her former husband—that will certainly suggest a rather eccentric farce. In actual fact, however, "The Fatal Weakness" is neither commonplace domestic drama nor eccentric farce, but a character comedy whose charm as well as whose somewhat baffling quality depends upon the fact that it is a shrewd, cool analysis of a rather unusual woman looked at from an even more unusual point of view. All the incidentals of the play, including the whole background of upper middle-class manners, are sharply sketched in, and the ready laughter of the audience is evidence enough that these incidentals are recognized and appreciated. In their case the method and the style are familiar. The spectator knows where he is and thinks that he knows what to expect. But neither the action nor the author's commentary ever falls into any of the familiar grooves one is perpetually expecting it to find. Mr. Kelly rejects all the ready-made patterns which would immediately render his play comfortably classifiable and thus defeats all the easy expectations.

"I don't even know," so I heard one spectator complain, "whether this woman is supposed to be intelligent or a fool, sympathetic or unsympathetic. I don't even know whether the author likes her or not." And the doubt, so it seems to me, was not because Mr. Kelly did not answer all those questions as clearly as they need be or could be answered, but because he was observing his queer specimen as freshly as he could and refusing to attribute to her any of the traits which have come, by tradition, to serve as labels easily translated to mean "I approve" or "I disapprove." Here, he says, is a woman well meaning and, in many ways, charming. But her emotions are not very real, certainly not very grown up. To her husband she has never been able to give anything except the romantic emotionalism of an adolescent. She thinks that she loves him, and she can prove it by weeping over his loss. But she weeps almost as much at the weddings of people she doesn't even know, and her emotion goes hardly deeper in the one case than in the other. Some women make bad wives, not because they are wicked or hateful, but simply because they never get beyond sentiment, and though that is something for which moral condemnation is too severe, it is also something from which there is no redemption, however freely forgiveness may be granted. This particular woman will lose her husband, and it will make her genuinely sad to know that she has lost him. But the weight of none of her emotions will ever be more than she can easily bear.

Is this a subject too slight or too elusive for a play? Many would say so. It is, they would argue, rather a subject for a novel or a novelette, for a kind of tenuous analysis somewhat in the manner of Henry James, or at least in that of one of his less weighty followers. But I know of no solid reason why this should be so, for Mr. Kelly, it seems to me, actually makes his point as clearly and as interestingly as it could be made, and he disappoints only the conventional expectation that a play shall have a somewhat sharper impact and depend upon bolder strokes. What he has given us is not precisely what I usually expect in the theater, but I was, nevertheless, very well satisfied to find it there. And if Mr. Kelly scorns to sacrifice everything else to the theatrically effective scene, it is certainly not because he cannot write such scenes when he wants to do so, as he beautifully demonstrates in his second act, when he works out the most ingenious variation of the standard "dinner is served" curtain which it has been my pleasure as a professional to see in a long, long time.

In general Mr. Kelly's women tend to be far better than his men; the two male characters who appear in this play are mere sticks, but Jennifer Howard, the young daughter of Clare Eames and Sidney Howard, gives a beautiful performance in the role of the heroine's daughter, and Miss Claire actually interprets and enriches her part as few actresses ever succeed in doing. Time and time again a gesture, an intonation, or merely a fleeting expression points up or explains a line which might otherwise fail of its intention; her intelligence as well as her competence must have been a joy to Mr. Kelly, who acted as his own director.

CONTRIBUTORS

RALPH BATES is the author of "The Fields of Paradise," "The Olive Field," and other novels.

W. J. GOLD was formerly managing editor of the Virginia Quarterly.

ANTHONY BOWER was formerly film critic for The Nation.

MCALISTER COLEMAN, a left-wing journalist, is the author of "Men and Coal."

WHERE HENRY WALLACE WENT WRONG

FEBRUARY ISSUE OF by Louis Fischer
THIS MONTH MAGAZINE
Newsstands or 247 Park Ave. N. Y. 17

The last book—His Testament!
H. G. WELLS' Mind at the End of its Tether
or bookstores $2.50
660 Madison Ave., New York 17

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

UNTIL NOW foreign recordings have been discussed in this column only when they have been issued in American pressings. The foreign pressings imported by a few shops have not been discussed because I would either have had to listen to them on the inadequate phonographs in the shops or—if I had been allowed to borrow them to play on my own phonograph—spend an impossible amount of time and energy carrying them back and forth, and this for the benefit of the small number of readers who were interested in them and willing to pay for them at the rate of $2.50 a 12-inch record.

But now Decca is giving imported pressings of the new London Decca recordings—which cost $20 a record—the same distribution as its own records and is sending out copies for review.

Among the first releases are Stravinsky's "Petrushka"—the entire work, not just the usual suite of excerpts—performed by Ansermet with the London Philharmonic (Set ED 2—EDA 2 for automatic machines; $11), Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, performed by Unger with the National Symphony (Set ED 1; $9), and Beethoven's Overture "Leonore" No. 2, performed by van Beinum with the Amsterdam Concertgebouw Orchestra (Set ED 4; $5). Ansermet conducted the first performances of "Petrushka" here for the Diaghilev company in 1916, and the performance on the records is superb, with much of the power of Stravinsky's recorded performance of the suite, and none of the nervous tension and excitement of Stokowski's recorded performance of the entire work. On the other hand, those who know Mendelssohn's lovely symphony through Koussevitsky's and Toscanini's winged performances will not enjoy Unger's slow and ponderous progress through it; nor will anyone who has heard the "Leonore" No. 2 played by Toscanini be content with what van Beinum makes of it.

The "full frequency range recordings" of these performances and the expensive London Gramophone machines you may have seen advertised are designed for each other; and the combination of recording and machine produces a sound that is not only beautifully rich and spacious but remarkable in its depth and roundness in space (since so much is made of the extended frequency range—to 14,000 cycles—of both recording and machine, let me add that the sound has the beauty I have described not when the range is out to maximum but when it is considerably reduced by the first step down of the machine's treble control; and that microphone placement is largely responsible for the remarkable depth in space). With the American machines on which I have played them—machines which produce the beautiful sound from the Beecham recording of Mozart's "Linz" Symphony, from the recent Victor recordings of the Chicago Symphony, and from all other good recordings—the sound of the English Deccas is unsatisfactory. It retains the depth in space; but when it is sufficiently bright it is rough or edged, and when not rough or edged it is poorly balanced, dull, and heavy; and the "Petrushka" is hazy with the reverberation of the empty hall.

I should mention that these English Decca records fit on the spindles of American record-changers so loosely as to be not perfectly centered on the turntable, and therefore to produce a wavering in pitch.

The imported Italian C.E.T.R.A. records are available only in small quantity at present, and at the staggering price of $3.25 a record (excise tax included); but I was interested in them because they offered the first complete recordings of Haydn's "Seasons" and Verdi's "Forza del Destino" and a new recording of Mozart's Requiem; and the importer was willing to take the trouble involved in making it possible for me to hear them on a good machine. So I can report that Gui conducts a routine performance of "The Seasons" (10 records), with good singing by Gabriella Gatti, Francesco Albanese, and Luciano Neroni. Also that the first measures of the Overture to "La Forza del Destino" shocked me with the slackness of Marinuzzi's conducting—the slackness of a typical performance of Italian opera that leaves the singers free to indulge in their mannerisms and excesses—the singers in this case being the soprano Maria Caniglia, an excellent baritone whose name I am not sure of, and an inferior tenor named Galiano Massini (18 records). But as against this slackness there was in De Sabata's superb modeling of the sound of Mozart's Requiem a sustained impetus and continuous control that were reminiscent of Toscanini's; and the performance (8 records)—with beautiful singing by Pia Tassinari, Ebe Stignani, Ferruccio Tagliavini, and Italo Tajo, and marvelously recorded—is one of the greatest things ever put on records.

MONEY-SAVING MAGAZINE COMBINATIONS

The NATION

- ☐ with Harper's Magazine . $8.50 You Save $2.50
☐ with Consumers Union . $9.25 You Save $1.25
☐ with Harper's Magazine

and Consumers Union . $11.75 You Save $3.75

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses.

THE NATION by itself:

- ☐ One Year $6 ☐ Two Years $10 ☐ Three Years $14
☐ Servicemen's Rate $4 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage $1 a year extra

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed. ☐ Bill me.
 NAME _____
 STREET _____
 CITY _____ ZONE _____ STATE _____

1-18-47

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

TRIBUTE TO LENIN

MADISON SQUARE GARDEN
50th Street and 8th Avenue
WED., JAN. 22, 7:30 P.M.

WILLIAM Z. FOSTER
Chairman, Communist Party, USA

J. B. S. HALDANE
Internationally Famous British Scientist

Guest Speaker: ALBERT E. KAHN
Co-Author "Great Conspiracy Against Russia" President, Jewish Peoples Fraternal Order

RESERVED SEATS
60¢, $1.00, $1.20, $1.50, $2.40 (tax incl.)
At Webster Bookshop, 18th St. West 44th Street
Bookfair, 13th West 44th Street
Jefferson Bookshop, 575 Ave. of the Amer.
Asuspices:

New York State Communist Party

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Crossword Puzzle No. 195

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 What would my French papa smile at as I get on?
- 10 Far from a sure defense, from the look of it
- 11 Pair of animals exported by Spain
- 12 A noble lord starts well ahead of time
- 13 What the pedant calls his spectacles, perhaps
- 14 The end we all look forward to
- 15 Tranquil, isn't it?
- 16 Welcome to British beggars in one sense, but not in another
- 20 Capital of the Spanish province of the same name
- 23 Only one to each foot, not five
- 24 One nut that can't slip
- 25 A resume provides a means to an end
- 26 I darn on (anag.)
- 27 Heavens above! This is the limit! (7 and 6)

DOWN

- 2 You wouldn't think having to this a check would make Ned sore
- 3 Some of these answers are, aren't they?
- 4 Withdraw

- 5 1. 1947 (3 and 4)

- 6 Those who relieve us of our spare cash turn out to be respectable bank clerks
- 7 Rolf? Sue? It's I!
- 8 It's mean—and quite right, too (9 and 4)
- 9 If ever you need something for a rainy day, try this (8 and 5)
- 17 This churchman is a real pet
- 18 An expunction in rare use
- 19 Under suspicion
- 20 He might have complained of the slings, if not the arrows, of outrageous fortune
- 21 Low fellow in an operatic song in a rural scene
- 22 Where the English run their Grand National

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 194

ACROSS:—1 SPARSITY; 5 ESSAYS; 10 LIMBO; 11 MATRIMONY; 12 CAMELOT; 13 CAPITAL; 14 STINGY; 15 OPENERS; 16 HEROINE; 21 CRUSTS; 24 LEMBERG; 26 CHURCH; 27 REDHAIRC; 28 POISE; 29 NIMBLY; 30 ESTRANGE.

DOWN:—1 SELECT; 2 ALMA MATER; 3 SWOLLEN; 4 TIMOTHY; 6 STIPPLE; 7 ABOUT; 8 SPYGLASS; 9 STUCCO; 16 EXTORTION; 17 CHILDREN; 19 ICE-PAID; 20 EGGERY; 21 CIDADAS; 22 USURPER; 23 AMIERE; 25 MADAM.

gressman, I was not reappointed, although I again entered the competition and was highest eligible on the list.

It is a well-known fact throughout our nation that there is no civil-service standard used in these appointments. Anyone politically sponsored, even though a "numskull," can through favoritism or fraud become an eligible and win a postmaster's appointment over highly competent contenders.

This is indeed a "spoils system," putting to shame the "spoils system" of the Jacksonian era.

MAUDE O'NEAL,
Ex-Postmistress

Hatteras, N. C., December 20

Alive and Kicking

Dear Sirs: A copy of The Nation (September 28) carrying Alden Stevens's report on Dinuba, California, has belatedly come into my hands. This report was in large measure based upon a study I made in 1944, and I am anxious to correct certain misrepresentations.

Many of my former colleagues in the Bureau of Agricultural Economics would be dismayed to learn that their agency was destroyed. It was, to be sure, heavily curtailed in its activities by the Seventy-ninth Congress, but it continues to function as an important research agency of the government. Mr. Stevens states that the fall from grace which the bureau suffered was the result of my investigations into the effect of large farms on community life. There is no evidence in the hearings on the Agricultural Department appropriation bill for 1947 that the study of Dinuba and Arvin had anything to do with the curtailed budget. Failure to mention this study cannot be attributed to Congressional reticence, since there was none evidenced when the study was being prosecuted in the field and attacked on the radio and in Congress.

Finally, I question Mr. Stevens's rather whimsical treatment of Congressional action and doubt that Nation readers will be convinced by the element of mystery he implied. Important social legislation in Congress is fought for or killed by persons who know quite clearly the implications of such legislation.

In raising these objections to Mr. Stevens's article I do not wish to imply any criticism of his analysis of the town itself. The social results of large-scale farming have proved quite apparent.

WALTER R. GOLDSCHMIDT

Los Angeles, December 16

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1863

VOLUME 164

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 25, 1947

NUMBER 4

The Shape of Things

TRY TO IMAGINE WHAT WOULD HAPPEN IF Soviet Foreign Minister Molotov were to deliver a tirade against the American Secretary of State and then call on Ambassador Walter Bedell Smith to bear witness for the Russians against his own government. Regardless of how Smith might react to so unique a performance, we suggest that he would be yanked out of Moscow before he had time to gather up his protocol. Yet a completely parallel set of circumstances is reported from Buenos Aires, and hardly an eyebrow has been raised. Accusing Secretary Byrnes of being "intolerant and unjust," Argentine Foreign Minister Bramuglia announces that "Mr. Messersmith, who is a gentleman [in contrast to Mr. Byrnes?] and whom the Argentine people admire as a fine expression of the spirit of a grand people, is the witness of our efforts." Gentleman though he may be, Ambassador Messersmith has uttered not a syllable in defense of the retiring Secretary of State, while in private he has been bearing witness all too glibly for the Perón regime. Mr. Byrnes leaves office convinced that no all-inclusive hemisphere-defense treaty is possible until the Buenos Aires government displays "reasonable and substantial compliance . . . with its obligations" to shake off Nazi influence. If that is to be General Marshall's policy, he would do well to start off by recalling Mr. Messersmith. If he does, he will antagonize powerful Senators, particularly Vandenberg, who is now chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and who believes that we can "restore the warmth of New-World unity" by ignoring unpleasant facts in the Argentine. Perhaps even more significant, he will antagonize the army, which naturally views our Latin American policy wholly in military terms. This will be the first indication of whether or not Marshall carries over to his own government the detached attitude toward the military whose "dominating influence" he so deplored in China.

✱

BOTH NORWEGIAN AND SOVIET OFFICIALS have been rather grudging in providing detailed information about Russian proposals for a revision of the 1920 treaty which settled a fifty-year dispute over the ownership of Spitzbergen. This treaty assigned full sovereign rights to the bleak but strategically important Arctic archipelago to Norway on condition that it was never to be used "for warlike purposes." Russia, excluded from the family of nations at the time, did not participate in the negotiations but later ratified the treaty. Now, however, Moscow claims that the pact is invalid because (a) it was concluded in Russia's absence, (b) the signatories included Italy and Japan, and (c) it disregarded Russian strategic and economic interests. It appears that views on the subject were exchanged between Russia and Norway at the end of 1944, and according to Soviet sources an understanding about joint defense of the islands was reached. The Norwegians have not admitted as much as that and are believed to have told Moscow that the situation has changed owing to the subsequent organization of the United Nations. It has also been changed, though this point has not been stressed officially, by American abandonment of efforts to obtain permanent aviation bases in Iceland—a project which naturally alarmed Russia and provided it with some grounds for seeking a military foothold in Spitzbergen. There seems, by the same reasoning, to be less excuse now for a revival of the Russian claim, and American and British objections to any bilateral revision of the multilateral Spitzbergen treaty are reasonable. But if the Russian proposals are ever put forward formally, it might be well for the United Nations to undertake a review of the whole Arctic region, which has become an aerial link between continents, with the idea of promoting an agreement for its military neutralization.

✱

PROVIDED ITALY REMAINS "STABLE," THE American government will grant that country a loan of $100,000,000, to be expended, not in relief, for which President Truman will later ask Congress to provide, but in the purchase of raw materials. The significance of the loan clearly lies in the attached conditions and in the reconstructive pattern it defines, for the amount cannot be judged large enough to modify the present crisis to any great extent. It will not bring badly trailing wages within reach of prices, which have risen about 4,000 per cent since the end of the war. Nor can so small a sum provide work for many of the two million unemployed. Italy, for all that Washington's promised aid will do, will remain "a country seething with misery and unrest."

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	85
The Voice of Europe	88
Banner Year for Co-Ops	89
Herman the Pretender	89

ARTICLES

The Crisis of Zionism by Joel Carmichael	90
Bad News for British Tories by Aylmer Vallance	92
We Need More Steel Mills! by Bryant Putney	94
The People's Front by Del Vayo	96
Sweden: Still the Middle Way by Robert Harvey	97
"The Conference of the Excluded" by Wilbur H. Baldinger	99
In the Wind	100
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	101
In One Ear by Lou Frankel	102

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

When There Is a Tolstoy by R. P. Blackmur	103
Escape from Europe by Bartley C. Crum	104
Briefer Comment	105
Films by James Agee	108
Records by B. H. Haggin	109
Drama Note by Joseph Wood Krutch	110
The Dance by Virginia Mishnyn	110

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 196 by Jack Barrett	112
--	-----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor

J. King Gordon

Literary Editor

Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

Shorn of its inadequate coal supplies by the peace treaty and lacking essential raw materials, Italy is not even guaranteed the means of repaying loans and so obtaining a continuance of credit. It would seem, therefore, that the loan is principally a political gesture, for it clearly invites the Italian people to put their trust in the Christian Democrats and those parties which prove able to adjust their ideas to the demands of that incompetent group. If that is the intention, two things must be said. The program of the Christian Democrats holds out no hope of a socially resurgent Italy, whatever the party may accomplish for civil liberties and the church. And second, Signor Gasperi's success has probably been too small to win any great number of fresh adherents to his party. The results of his visit therefore are unlikely to lessen the political tension in Italy—a tension now increased by the split in the Socialist Party.

✱

HENRY FORD II MADE HIS PRICE-CUTTING announcement before last week's issue of The Nation could have reached him. So we cannot claim that his action was influenced by Simon O. Lesser's able demonstration of the necessity of lower prices if business is to prosper. We can, however, hail it as a constructive move and express the hope that it will prove the beginning of an orderly downward readjustment of prices generally. Mr. Ford himself explained that he was prescribing "shock treatment" for "the insane spiral of mounting costs and rising prices." The immediate effect has been to shock his fellow automobile makers into official silence. Off the record they complain that young Ford has pulled a fast one and assert that his cuts look better than they really are. They point out that Ford prices are still well above what they were before the company obtained OPA permission last September for a 6 per cent increase. Moreover, Ford models, except for the cheapest one, are still more expensive than comparable Chevrolet cars. Consequently there is no reason to anticipate a general outburst of price-cutting as the result of Ford's initiative, though it may well discourage any more price increases in the automobile field. It can also be viewed as a smart move to outflank union demands for higher wages. However, as Richard Leonard of the United Automobile Workers has pointed out, an average 1 per cent cut in the price of Fords does nothing, by itself, to bring down the cost of living for automobile workers.

✱

THOSE PAUL BUNYANS OF THE TAX FOREST, the Republican members of the House Ways and Means Committee, have opened the cutting season by agreeing to increase taxes. At least they have decided to continue indefinitely at present levels those excise levies which would otherwise be automatically reduced on July 1.

This move follows a Presidential recommendation, but it does not mean necessarily that Congress will also accept Mr. Truman's proposal to earmark the additional revenue produced for debt reduction. On the contrary, it appears that Representative Knutson, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, is looking to these excise taxes to provide part of the funds required to carry out his campaign pledge to cut income taxes by 20 per cent. In other words, a reduction in taxes, which will be vastly more significant to the upper brackets than to the lower, will be financed in part by imposts which fall most heavily on the lower brackets. In order to make this scheme more palatable, these imposts are referred to as "luxury taxes." We agree that jewelry, furs, cabarets, and possibly liquor may be so described, but we suggest that cosmetics can hardly be described as luxuries especially when toilet soap is included in this category. And telephone, telegraph, and transportation services, as well as luggage and electric light bulbs, are surely necessities in America today. We would therefore suggest to Congress a review of all excise-tax schedules as a step toward the reduction or elimination of those that burden the consumption of articles of common, daily use. Supposing that the country can afford tax cuts at present, there is no good reason why the income-tax payer should have precedence.

✱

MAJORITY LEADER HALLECK, ANNOUNCING the committee assignments of the new House of Representatives, reports that the selection was "an awful job." In a slightly different sense, we think so, too—but it is hardly worse than was to be expected. The seniority rule, less officially known as the senility rule, dictated, for example, that the Appropriations Committee be presided over by John Taber of New York, who genuinely believes that no Democrat can safely be trusted to spend a dollar of public funds. It decreed, too, that the all-powerful Rules Committee should come under the sway of Leo E. Allen of Illinois, who just happens to be a Martin-Halleck man and therefore a Dewey man. But it curiously failed to operate in the case of the Committee on Education and Labor. Richard J. Welch, a California Republican with a remarkably liberal voting record who was in line for the chairmanship, was shunted aside in favor of Fred A. Hartley, an orthodox party hack with an almost unblemished record of anti-labor votes. Unfortunately, Mary T. Norton, who headed the Labor Committee in the days of Democratic control, decided against staying on as ranking minority member. She will be sorely missed. By a law of mutual attraction, the newly elected John McDowell gravitates to the Un-American Affairs Committee, where presumably he will judge un-Americanism by the same standards applied in the racially prejudiced little paper he publishes in a suburb of Pittsburgh.

WE WISH TO URGE OUR READERS TO GIVE their most determined support to the campaign just launched by the United Jewish Appeal, under the chairmanship of Henry Morgenthau, Jr., which has set itself the task of raising $170,000,000. This fund is to be administered by three organizations. The United Service for New Americans undertakes to assist in the adjustment of newcomers to the United States; the United Palestine Appeal provides for the training and care of immigrants into Palestine; and the Joint Distribution Committee will give relief to distressed Jews in all parts of the world. All are worthy services. There are a million refugees and displaced persons, a quarter of them Jews, living in the European camp set up by UNRRA. In its wisdom the United States has taken the lead in bringing about the abolition of UNRRA, as a result of which all relief to stateless persons will come to an end in June of this year. At present there is the utmost uncertainty as to whether future aid will be granted to stateless European refugees, for so far the International Relief Organization, set up on paper by the United Nations, remains without effective sponsorship. Private effort, even of the most generous dimensions, cannot provide a final solution of the problem, which must be tackled by the victorious powers. Yet the United Jewish Appeal, if successful in its campaign, will be able to do more than relieve physical distress. Its services will be a sign to the politically abandoned people living in the camps of Europe that they are not forgotten by men of good-will.

✱

THE SERIOUS EFFECTS OF THE NEWSPRINT shortage, discussed in relation to the smaller American papers by Bryant Putney in last week's Nation, are by no means confined to this country. With American publishers getting the lion's share of the world supply, it is not too much to say that unequal distribution constitutes a real threat to democratic government in other lands. Interviewed in New York last month, Sir Robert Webber, director of the British Kemsley newspapers, said: "Free enterprise and real democracy depend on the people's free access to knowledge. Today the United States is consuming two-thirds of the world's newsprint. . . . If this amount is necessary to maintain the American way of life, then there can be only enough newsprint in the world for 200,000,000 democrats. The rest will have to go totalitarian." This is much more than a business matter to be settled by the longest purse in an open market. Carlos P. Romulo's proposal that the United Nations consider a world newsprint allocation system seems to us one on which early action should be taken.

✱

ONE OF THOSE GOBLINS THAT THRIVE ON printers' ink went on a spree in The Nation's office last week. He blinded the eyes of editors and proofreaders to a slip of the typewriter that turned Admiral Leahy into a general. He somehow brought about a transposition between the words "deflation" and "inflation" making nonsense of the first paragraph of the editorial, "G. O. P. Budget Problem." Finally he snatched Randall Jarrell's name from its place at the end of his review of Robert Lowell's new book of poetry. We apologize to our readers for all this mischief and promise to watch out more carefully for such impish saboteurs.

The Voice of Europe

THE thirty days of Léon Blum may prove to have been a turning point in French post-war history. Heading a ministry doomed in advance to a brief span of life, the veteran Socialist did not hesitate to grapple with the thorniest problems of domestic and foreign policy. Since we wrote last week of Blum's dramatic effort to turn the tide of inflation, he has found still another urgent job to be done. In the last few hours of his premiership he flew to London, ironed out a number of outstanding Anglo-French differences, and returned with a preliminary agreement for a treaty of mutual assistance.

Thanks to this bold initiative, there is now hope of banishing the coolness which has characterized Anglo-French relations for the past two years, a coolness which has caused great distress to the most progressive elements in both countries. If this hope is fulfilled, something new will be added to the international picture, for these two countries, which in their different ways represent the best elements of European civilization, between them hold the key to the moral and physical regeneration of Europe. When Britain and France stand firmly together, the voice of Europe will once again be heard above the uproar of the two great non-European powers who now dominate world councils.

Britain and France have so many common problems and common interests that their failure to cooperate more closely seems unnatural. Allies in two wars against the same enemy, they both emerged from the last conflict battered and nearly exhausted. Both are engaged in a tremendous struggle to restore trade and industry and to establish a socialist economy within the framework of the civil liberties that they cherish. And both face the appallingly difficult task of liquidating empires which they can no longer rule without overstraining their diminished resources. This fact alone must turn the eyes of both Britain and France more and more toward Europe and toward the problem of integrating and expanding its economy.

The largest visible obstacle to understanding between the two countries has been the question of Germany. The French, who have so often known the bitterness of invasion, insist that security demands a decentralized Reich shorn of its western industrial district. The more intuitive British dread the consequences for Europe as a whole of a total German collapse. They fear the creation in Central Europe of a political and economic vacuum which would inevitably be filled by a rushing wind from the east. The object of M. Blum's London conversations was a reconciliation of these two points of view. That is urgently needed, for unless Britain and France can agree on a common German policy, the influence of both will be diminished at the forthcoming Moscow meeting and they may find themselves forced to accept whatever compromise is finally ground out by the clash of American and Russian interests.

As a result of M. Blum's visit to Britain, negotiations for an Anglo-French treaty are to be started shortly. Both countries agree that they have equal interest in protecting themselves against a fresh German menace and, therefore, in making sure that the necessary economic reconstruction of Germany will not lay the basis for future aggression. The best possible safeguard would of course be a firm and permanent alliance between Britain and France that extended beyond military cooperation to a large degree of economic integration. The aggregate population of the two countries exceeds that of Germany, and their joint industrial strength is greater.

Britain and France have reached the point of consulting on their economic plans with a view to preventing conflict, and it is manifest that a much closer relationship, even a customs union, would prove mutually advantageous. But such a development would bring us within sight of a Western bloc. And that has been pronounced anathema by the Soviet government, which, through its influence on the powerful Communist Party of France, is in a position to make good its veto.

Russian antagonism to any kind of close relationship between the states of Western Europe has been fanned by the kind of support that idea has received. It is therefore most unfortunate that M. Blum's visit to London coincided with a new manifesto sponsored by Winston Churchill calling for a European Federation. Even worse was the speech made on January 17 by John Foster Dulles, a Republican who is close to the State Department. Like Mr. Churchill, Mr. Dulles advocates European federation frankly as a bulwark against Russia and thus injects political poison into a plan which has no chance of success when built on so negative a basis. Even European countries in which Communist influence is negligible are likely to be repelled by an invitation to organize themselves as America's front line against Russia.

We ourselves wish to see a union at least of Western Europe because without that we believe Europe's economy will eventually collapse and the unhappy continent become a bone of contention between the United States and Russia. But we do not believe that union can be created either through fear of Russia, which has only a disintegrating effect, or by American pressure and patronage. It will come if and when Europe shakes itself free of subservience to both America and Russia and finds its own voice. M. Blum's flight to London, the act of a great Frenchman who is a great European, was a first step in that direction.

Banner Year for Co-Ops

CITIZENS who are caught in the big squeeze between their pay checks and the cost of living might well look to consumers' cooperatives as one aid to survival; in this country, in fact, members of nearly 2,500,000 families are now helping to make ends meet through co-op participation. A 1946 round-up newsletter of the Cooperative League of the United States enthusiastically reports this statistic and the even more impressive one that 85,000,000 families from twenty-two nations are now associated with the International Cooperative Alliance, an organization with the status of permanent consultant to the United Nations' Economic and Social Council.

The most dramatic co-op development of 1946, a year which saw both national and international co-op business surpass all former volume, was the organization of the International Cooperative Petroleum Association, a lusty young project that intends to "match strength with the world's monopolies." Within the United States and Canada alone, National Cooperatives, Inc., and its affiliates owned and operated by the end of 1946 more than 500 oil wells, 1,600 miles of pipe line, a number of refineries, and a cracking plant.

But oil development is just the frosting, at this stage, as are the radio station in Ohio being built under co-op sponsorship and the projected utility operations in the Pacific Northwest, where private companies are stalling on a $34,440,000 co-op bid for the property of Pacific Power and Light. The main strength of the consumers' cooperative movement lies in its vast food-store enterprises and its production of a varied list of goods for its members. It is now doing a billion dollars' yearly business in food sales and such other fields as housing, hospital facilities, insurance, credit unions, coal mining, and machinery production. Over 1,000 food stores are now run by affiliates of National Cooperatives, Inc., of which almost 10 per cent are—or will soon be—super-markets in the largest American cities. The super-market in the Riverdale section of New York has been called "the best-looking food store of any kind" in that city. Labor groups, notably the C. I. O., have thrown their weight in support of the establishment of cooperative food stores, particularly in Detroit, where co-ops are facing high-pressure, private-enterprise opposition.

Opposition to cooperatives is not a new thing, but it is now waxing day by day, almost in proportion to the startling expansion of cooperatives themselves. Business-with-profits must automatically dread the successes of business-without-profits; this is borne out by the cold shoulder tendered every new co-op venture by rival free-enterprise merchants and producers, and it is emphasized by the avidity with which the press ignores co-op achievements. Consumers' cooperatives are only a small segment of the entire cooperative movement, but they are of course blanketed by the present campaign of big-business interests to get co-op tax exemptions repealed. This sort of news does, indeed, receive press attention, and it is a question which will be discussed in a later issue of this magazine. For the record, however, it is important to stress that consumers' cooperatives are not tax exempt, Hearst headlines and propaganda leaflets of the National Tax Equality Association notwithstanding.

What consumer cooperatives have accomplished to date is impressive; yet they play a small role in our economy. It is their still greater potentialities that arouse the fears of Hearst editorialists and N. T. E. A. pamphleteers. But those to whom a truly sound economy means goods and services within the reach of the entire population will take heart from the cooperative record for 1946 and from the same potentialities that prey on the minds of "free-enterprisers."

Herman the Pretender

LAST July, in an unconsciously prophetic phrase, we offered "condolences to the state of Georgia on the untimely resurrection of Eugene Talmadge." With the ominous turn that events have taken, we can only deepen those condolences. On the earlier occasion, Talmadge père, thanks to Georgia's rotten-borough electoral system, had just been nominated for the governorship, although outvoted by more than 70,000. As a result of last week's fantastic developments his son Herman sits in the Governor's chair on the basis of 697 votes out of 1,000,000.

Talmadge's claim to the governorship, for which, incidentally, he has had not the faintest training or experience, rests on a far-fetched technicality. Under Georgia's constitution the Legislature may choose a governor from among those with the highest vote in cases where no candidate has a majority. Talmadge contends that death eliminated his father's majority and that the Legislature was therefore within its rights in choosing him on the basis of the 697 write-in vote provided by the Talmadge machine to meet just this contingency. Having received the vote of the Legislature, which is elected by the same preposterous county-unit system as the governor, he has seized both the Capitol and the Executive Mansion, backed by segments of the State's National Guard.

With the federal government traditionally loath to interfere in affairs of this kind, Lieutenant Governor M. E. Thompson, the logical successor now that Ellis Arnall has stepped down, has no recourse other than the courts of his state. In this connection it is encouraging to have the word of the former Chief Justice of the Georgia Supreme Court that Talmadge's claim is utterly without merit. To avoid a complete breakdown of government it should be possible to force an immediate decision. Should the Talmadge forces then refuse to recognize a verdict against them, federal intervention could be invoked under the Constitutional provision that guarantees "to every state in this Union a republican form of government," as well as protection against domestic violence when such aid is legally invoked.

A great deal more is at stake here than the ambitions of an unscrupulous little politician. As governor, Arnall brought Georgia to a historic turning-point, fateful for the entire South. The state will either continue to follow the path of industrial and social emancipation that he has laid out for it or slump back into four more years of corrupt cracker government, dominated socially by the Klan and exploited financially by Northern corporations. Thompson himself gives little promise of being another Arnall, but neither would he be the official errand boy of the Klan. The majority vote against Talmadge last July shows the way Georgians want to go. And it underscores the fatuousness of the New York Times's contention that the Arnall-Thompson forces should yield because "the people . . . voted for a return to Talmadgeism, 'white supremacy', general reaction, and Negro disfranchisement."

The Crisis of Zionism

BY JOEL CARMICHAEL

Paris, January 6

WHEN I arrived at Basel some days before the end of the World Zionist Congress, the delegates were suffering from a particularly nasty cold spell and the baffling depression of a meeting in which the normal contentiousness had not succeeded in clarifying even the basic issues. Things were so mixed up that the delegates found it impossible to explain the situation to an outsider. I quickly gave up any attempt to keep track of the molecular shifts in the intra-party and inter-faction maneuverings and contented myself with a strenuous effort to grasp the points of contention.

It was apparent that two, or possibly two-and-a-half, fundamental matters had occupied the Congress: one was the terrorism in Palestine; the other, the question of participation in the negotiations with the British government scheduled for London in January. Closely connected with the second was the question of Weizmann.

Formally a clear decision on both was reached. Terrorism was condemned with a fair degree of unanimity—an attempt by the Revisionists, the Zionist party closest in spirit to the Palestinian terrorists, to water down the resolution was badly defeated. And by a vote of 171 to 154, with 25 abstaining, it was decided not to go to London under "the present circumstances."

But though the division on these issues certainly constituted the public aspect of the Congress, and though all the tortuous proceedings and all the tensions and horse-trading connected with the wrangle over whether or not to "deal" with the British were crystallized in the resolutions, it would be naive to take their passage as an objective reflection of the real situation in the Zionist movement.

This question of participating in the London negotiations was naturally the hub of many speeches. In the course of the general debate—an exhausting performance in which the representatives of all Congress groups spoke as long as they could on a maximum of topics—the two attitudes on this subject were squarely opposed to each other in the speeches by Dr. N. Goldmann, who defended the affirmative position of the outgoing executive, and M. Sneh, the reputed chief of the Haganah, the main defense organization of Jewish Palestine. To my mind this clear-cut confrontation of what appeared to be two diametrically opposed principles revealed, not their philosophical irreconcilability, but the exclusively tactical nature of the entire question.

For the negative position on going to the London negotiations did not by any means imply a desire to sever all relations with Great Britain, as it would have done if it had been a matter of principle; no serious proposal was made to transfer the Palestine mandate to the United Nations or some other power. This reluctance to push the argument to its logical conclusion, which could only have been a suggestion for the elimination of Great Britain, surely demonstrated that all the positions taken up were supported for tactical reasons. Considering the unfriendliness of the British government to the Zionist position ever since 1939—to say nothing of the whole past history of the mandate—these tactics seemed to have an almost compelling plausibility. What baffled me, however, was the extraordinary blowing up of a choice of tactics into a conflict of principle; it struck me as a bizarre and hysterical waste of time.

JOEL CARMICHAEL, one of The Nation's European correspondents, recently contributed two articles on Russian policy in Germany. A third will appear next week.

And when talking with various "informed sources," I found it extremely difficult to keep my eye on the line of demarcation between the two factions, even when I considered only those who, I could not but assume, were genuinely actuated by principle. It is true that the Revisionists seemed sincerely to desire a complete break with Britain; but Dr. Abba Hillel Silver of Cleveland, the leader of the largest section of American Zionists, is known to have told Bevin himself that he would like nothing better than to come to London, provided he were offered a "good" partition of Palestine. Here again was a tactical attitude I found impossible to reconcile with the unbending quality of Dr. Silver's public statements.

What was most distressing from a polemical point of view was the perplexing vacuum one came up against in seeking an alternative to some form of "dealing" with Great Britain. For even the rupture of relations—whatever that might mean—when coupled with the unanimous demand for maximum immigration, to say nothing of a Jewish state, could only lead, logically and politically, to a state of war. And it is evident that the clear formulation of such a suggestion would be enough to insure its collapse.

Then there was the striking way in which the discussion of this basic issue cut across practically all party lines, with the possible exception of the Revisionists and the Hashomir Hatzair, a Socialist Zionist party with a Communist tinge and a special position on Palestinian statehood, which they would like to see take a bi-national Arab-Jewish form. The largest parties, the General Zionists and the Socialist Labor Party, or Ichud, were split asunder. David Ben-Gurion, the head of the Ichud, carried on a fanatical campaign against the so-called moderate position on this question of negotiating with Great Britain. But after keeping the Congress on tenterhooks for the better part of a week while the grueling inter-party struggle went on, he was beaten in his own party by a vote of ninety-one to thirty, and was consequently compelled by its rules to cast a public vote, in conformity with the wishes of the majority, in favor of the negotiations.

In this so-called conflict of principle I found it impossible not to see a clash of personalities. Throughout his career in the Zionist movement Dr. Weizmann has been identified as a moderate, a man whom all shades of British opinion united in respecting and who served as a sort of liaison with the British government. As such he would inevitably be against any form of terrorism and would favor, in principle, almost any kind of pacific negotiation. It may be that those Zionist groups which were genuinely intransigent on the question of "concessions" to Great Britain, such as the Revisionists and more especially Mr. Ben-Gurion's faction of the Socialist Labor Party, allowed the question to be formulated as one of principle chiefly as a method of shelving Weizmann.

Dr. Weizmann's candidacy for the presidency of the organization was intimately tied up with the question of going to London: a pro-London resolution would have allowed him to stand for president and would doubtless have insured his victory. The anti-London resolution that was actually passed by a coalition of Dr. Silver's American Zionist followers, the Revisionists, and the Mizrahi, the party of religious orthodoxy, meant, if it was adhered to, Dr. Weizmann's elimination, probably of his own volition. Contrariwise, had Dr. Weizmann been elected president before the other matter was settled—at a crucial point the Socialist Labor Party, the largest at the Congress, attempted to have the issue of the presidency and the executive dealt with before that of going to London—the passage of a resolution favorable to carrying on negotiations would have followed almost automatically. I could discover no other explanation for the insistence of most of the delegates, at any rate for public purposes, on treating this question of London as the primary one, or for the intransigence shown first by Mr. Ben-Gurion and then by Dr. Silver's American group and the Mizrahi.

But although the clash of personalities may have been a main source of the opinionated bitterness that characterized the Congress, there was another deeper reason—namely, the dilemma in which the political leadership of the Zionist movement now finds itself. If the British government has in fact decided to cut Palestine immigration to the bone, rigidly control land purchases, and exclude all discussion of statehood as a matter of principle, it is evident that the Zionist movement, which since the First World War has developed on the assumption of a continuing collaboration with the mandatory power regardless of any strains and disappointments, must cast about for some radical alternative. However single-minded may be the yearning for Palestine throughout European Jewry, and however strong the support for Zionism throughout world Jewry, the Near East cannot be freed from the pressures of world politics; and if the Zionist leadership regards Palestine as simply one element in the relations of Great Britain, America, and the Soviet Union, it may have reached a genuine impasse. I think this sense of a really basic frustration in the upper political levels of the Zionist movement caused, first, the crumbling of party lines at the Congress and secondly its angry and impotent bogging down in purely tactical considerations.

If it is a fact that the crisis in Zionism, or at least the crisis in the political direction, is due to external causes, that is, to deteriorating relations with Great Britain, then British behavior during the past few months is especially significant. British spokesmen need only have raised their little finger in the weeks before the Congress to have fortified enormously the position of Dr. Weizmann and the "moderates." The slightest gesture of reconciliation or even of vague good-will would have enabled Weizmann to go before the Congress with some props for his position; as it was, the case his opponents made out for the futility of any further negotiations with the British government was extremely persuasive. As a statement of the "moderate" case, even the extremely lucid and cogent speech of Dr. Goldmann for the executive gave rise to some malaise. What, after all, were they offering? What had they got to show? Dr. Weizmann and his followers were unable to point to any concession made by the Labor government on even the most trivial principle as evidence for the eventual fruitfulness of purely diplomatic bargaining. This was an extraordinarily difficult position to be in, and in the end the battle was lost.

But perhaps it was lost only nominally. For the Congress broke up by transferring the power to elect an executive, and by implication a president, to the Actions Committee, a reduced image of the Congress itself; and as the delegates and visitors, exhausted by an all-night session which dragged on to five o'clock the following afternoon, prepared to leave, it was generally understood that the resolution not to go to London under the "present circumstances," on which so much time, energy, and temper had been expended, was nothing more than a shrewd "twist" to be got round as soon as possible by the Actions Committee. By some ingenious interpretation of the facts, it was expected that this committee would announce a change in the "present circumstances" which would enable the victors at the Congress to go to London after all. The Socialist Labor Party, whose resolution in favor of London was overthrown at the Congress, has nevertheless since then, in the Actions Committee, entered the executive, and it evidently would have done so only with the intention of accomplishing its declared desire for continued negotiation. An executive minus the Labor Party would be paralyzed; and the Labor Party, a vested interest in firm control of all key positions in the Palestinian Jewish economy and administration, cannot afford to fling itself into the abyss of meaningless defiance. In spite of all the hurly-burly at the Congress, Zionist leadership, bludgeoned into submissiveness by the grandiose forces of the epoch, may yet find that Weizmannism, if not Weizmann himself, is the most effective weapon in its arsenal.

Bad News for British Tories

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

London, January 10

MINISTERS have a prospect of stormy debates and long sittings when Parliament reassembles after the Christmas recess. They are probably not troubled unduly by Mr. Churchill's notice, given in a moment of hot-tempered impetuosity just before Christmas, that he would move a vote of censure on the government for "tyranny, conceit, and incompetence," but they have to face the task of piloting through Parliament several bills which will evoke strenuous attack, of coping with the still unsolved problem of how to bridge the gap in Britain's balance of foreign payments, and of placating the still smoldering "rebellion" against Mr. Bevin's foreign policy.

Parliament now has before it two voluminous and intricate bills—one nationalizing inland transport, the other giving effect to Labor's election pledge that the power of the state to acquire land for public purposes would be broadened as a step toward the ultimate nationalization of all land. In addition, there will be a bill, probably simpler in its structure, to nationalize the distribution of electricity. In the case of the Transport bill the opposition's line of attack has already been made clear. The Tories have fastened on the clauses which provide that the railways are to be taken over at stock-market valuation and the stockholders given an equivalent nominal sum in government stock. The rate of interest which the government stock will bear has not yet been disclosed, but it is likely to be not more than 2½ per cent. The stockholders will thus suffer a loss not of capital but of income, since current Stock Exchange quotations allow for a large element of risk, including that of nationalization, and current yields are much higher than $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

AYLMER VALLANCE is The Nation's regular London correspondent.

Here, say the Tories, is sheer confiscation and robbery; and they invoke in support of their case the hardship which will be suffered by charitable trusts, trade unions, and of course the inevitable "widows and pensioners" who hold railway stocks. They will probably succeed in creating in the country a fairly strong impression that the railway stockholders are getting a raw deal, but the government is bound to stand its ground. To base compensation on future "net maintainable income" would require incredibly difficult calculations and the making of arbitrary and in many ways quite unreal assumptions, while stock-market values are a simple and workable basis. Moreover, to buy the stockholders out at prices which would yield current income in perpetuity and without future risk would mean paying for the railways much more than they are worth—having regard, particularly, to the obsolescence of much existing equipment and the need for large new capital investment.

One of the really debatable questions to which the bill gives rise, but which may be overlooked in the hubbub about compensation, is whether nationalization will draw the railway labor unions and the actual railway personnel into sharing some of the functions of management. If nationalization merely substitutes a top deck of bureaucrats for the present boards of directors and gives railwaymen no encouragement to think of the lines as "theirs," the country will hardly get on its railways the contented labor force it needs. There is another possible weakness in the bill. It sets up two executive boards—one to manage the unified railways, and the other for road haulage. The task of planning and coordinating economically rail and road transport—and this is the real case for nationalization—is assigned to a small Transport Commission. Not a few Labor M. P.'s are concerned lest the two executive boards, if they are composed respectively of rail- and road-transport managers only, will become such powerful "vested" departments that the Transport Commission will find it a tough job to "coordinate" them and make them think in terms of transport as a whole rather than of their own particular section of it. During the discussions of the bill in committee attempts will probably be made to amend it by strengthening the Transport Commission and including representatives of outside interests in the two executive boards.

The Town and Country Planning bill will infuriate the Tories even more, not merely because they will consider its compensation provisions inadequate, but because they regard it, with some reason, as a deadly blow to the rights of private property in land. Besides giving local authorities much wider powers, backed with ample financial facilities from the state, to acquire land for development plans—which they are now compelled instead of, as hitherto, permitted to make—the bill abolishes completely the right of the landlord to develop his land, or even redevelop it, by building on it or leasing it for building. No land in the future may be developed or redeveloped without the state's permission, and if permission is refused on grounds of public interest or amenity, no compensation will be paid. If permission to develop is granted, the state will then levy a "development charge," which is likely to range—according to the need to stimulate the entrepreneur—from 75 to 100 per cent of the difference between the land's "existing use" value and the value it will have when it is built or rebuilt on.

Prime Minister Attlee

From the Socialist point of view this is by no means as satisfactory as nationalization of the land would be. The bill makes an illogical concession to landlordism: it leaves the owner of a piece of land which is not "developed"—in the sense of having new buildings of a different type built on it—but which acquires greater rental value from the construction of a new railway or road to the enjoyment of this unearned increment, a principle which the Uthwatt Report declared to be unjust. Moreover, even the "existing use" value of land is in many cities so high that it is apt to obstruct the planning of a good future lay-out. Still, the sanctity of private property in land is sufficiently undermined to rouse the Land Union and the Federation of Property Owners to fury, and their wrath is unlikely to be appeased by the proposal in the bill that a lump sum, arbitrarily fixed at £300,000,000, is to be distributed among landowners who make good a claim that their land in 1947 had potential development value.

With this controversial legislation on its hands, the government will have to devote more and more of its attention to the general question of the economic situation of Britain in its present halfway stage between private enterprise and a fully planned economy. Exports, after regaining a little more than their 1938 volume, show no signs of reaching soon the target of a 75 per cent quantitative rise above the pre-war level. Shortages of raw materials seem likely to be a serious handicap through 1947; and when these have been overcome, will the present "sellers' market" be over? The dollar loan is being drawn on at a disquieting rate, both for our own needs and those of Germany. In two years' time, especially if 1949 finds the United States in a depression, this country may have real difficulty in meeting its foreign obligations, including those to its large sterling creditors, and at the same time keeping up an acceptably high standard of life. Higher output per man is clearly the solution, but this is dependent not merely on the will to work but on the mechanical reequipment of British industry. Moreover, it is generally agreed that there is at present a shortage of at least 500,000 men in civilian industries. This means that demobilization of the armed forces must be speeded up; we cannot afford to keep more than 1,500,000 men unproductively employed in the services and another 500,000 making munitions for them.

But how can this reduction in the strength of the armed forces be effected without lightening our military commitments abroad, particularly in the Middle East? From this question the transition is swift to criticism of foreign policy. The real strength of the "rebels'" case is economic rather than political, and if, as most observers expect, the "rebellion" breaks out again during the coming parliamentary session, it will be inspired by the conviction not so much that the Foreign Secretary is "anti-Communist" or is courting the risk of a third world war as that his "tough" policy has to be supported, if it is to make sense, by a draft on Britain's man-power which the country cannot afford.

The rebels themselves are by no means a homogeneous body. There is a left wing, of which the most important figure is Zilliacus, which attacks Bevin for prejudic-ing European reconstruction and forfeiting friendships which Britain needs by refusing to collaborate on close terms with the U. S. S. R. and the Communist parties on the Continent. And there is a larger, more influential right wing, which includes Crossman and Michael Foot among the intellectuals and a considerable number of trade-union M. P.'s who have no fondness for Communist parties and are dyed-in-the-wool Social Democrats. Their case against Bevin is that Britain is failing to occupy the position of mediator between unbridled American enterprise and totalitarian planning à la Russe. They argued during the debate before the recess that Britain was becoming dangerously tied to American imperialism and forfeiting its independence in foreign policy. News published during the recess of the link-up between the R. A. F. and the United States Air Force and the Anglo-American oil agreement in the Middle East will give them fresh ammunition. But whatever the parliamentary rebels do or say, the really important factor in the situation which the government will face is the growing feeling throughout the country that unless Britain's military coat is cut according to the very limited cloth of its man-power, the whole of our planned program of post-war reconstruction on semi-Socialist lines may be endangered.

We Need More Steel Mills!

BY BRYANT PUTNEY

Washington, January 17

DESPITE its war-time expansion America's industrial plant is too small to meet the immense demands of a full-employment economy. More blast furnaces and power-houses must be built, more steel mills; new mines must be opened. Unless we enlarge our plant capacity, we cannot keep a growing labor force at work or raise the national output high enough to combat inflation and insure real prosperity.

The enormous demand for consumer goods today is the result partly of short-term factors such as the sudden impact of war-deferred demands but chiefly of full employment. With many more millions now at work than at any other time in our history, all previous yardsticks of consumption are obsolete. We need more steel than the record tonnages turned out during the war. We need more oil and gasoline, more electric power, more copper and zinc and coal than we have ever produced before.

How much of each of these things we must have is indicated in a study just completed by the United States Department of Labor. The facts assembled, together with evidence from other sources, effectively explode the myth that war-time expansion created a vast amount of excess plant capacity. They show, on the contrary, that expenditures for new plant and equipment must be stepped up far beyond anything now contemplated by industry.

In calculating the volume of materials, goods, and services required to support full employment in 1950, the Labor Department analysts have assumed a labor force of 62,500,000 people (59,000,000 in civilian jobs, 1,500,000 in the armed forces, and 2,000,000 in transitional unemployment), with production geared to a forty-hour work week and a rate of output 25 to 30 per cent higher than in 1939 (because of the 3 per cent average yearly rise in the productivity of labor and machinery). We shall then need 98 to 120 million tons of ingot steel, as compared to the previous peak output of 89.2 million in 1944; 2.6 billion barrels of crude petroleum, as compared to the 1944 output—the peak since 1919—of 1.7 billion; 237 to 250 billion kilowatt-hours of electric power, as compared to the peak output of 228 billion in 1944; 47 to 64 billion board feet of lumber, as compared to the peak production of 41 billion in 1925; 24 million tons of paper and paperboard products, as compared to the peak output of 17 million in 1941; 81 to 95 million tons of coke, as compared to the peak output of 74 million in 1944; 1,182 to 1,236 million barrels of gasoline, as compared to the peak production of 723 million in 1944.

BRYANT PUTNEY is a free-lance writer in Washington. Before the war he worked for Editorial Research Reports.

The figures cited here are samples. The requirements estimated for many other industries, including retail and service trades, are also well above present plant capacity. Forecasts of the needed agricultural output are equally startling. By 1950 between 20 and 30 per cent more farm products, in addition to the war-time increase of 25 per cent, will be required. The only important exception is railroads, where a reduction from war-time peak volumes of revenue ton miles and passenger miles is predicted—mainly because of the elimination of the abnormal hauls demanded by the war in the Pacific.

The Labor Department's figures are matched or exceeded by the forecasts of other analysts. The Westinghouse Company estimates the demand for electric power three years hence at between 230 and 270 billion kilowatt-hours—a considerably higher maximum figure than that of the Labor Department. Last November John D. Small, then Civilian Production Administrator, told a group of industrialists that "by 1950 we will need steel-ingot production of from 90 to 100 million tons a year." He pointed out that "currently we are producing steel at a rate of about 80 million tons a year, and are operating the mills at practical capacity—a little over 90 per cent of theoretical capacity." Although the CPA estimates were lower than those of the Labor Department, they were high enough to make a conservative business man like Small wonder "whether we will have the steel capacity we will probably need to support a full-employment and full-production economy in 1950." Similarly, Business Week analysts, although eschewing precise totals, say that "if full employment continues, the steel shortage is likely to get worse rather than better after the middle of 1947"—though nearly all planned additions to plant capacity will have been completed by that time.

The steel outlook is, in fact, one of the gravest in the economic picture. For many months the shortage has been acting as a brake on general industrial activity. Henry Kaiser had to buy an Ohio rolling mill to get sheet steel for automobiles, thus preventing someone else from making vacuum cleaners or washing machines.

What is not generally realized is that more steel goes into a dollar's worth of peace-time goods than into armament. And the same thing is true of many other materials. Anti-aircraft guns, airplane engines, and other munitions require more labor for each ton of steel than rails, tin cans, and refrigerators. That is why steel consumption in the automotive plants declined during the war while employment rose more than 50 per cent.

Steelmaking capacity today is considerably smaller than it was on V-J Day. Between 1940 and 1945 our capacity for steel-ingot production rose from 81.6 to 95.5 million tons a year—an increase of 17 per cent. Since the end of the war it has dropped to 91.9 million tons—only 11 per cent above the pre-war level—as a result of the retirement of obsolescent plants and the shutdown of government-built plants producing specialized items like armor plate. Plant expansion will add 2.5 million tons in 1947, but this new construction is largely limited to finishing mills, which will turn out such specific products as sheet and strip. Practically no new ingot capacity is scheduled. Yet the failure to expand raw-steel production will deeply affect the whole economy by holding down plant expansion in other industries.

Despite protests from the automobile industry and producers of other consumer goods, the steelmakers are drafting no plans for plant expansion in the years ahead. Instead, their apologists are assiduously propagating the notion that the present demand is "abnormal," that shortages are due exclusively to strikes and various short-term influences. Their refusal, and that of the little group of men who control most of our other basic industries, to invest money in new plant stems from the traditional belief of big business in scarcity economics, from fear that expansion might jeopardize the dominance of the big companies, and above all from a lack of confidence in the dynamic qualities of capitalism. But whatever the causes of industry's sitdown strike against plant expansion, its results can clearly be foreseen.

Continuing shortages will lead to price rises which by reducing the ability of people to buy will cut demand and thus bring it into balance with supply—at the expense of those whose need is greatest. (This will give dubious justification to the contention that present demand is "abnormal.") Unemployment will ultimately rise to a level—perhaps eight or ten million—which corresponds roughly to the shortage of basic materials.

Although the full development of this cycle may be many months away, its beginnings are already discernible in the upward price trends of the last few months. As one Washington economist puts it: "It is as if we were witnessing the slow self-strangulation of the private-enterprise system."

The People's Front

AS I leave for Europe on another reporting assignment for The Nation, the thing that stands most sharply in my mind is the importance of making Americans realize that they can no longer interpret world events exclusively in terms of their own country's traditions. Since the liberation, Europe's intellectuals and political leaders and journalists have been engaged in a continuing provocative discussion of whether the old political conception of democracy still makes sense in view of the lessons of World War II. But the press reported no similar discussion of this question at the meetings held recently by two groups of American progressives. Perhaps that explains in part the misunderstandings that somehow constantly arise between the United States and the old Continent. In a corridor at Lake Success I heard a European delegate to the General Assembly exclaim with some irritation: "But it is amazing! These Americans don't seem to understand what is happening outside their country."

In Europe today the new revolutionary criteria of a regime's democracy are, first of all, economic and social justice—an ability to break the hold of feudalism and monopoly capital and to solve the problems of hunger and industrial collapse. This marks the coming of age of the European masses and in a certain sense the triumph of the Marxist doctrine that true democracy can only be achieved by a radical change in the economic structure.

Proponents of these ideas do not question the good faith of old-school liberals who resist any infringement of individual prerogatives and democratic safeguards, but rather the validity of their whole approach. The impact of fascism and war, they argue, revealed the utter bankruptcy of bourgeois democracy; now Europe must pass to a stage of "mass democracy," démocratie massive.

Thus for many left Europeans—Socialists, some Radicals, and even progressive Catholics—the test of a democracy is not so much a multi-party electoral system or a pillared Hall of Justice with the words "Liberty, Fraternity, Equality" cut into the portico; rather it is nationalization of the banks, agrarian reform, participation of the workers in the direction of the nation's economic and political life.

Even the classic concept of good sportsmanship between political opponents has undergone a transformation. The days of calling adversaries by their first names and shaking hands with the leaders of the anti-democratic cabal are over. For the left has learned that those on whom reaction smiles one day, it is apt to send to a concentration camp the next.

The left in Europe no longer believes that le droit de dialoguer is the supreme expression of democracy. The right of debate played a historic role as a counterpoise to the sectarian fanaticism that followed the abortive revolutions of 1848. Now dialectics shares a place with debate in the thinking of the young radicals who are determined to overcome the obstacles that stand in the way of economic democracy.

Nor do they have their fathers' unquestioning faith in the old parliamentary system. In France universal suffrage, long considered one of the glories of the Third Republic, has been criticized since the liberation as inadequate by itself. The reforms adopted by the Constituent Assembly in 1945 represented a step forward, but many Frenchmen still feel that the new system, which provides for elections at four-year intervals, does not allow sufficient popular control of the elected representatives. In France, as elsewhere in Europe, the masses are pushing toward more direct participation in the conduct of public affairs. They want to have a more effective continuing voice in government. They want to "be present." That is why the trade unions, such as the C. G. T. in France, have become a more decisive factor in the political life of Europe and constitute a kind of unofficial parliament.

The differences between the American and European interpretations of democracy become more striking as one moves eastward. The people of Eastern Europe and the Balkan states are not impressed by the Anglo-American brand of democracy. For in almost all these countries pre-war experience with Western democracy ended in failure; they succeeded neither in raising the living standards of the very poor nor in limiting the economic and political power of the rich. Elections, even if based on universal suffrage, made no difference in the all but universal poverty. As one British writer, C. G. Logio, recently observed: "If bolshevism cannot improve their situation, neither can it make it worse." To Eastern Europeans the economic reforms instituted by their new regimes have far more meaning than the eloquent pleas of Western diplomats for free elections.

Of course, there are aspects of the revolution in Eastern Europe that must appall a person imbued with the ideals—whatever their limitations in practice—of Western democracy. It would distort the facts to present the situation there as a model of the kind of world in which one would want to live. To me the most repulsive thing is to see people whom I have long known as fascists playing important roles in all the popular fronts while some of the best anti-fascists are banned from public life. But you cannot judge accurately the total effect of a historical development of such magnitude by concentrating on specific aspects, no matter how much they are to be condemned. The real question is whether or not Balkan Europe, under the new conception of democracy that is emerging from the revolution now in progress, becomes a better place for the masses of men and women than under the pseudo-parliamentary democracy of previous days. The facts on which to base such a judgment may not be available for some years.

DEL VAYO

[The People's Front will be omitted from the next issue and for the rest of the time that Mr. del Vayo is in Europe. But he will soon begin to send in reports on current social and political developments in France and other European countries.]

Sweden: Still the Middle Way

BY ROBERT HARVEY

Stockholm, January 2

WINTER came early to Stockholm this year. It arrived during the next-to-last week in October, when the bright, crisp autumn weather that had followed September rains suddenly dissolved into two days of snow. Afterward great stacks of cordwood multiplied like mushrooms in streets and areas all over the city. One woke in the morning and went to sleep at night to the whine of machine saws at work.

People probably were right to prepare early for the winter of 1946-47. It may prove to be one of the most critical winters the country has faced in more than a century.

But whatever period of travail Sweden may be entering, it is not threatened with cold and hunger and want as are other parts of Europe. Food is strictly rationed, but the people have plenty to eat. Fuel is perilously short, but no one will freeze. There are no unemployed—on the contrary, an average of only 82 statistical job-hunters apply for every 100 jobs offered. The Swedish people have apparently an infinite store of common sense, patience, and strength. The impression one gets everywhere, from the farmers' market in Göteborg to the government buildings in Stockholm and across all the tidy little farms and industrial towns in between, is one of people tending to their business. The restaurants and theaters and night clubs are gay without being hysterical; the shop windows are full for Christmas; nothing but the American coal strike and a mysterious Saturday-night dynamiter received a better press than the Norrköping soccer team's victorious tour in England. Swedish life has the same placid surface that it has had for many years.

But beneath the surface Sweden's economy is stretched as taut as a bowstring. Its industries are committed to a staggering program of production and export despite critical shortages of materials and man-power. Its chief weapon in foreign trade, the produce of its vast forest lands, is being fed into fuel-hungry furnaces at home. The nine million tons of coal and coke from abroad which are the straw for Swedish industrial bricks are not to be had. The state treasury, carrying a record national debt from the war years and planning record expenditures during the next decade, is lending a good sixth of the national income to foreign countries to finance a post-war trade and aid Europe's reconstruction. The price index, despite rigid price control, is nudging the point where automatic wage increases will go into effect. Swedish employers and labor representatives have begun negotiating their annual contracts, and the 1946 negotiations promise to be bitterly contested; further additions to wages that are at the highest money level—though not real-income level—of all time are almost inevitable. Finance Minister Ernest Wigforss is beset with overwhelming demands for tax relief which would knock a half-billion kronor off urgently needed state revenues. There is an acute housing shortage, there is a plethora of money, there is a shortage of many consumer goods. There is, in short, every necessary ingredient for a first-rate inflationary explosion.

What gives a special significance to such a situation is, first, the fact that upon this load of dynamite is riding one of the most comprehensive programs of social planning that has ever been coupled with a basically private-enterprise economy and a thoroughly democratic—by any definition you choose to give the word—political system. The success, whole or partial, of the present Social Democratic government in coping with present difficulties will mean a great deal to the future social health of Sweden, and, by example, to the rest of the world. And second, though any comparison between such a small and tightly knit country and a giant, sprawling one cannot be very accurate, there is an intriguing parallel between Sweden and the United States today. Faced with very similar problems, Sweden has chosen, though not without dissenting voices, to stick by government control and planning to tide it through its time of crisis.

Sweden's plans and Sweden's troubles are thus worth a close examination during the next years. In a world divided into a free-for-all contest between left and right, this isolated little corner of Europe has chosen a course that puts almost all the components of modern liberalism at stake. Internally and externally its "middle way" is subjected to terrific pressures and pulls from both sides. The burning question in Sweden today is whether those forces can be resisted, forces that operate to drive it toward a more rigid, more arbitrarily class-conscious and perhaps less democratic society on the one hand and on the other toward an alignment with a free-swinging Western capitalism. Its fate can almost be considered a test of whether or not chaos and collectivism will be the only alternatives in the last half of the twentieth century.

ROBERT HARVEY left his job as assistant managing editor of The Nation to spend a year in Sweden. He is now The Nation's correspondent in the Scandinavian countries.

The position in which World War II placed Sweden was the beginning of its post-war crisis. The immediate injury was the disruption of foreign trade. More than half of Sweden's normal coal supply lay in England on the other side of a shipping blockade. Its pre-war sources of worked iron were scattered all over the globe and like coal and coke and other materials were being diverted to the military needs of the belligerents. Its access to petroleum, rubber, many minerals, fertilizers, fodder, textiles, and food imports became precarious. It needed such goods for two purposes—to maintain minimum levels of consumer goods and industrial production, and to arm itself against the threat of military attack. The result was a heavy increase in trade with Germany to the point where during one period of the war the Third Reich was supplying 54 per cent of Swedish imports.

Food rationing came with the drop in imports of fats, fodder, and fertilizer, and with successive poor harvests in 1940 and 1941. During most of the period between June, 1942, and August, 1945, twenty-two items were on the ration list, if you include a few inedible ones like soap, candles, and tobacco.

Price control was clamped on most goods, but not effectively until after steep living-cost rises had already taken place. Thus although the official index has been held fairly stable since 1943—food and rent in particular have been kept in close check throughout the war—it now stands at about 243, with July, 1914, levels as 100. This represents a rise of about 50 per cent from October, 1939, but a climb of only 4 points from the level of 239 reached at the end of 1942. The apparent stability is to some extent theoretical; living costs actually have risen more than the index reveals, largely because of the disappearance of cheaper goods from the market and reduced consumption; and the labor unions are now asking compensation for further cost-of-living increases which actually do not show up on the index.

In the broad view, then, Sweden built up during the war to an economic situation in many ways similar to that of the United States. There exists now a heavy backlog of purchasing power and consumer demand, an unprecedented investment activity, particularly in the building industry, and marked shortages. Unlike the United States, however, Sweden's return to any semblance of stability is primarily dependent on its capacity to import as it did before the war. Unlike the United States, its labor shortage is due as much to a long-range population trend, which must be countered in terms of increased industrial productivity, as to a war-time distortion. And unlike the United States, Sweden has chosen not to abandon its war-time—and pre-war—controls.

There is little hint of tension or developing crisis among the streets and plentiful parks of Stockholm. The life of the city, like life all over Sweden, is made up of comfortable, everyday details—not of trends and statistical tables. The trolleys are a little more crowded, perhaps, than before, but both they and the trim little electric trains still run punctually on the dot. You can have your choice of American, English, French, Russian, and Swedish movies. Opera is given daily, as well as concerts, plays, and a score of art shows. For the first time since 1939 candles were not rationed for Lucia Day festivities, and cities and towns and offices all over the country chose their "Lucias" to wear the white robe and crown of candles in ceremonies celebrating this national holiday that betokens the coming of more light. Restaurants are still limited in the size of their smörgasbord, but the meals they serve are big and good, and for the most part inexpensive. Food-rationing holds in the restaurants as well as in the market—eating places issue restaurant cards against household ration coupons—a system which has been a big factor in the success of Sweden's rationing system and in minimizing the threat of a black market. There is a black market here, by the way, but not a considerable one. The heaviest illegal traffic is probably in meat and is estimated to amount, in value, to about 10 per cent of the legal market; the literal-minded Swedes keep careful statistics even on the black market—chiefly, a rationing official delightedly explained to me, by a close comparison of figures on the sale of hides and on the sale of carcasses through legal channels.

Stockholm workmen are earning an average of between 125 and 150 kronor a week—about $34 to $41. Milk costs about 9 cents a quart, butter about 55 cents a pound, white bread about 12 cents a loaf, prime beef about 45 cents a pound. Fifty to seventy-five cents will buy a good meal in any of the smaller restaurants. Clothing prices run relatively higher on the whole, and are much on a par with American ones, though I have seen plenty of ready-made suits of seemingly good quality selling for the equivalent of $30 or $40. Rents are harder to picture accurately, because the housing shortage is such that one has to take what one can get, and the lower-priced apartments are practically impossible to find. The figures, however, show that the average rental for an unfurnished three-room-and-kitchen apartment is about $65 a month. The co-ops are much cheaper, but centrally located furnished flats command much more. All these figures are for Stockholm only: wages are lower in all other sections of the country, but the relationship of wages to local prices is about the same everywhere.

Heat and warm water still have to be doled out carefully, but there is no longer heat rationing. The use of fuel oil for heating has increased steeply—plans are in the works for a pipe line from the port of Göteborg through central Sweden to Stockholm. The coal supply, after dropping to almost nothing in the months just before and after the armistice, has gradually come back to its war-time average and is showing signs of improvement. Home fuel prices, unlike the cost of industrial fuel, have been kept fairly stable.

Books, native and translations, come off the presses in a steady stream, and magazine kiosks are jammed with scores of excellent Swedish periodicals. Expressen, one of the city's ten or a dozen major dailies, is adding Li'l Abner to its stable of comic strips. The technical and scientific schools are full to overflowing. The ski inns are booked solid through April.

Stockholm is a deceptive city. There is a surface polish of "Americanism" that makes a United States visitor feel at home, but roots deep in the Scandinavian past give the city its character. There is a strong sense of continuity in Sweden, an inherent calm, a distrust of rapid change. The Swedes' devotion to their "middle way"—to the rational and practical and just approach—is real and lasting. But the "middle way" is coming in for a time of severe trial.

"The Conference of the Excluded"

BY WILBUR H. BALDINGER

Washington, January 18

THE powerful Negro share-cropper, a delegate from the cotton country of Crittenden County, Arkansas, couldn't read or write, but he did think and talk. Six feet four, 240 pounds, he got the floor at the convention of the National Farm Labor Union, A. F. of L., and made a speech.

"I caught aolt of the union thirteen years ago," he said in a voice that rumbled up from his shoes, "and I ain't gonna let it go. It looks to me like this convention is a shattering of a new day."

The Reverend W. H. Wilburn, local president at Lake Village, Arkansas, said with prayerful fervor, "I hope the Lord will bless my tongue so that when I get back I will be able to tell the people just a little bit about what I've seen and heard."

All the intensity and consecration but little of the sham of a revival meeting appeared at this unique union's convention in the A. B. Pugh Bible Class room in the low-ceilinged basement of Washington's pillared Mt. Vernon Place Methodist Church, which was borrowed for the three-day "Conference of the Excluded." Representing more than 30,000 dues-paying members on a family basis ($4 a year), but lacking any legal bargaining privileges, the union resolved that some 4,000,000 American share-croppers and field workers were entitled to their dignity and their rights and to hope for some measure of security, such as federal old-age and health insurance and federal-state unemployment compensation.

Wearing faded store clothes, clinging to jalopies, riding buses, the 102 delegates came in from Mississippi, Missouri, Texas, Alabama, New Mexico, Arkansas, Tennessee, even New Jersey. Church box suppers had helped raise money for expenses. The women in Local 13 at Oak Grove, Arkansas, had peddled catfish sandwiches for a dime apiece in order to send a representative. J. F. Hynds, seventy-five, was in from Spruce Pine, Alabama, where he runs the union's co-op store. He filed a proud report that the store was started in 1943 with a capital-stock investment of $334, and that it now had $412.63 in the bank and $173.49 in the cash drawer, in addition to goods on the shelves worth $2,531.02. A Negro delegate, praising the work of his white union brother, said the co-op store was an example of how when everybody co-opped together, they could get somewhere.

The applauding convention voted Delegate Hynds a life membership in the National Farm Labor Union, an honor which was almost more than he could bear. "You have thrown the harness over me for the rest of my life," he said. "I've been sick in my bed, but as long as my tongue doesn't get paralyzed, wheel me down to the courthouse and I'll cry out against injustice."

This was the first convention of the organization—formerly the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union—under an A. F. of L. charter, which was issued last August, but the thirteenth since a group of share-croppers met at Tyronza, Arkansas, in 1934 and elected big, slow-talking H. L. Mitchell president of a union of farm workers.

A. F. of L. President William Green promised that 7,000,000 other union members would back the N. F. L. U. in its struggle upward from peonage. Senator George D. Aiken, Republican liberal from Vermont, was a statesman to look at and listen to. The delegates responded with church-like "That's right!" and "Amen!" when Gardner Jackson, former New Deal administrator in the Department of Agriculture, warned that mechanization of United States farms was bringing on a displaced-persons problem in the South for which the nation was not prepared. "Unless the organization drive you are undertaking, backed by the A. F. of L., succeeds, hundreds of thousands of you people and your families are likely to be forced out of your homes into a wandering army seeking livelihoods in an industrial labor market without a chance for proper training for the change," Jackson said.

It was an encouraging and gratifying thing for the delegates to be assured that important people were worrying about the woes the union members had been talking about and working against in the meeting halls—usually crossroads Baptist and Methodist churches—and fields back home. But it was even more important to know that the union itself, offering no more than bare hope to its dues-payers, was growing and developing. This was something that the share-croppers and field hands were doing themselves. Last year nineteen new locals were set up, and 5,000 new members went on the N. F. L. U. rolls at Memphis headquarters. The submerged and silent poor whites and blacks in the South were becoming articulate on their own account, through their own union. The ambitious union goal last year was for an annual wage of $625 for farm workers.

Another important thing was that Southern Negro and white soil-tillers were sitting down together in the conference with easy and unself-conscious equality—more than half of the delegates were Negro. This atmosphere was in itself a tremendous testament to the union's influence in the South, where a feeling of superiority over Negroes often has been the only thing sustaining white share-croppers' self-respect. The Ku Klux Klan was loathed by all present; N. F. L. U. members at the same time were sufficiently sophisticated politically to recognize and reject Communist Party infiltration, which had plagued the union in its formative years.

President Mitchell continues to be the share-croppers' Moses in their tortuous trek toward the half-promised land of the Wagner, Wage-Hour, and Social Security acts. Equally venerated by members is the union's vice-president, F. R. Betton, a sixty-year-old, white-thatched Negro who settled at Cotton Plant, Arkansas, after the KKK chased him out of Georgia. He owns his farm, has put eight of his eleven children through school, and for twenty-three years was the only Negro justice of the peace in Arkansas.

The director of organization, who has been at work for the past year, is Captain Barney Taylor, who lost an eye in Normandy and won the Distinguished Service Cross. Before he joined the army Terry was international representative of the American Newspaper Guild, for Southern organization. He is paid $200 a month by the N. F. L. U. The president gets $3,600 a year.

The National Farm Labor Union has been and will be something to watch. Nothing gives more hope for the regeneration of the South. Its potential membership is more than 4,000,000. If that potential is ever reached, one of its songs will be sung triumphantly instead of defiantly:

We won't budge until we conquer
We will stand until we conquer
We will fight until we conquer,
Workers in the field.

In the Wind

RIFFLING THROUGH wire desk-baskets, the Wind has been culling the morning mail recently. A great many people, it finds, take a lot for granted when they address words to The Nation. There is Milton M. Enzer for one, a public-relations assistant to W. Gibson Carey, Jr., of Yale and Towne. In speaking of his boss Mr. Enzer is prone to generalities like this: "Mr. Carey, as you probably recall, is a former president of the Chamber of Commerce. . . ." Mr. Enzer, you should live that long. . .

THEN THERE'S the C. of C. itself, blithely sending along one of its pamphlets in which the following nugget is buried: "Periodicals such as The Nation . . . enjoyed almost a sacrosanct status among many government officials. These publications . . . were pro-Soviet. . ."

NOT TO BE OUTDONE, The Nation's own regular clipping service weighs in with a tear-sheet of the December Manufacturer's Record, quoting Victor Kravchenko on the subject of "pro-Soviet weeklies like The Nation."

NOW A BOOKLET from the Foundation for Economic education: "Briefly—So You Believe in Rent Control?" It comprises, briefly, fifteen pages informing the world that rent control is a form of stealing.

ON ANOTHER desk top the Wind uncovers a statement by Charles T. Stewart, public-relations director of the National Association of Real Estate Boards. While deploring public housing, Mr. Stewart has discovered that "there are families who need help to get decent housing." "The satisfying of that need," he adds, "is the practice of charity . . . which many of us have always believed to be a virtue." Sure, 'tis a fine brave thing of you to say so, Mr. Stewart.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Famine and Surplus

THIS year we in America can look forward to a more varied and abundant diet than ever. Supplies of most foods are ample, the chief exception being sugar, and there are signs of a downward trend in prices. During the current food year, which ends in June, our consumption per head will be well above the pre-war level—a reflection, of course, not only of enlarged supplies but of full employment and increased purchasing power. We share this good fortune with a number of other food-exporting countries, but a recently published report of the Food and Agricultural Organization of the U. N. tells me: "A major food crisis still confronts the world. Over wide areas of China famine conditions have prevailed for many months. Many people in Europe are living on a diet of 1,500 calories or less, and the European situation will deteriorate sharply in the spring, since in several countries domestic food supplies will become exhausted."

These facts are confirmed by the Department of Agriculture's Office of Foreign Agricultural Relations, which reported in a recent statement that for a large part of continental Europe the food outlook for the first six months of this year was just as serious as a year ago. In nine countries rations for the non-farm population amount to 2,000 calories or less daily. "Such consumption levels," the statement declares, "are insufficient to maintain a population year after year, to say nothing of rehabilitating lost body weight and capacity to work."

The F. A. O. report provides some particulars of the consequences of widespread malnutrition—lowered resistance to disease in general, the spread of scourges such as tuberculosis, the increase of infant mortality, which in Yugoslavia, for instance, is said to be 370 per 1,000 live births. In North China, according to a survey made last year, calory intake in some districts was under 500 per head, with people eating grass and weeds. In one area 32 per cent of the population was suffering from famine oedema, a condition in which the limbs and body become horribly bloated. "Malaria is endemic both in Kwangsi and Honan," this survey declared, "and relapsing fever, dysentery, some cholera, and many other diseases are present. Weakened by hunger, these malnourished people are subject to any infection."

But while the specter of starvation haunts large parts of Europe and Asia, in America, according to the Wall Street Journal, "the specter of a wheat surplus in 1947 worries Washington officials." Favorable weather conditions promise another bumper crop of winter wheat, with the result that July (new crop) wheat has recently been quoted in the futures market at $1.80 a bushel, nearly 40 cents below the current cash price. A fall in value of this magnitude will force the government to support the market on a large scale to keep the price of wheat at 90 per cent of parity in conformity with the Steagall amendment of the Price Control Act of 1942. Nor is wheat the only farm product likely to qualify for similar support. Last year the government spent something like $80,000,000 to shore up the collapsed potato market. Eggs and sorghums are now at or below the 90 per cent of parity level; barley, corn, and peanuts are getting within hailing distance, and before the end of the year they could be joined by cotton and burley tobacco. "Uncle Sam," said the Wall Street Journal of December 27, 1946, "faces billion-dollar losses as growers step up output despite falling prices. . . . Wheat alone could run to $500,000,000 next year. Agricultural officials see production limits as the only safeguard."

Is this really the only way of coping with the problem of American overabundance? Cannot this corpulent ghost that haunts Washington be confronted with the lean ghost of hunger which roams the world, with a view to mutual exorcism? That idea was the essence of the plan presented to the F. A. O. by its director, Sir John Orr, who wanted to build an ever-normal granary for the world so that the fear of plenty and the fear of want might both be banished. But the United States government objected; the scheme threatened to interfere with the freedom of private trading. It was Washington also that played a major part in the decision to discontinue UNRRA and that squelched LaGuardia's alternative proposal of an Emergency Food Fund. Henceforth international relief is to be on a bilateral basis, with those nations in a position to afford aid to others to decide for themselves to whom it shall be given and on what terms.

The role of the United Nations is now reduced to sponsorship of a special technical committee on relief needs, which will report to member governments. This committee has already heard pleas from twelve nations, and an unofficial check indicates that five of these together—Poland, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, Greece, and China—estimate emergency food requirements in the coming year at $500,000,000. Specific figures from the other seven—Italy, Hungary, Austria, Finland, Ethiopia, Korea, and the Philippines—are not yet forthcoming, but they are expected to bring the grand total to at least $1,000,000,000.

In his budget message last week President Truman asked Congress to appropriate $305,000,000 for international relief, and in addition some Export-Import credits may be made available for food loans. But there is no means of telling what American assistance those hungry countries deemed to be deserving may count on until the dominant Republicans have finished their budget-shaving operations. It is to be hoped that while engaged on this task they will consider international relief in relation to the coming farm-surplus problem. Otherwise they may find themselves in the fatuous position of saving on one section of the budget only to insure the necessity of later additions to another. The stringent limitation of gifts and loans for food purchases by foreign countries may well mean greatly increased expenditures for the support of farm prices. The government in effect will continue to buy food, but instead of shipping it to hungry people will pile it up in warehouses, where it is likely to stay until it rots. Will the American people indorse this kind of "economy," or will they insist that the proper way to appease the specter of surplus food is to banish the specter of want?

IN ONE EAR

BY LOU FRANKEL

BEHIND the current G. O. P. drive to name Marion Martin, former executive of the Republican National Committee, to the Federal Communications Commission is the Republican Party's yen to induce the commission to abandon its public-service standards and return to the political-fix mode of operation, with all the plunderbund overtones characteristic of the technique.

For the last ten years the FCC has ignored the political angles and made its decisions on social, economic, and technical grounds. But the Republicans want an FCC that will bow to political exigencies. Of course the Democrats wanted much the same thing, but they couldn't get it during the life of F. D. R. because the late President recognized the social and propaganda importance of broadcasting and gave the commission strong chairmen.

Today with both big business, in the guise of the advertisers, and the broadcasters looking for ways and means of clipping the FCC for the attitude it took toward radio in its "Blue Book," the G. O. P. scents an opportunity to strike a blow for "less government regulation and more free enterprise." The dollar politicians of both parties would like to see radio run by the business men of the nation and "to hell with this public-service drive!" And the old wheelhorses would like to make certain that elections are not won on the air, as they were by F. D. R., but in the press.

To accomplish its ends the G. O. P. realizes it will need a complaisant commission. For this reason both Rosel Hyde and Ray C. Wakefield, the Republican incumbents, are under fire as "not real Republicans," meaning, of course, that they do not respond to the efforts of political fixers. The G. O. P. wants to put a stooge on the commission who will do nothing but consider the political qualifications of applicants.

With the Republicans exerting pressure in favor of Miss Martin, the few persons in radio who realize the implications of what the G. O. P. wants and the adverse effect this will have on radio are plugging for James M. Mead, the ex-Senator from New York. But they are worried lest Mead take the Postmaster-Generalship.

The FCC consists of six commissioners and a chairman, appointed by the President for seven-year terms with tenure so staggered that a new appointment is due each year. No political party is to have more than four members. Currently the commission is staffed with three Democrats, two Republicans, and one independent; the vacancy caused by Paul Porter's resignation is still unfilled. Though Porter was a Democrat, the G. O. P. claims the appointment with the argument of "we are now the majority party and entitled to equal representation." The present line-up is as follows:

Ray C. Wakefield, Republican, lawyer, expert on utilities, in bad with the G. O. P. machine for not recognizing political pressures, votes like a right-wing liberal; term expires in 1947.

Clifford J. Durr, Democrat, lawyer with knowledge of utilities, the one true progressive on the commission; term expires in 1948.

The appointment to Paul Porter's place will run until 1949.

E. K. Jett, independent, engineer, votes ultra-conservative; term expires in 1950.

Charles R. Denny, Democrat, came up from the legal ranks of the commission to become its chairman, votes down the middle; term expires in 1951.

Rosel Hyde, Republican, started with the commission as a messenger, became a lawyer on its staff, votes like a liberal and is in disfavor with the G. O. P.; term expires in 1952.

Paul A. Walker, Democrat, lawyer, knowledge of utilities, especially telephone, votes liberal; term expires in 1953.

Thus on their voting records the commissioners break down into one arch-conservative, one genuine progressive, one middle-of-the-roader, and three right-wing liberals. This make-up gives the commission a liberal flavor and inclines it to stress the public good rather than political advantage.

The most imminent danger is that Truman will allow the G. O. P. to fill the Porter vacancy. But the situation will again be critical when Wakefield comes up for reappointment in 1947 and Durr in 1948. Though Wakefield is a Republican, the G. O. P. will not want him on the FCC unless he sees the light. Durr, a Democrat, has come a long way since he was an attorney for the Commonwealth and Southern, and has the entire industry gunning for him; the Democrats therefore will put up no fight to keep him.

That the present FCC does not think along political lines is shown by several recent incidents. There was the G. O. P. rap at Wakefield and Hyde. Then Senator MacKellar blasted the commission for this very non-political thinking. There was also the famous fracas between the FCC and Congressman Eugene Cox, and more recently the denial of a license to Bob Kerr, former Governor of Oklahoma and keynoter of the 1944 Democratic convention. If ever politics was going to get someone a license, it was when Kerr applied for a station in Peoria, Illinois. But it didn't work.

The big stick in the Republicans' hands is the threat of a Congressional investigation of the FCC. Some trade prophets say the G. O. P. will agree to call off the investigation in return for the appointment of Marion Martin. Others think the G. O. P. will get the appointment and the investigation also. Still others think the G. O. P. will do without the investigation simply to please the big radio-equipment manufacturers—Westinghouse, Philco, G. E., R. C. A.—who want the FCC in session to settle the future of television and other disputed questions so that they can do business. If the commission is being put over the hurdles on the Hill, they will have to mark time.

The FCC is probed each year at budget time by both House and Senate, and all anyone has been able to say is that it does a splendid job of serving the listener. Yet unless President Truman fights to keep greedy political hands off it, the commercial radio interests are going to have a walk-over and the "good radio" people will be nowhere.

BOOKS and the ARTS

When There Is a Tolstoy

LEO TOLSTOY. By Ernest Simmons. An Atlantic Monthly Press Book. Little, Brown and Company. $5.

MR. SIMMONS'S new biography of Tolstoy puts a great deal of material in good order; perhaps as much material as any American will ever need—except a full edition of the letters—in supplement to Tolstoy's own works. The book is written with reserve, care, and out of an almost anonymous sensibility; it assumes greatness in Tolstoy's works and it displays a good deal of the complexity and stress in Tolstoy's life; it makes few interpretations and forces no conclusions. The shape of the book is chronological and factual; it tells what happened when. It is also a warm book. To those who read biography for amorphous pleasure and to mull the habits of men, the book should be interesting enough to reread. But much more than that, the rich material Mr. Simmons presents—much of it new—should be permanently useful to critical students of Tolstoy from several points of view. This is exactly what books of this kind ought to be, and we should be very grateful for the skill, industry, and patience with which Mr. Simmons has done his chosen job. It is the kind of secondary work which makes the primary work of interpretation and judgment possible; it lays open chances and predicts choices of thought.

For example, it gives a chance—and I do not think Maude's biography, because it was a disciple's job, did this—to see Tolstoy as the great exemplar of the man who in life or thought could never reach a tolerable relation with any existing form of society, but who through his imaginative work, through the free institution of the novel, again and again reached relations either satisfactory or fatal, not with a utopian society, but with the actual society at hand.

That was Tolstoy's case. In what is called thought he could only destroy, reject, or deny; in what is called art he was compelled to create, accept, and affirm. His intellectual distrust of society was not that of skepticism but of incapacity, waywardness, and the fractionalism of ignorance; the skepticism that haunts his novels was that of creation, momentum, and deep knowledge. The type is not uncommon, it varies from Plato to Stendhal to Yeats; but Tolstoy was the extreme of the type because he raised to passionate intensity every aspect of the split which is its characteristic. This he could do because he had never been educated not to; he had never been educated in the compensatory, destructive costs of his series of individual ideals—though if he had looked back on it from the perspective of the Leo Tolstoy railroad station, where he died, he might have seen the wreck of his own life as a token of the general cost.

He knew that his ideals—of anarchism, pacifism, chastity, freedom from possessions, and the gospel of the Sermon on the Mount—were unrealizable, but he did not, in his thought and action, know at what level of the effort to realize them they destroyed themselves and became their own monsters. That is, he had in life no means of playing out fruitfully the roles his ideals required of him. Therefore all his heroisms were heroic fallacies. He could not create the truth of them either in his own life or in the lives of his disciples. Naturally his disciples were what his wife called the "dark, dark people! Morally sick and wretched!" and he himself remained the Pharisee in his own temple.

How did this happen to the author of "War and Peace," "Anna Karenina," "The Death of Ivan Ilyich," "Resurrection," and all the rest? Why did the deep and plastic order of his art become the rancorous and intransigent anarchy of his mind? Why did what was lovable and lovely in life and art become in life and thought the source of a spreading and frantic grudge? Why did every instinct that required harmony take to expressing itself in conflict?

The questions are lyric, and in their asking is their answer. But beside the question we can set one or two series of suggestive statements, doubtless not true at all in themselves, but true enough when taken with the questions. So far as we know, Tolstoy lived and saw directly; he made up his own mind. That is, he ignored the barriers to vision and made no allowance for most of the elements that lead to decision; he believed his conscious mind alone was equal to both its traditional and its unconscious roles. Thus it was natural for him to distrust medicine and science, politics and church. He who believes that he has made up his own mind will always find himself in a heretical position with regard to his own orthodoxy—let alone in regard to the undisclosed general orthodoxy; but he will be unable to know this, and will on the contrary regard his own mind as omniscient. Except for its disciples, such a mind will always find itself dispossessed, and in society even its sincerity—the virtue it really has—will be impugned. Society will say of him: Yes, that is what he thinks; but he really knows better.

Such is the fate of a mind which depends in its intellectual work upon undigested common sense. Undigested common sense will cut through and dissolve the folly in one's own mind but will not replace it; its only effect on the minds of others is to harden the folly it touches. For example, in Tolstoy's life, his letter to the new Czar asking him to free his father's assassins, and again the authority which he assigned to his own uninstructed examination and citation of the Gospels. As these labors of common sense are increasingly frustrated, the self-remedy of omniscience is the hardening of intransigence and the resort to prophecy. The results are right in the tragic sense that the mind that made them comes to depend entirely upon a society in which it cannot participate because it has not created it, and is therefore lost, lonely, and utterly deprived, as was Tolstoy at his death.

Such is one set of statements to put beside the Tolstoy questions. Another set is equally necessary. These same themes and procedures, these obsessive convictions, this addiction to the direct vision and to common sense, when submitted to the drive, the control, the form—if you like, to the institutional inertia—of the novel, became, as expressions of dramatic possibilities, powerful participating forces in the actual society to which as argued arbitrary ideals they were mere intransigent affronts. No incapacity of Tolstoy's mind was so great as that which led him to condemn both his own and Shakespeare's greatest work because they showed no ideas. The truth was that the works showed ideas alive and actual; the truth was, as Augustine almost said, they added to God's creation in the life of art, where in the life of intellect, without the drive of society, they merely broke it down.

These two sets of statements have no necessary connection aside from the tragic questions which Tolstoy's life raises; but there they make the difference between frustration and achievement. They suggest also by what means one great function of art—the transformation of inadequate but passionate thought into overwhelming actuality—may be brought about. "When there is a Tolstoy in literature," Mr. Simmons cites Chekov, "then it is easy and pleasant to be a writer; even to recognize that one has not done or will not do anything is not so terrible, for Tolstoy does it for all."

R. P. BLACKMUR

Escape from Europe

UNDERGROUND TO PALESTINE. By I. F. Stone. Boni and Gaer. $2.50

IZZY STONE, with his usual modesty, says that he can only record what he "saw and heard, traveling with the less fortunate but bravest of my people." But "Underground to Palestine" is far more than a factual report on the great movement out of Europe by the Jewish people. It is in reality a case history which buttresses and supports the historic letter of Earl Harrison to President Truman in 1945 on the same subject; which breathes life and gives reality to the recommendations of the Anglo-American Committee.

When Stone traveled the Jewish underground in Europe and arrived ultimately in Palestine on a so-called illegal boat, he did something which no official could possibly do. He got first-hand testimony from the displaced Jews, as a friend. He became one of them. The leaky boats on which they got to Palestine were described to us on the Anglo-American Committee by Dr. Chaim Weizmann, president of the World Zionist Organization, when he testified before us in Jerusalem. But no testimony, even from such a high source, could possibly take the place of the moving eyewitness account which Stone gives in "Underground to Palestine." We knew, of course, of the great exodus from Europe of the Jewish people, an exodus unparalleled in their history. We dismissed as impracticable the repeated suggestions, some from good and others from questionable sources, that the fragment of the Jewish people should be persuaded to stay in Europe. What Stone does is to make the reader see and understand why we reached that decision, why the surviving Jews of Europe must leave that hate-infested continent, and why in overwhelming majority they want, indeed, are compelled by circumstances, to go to Palestine.

Stone makes it clear, as it was clear to us, that nothing will stop these persecuted people from rebuilding a great Jewish community in Palestine. That is a cardinal fact. It is a fact which I am afraid is not grasped either by Mr. Bevin or Mr. Byrnes. The record of the past two years shows that the British Foreign Office and the United States State Department can hinder these people in their desire to go home, can delay them, but cannot stop them. Yet the delaying tactics continue, and the need for a decisive solution becomes more and more acute.

All who are familiar with the subject of the displaced Jews and Palestine are obliged to come to Stone's conclusions. It is folly for the Jewish people to expect anything from the present British government except disappointment, betrayal, and attack, in spite of the strong opposition within the Labor Party, led by Dick Crossman. This is so because those in control of British policy feel the need of developing a strong Arab bloc of states to offset any possible excursion by the Soviet Union into the Middle East. There is also the belief, held by some members of the Foreign Office, that the returning Jews bring to Palestine the modern ideas of the West, and consequently jeopardize the colonial structure of the whole Middle East. Thus the further development of the National Home is regarded in certain British quarters not only as a threat to the colonial and feudal pattern of the Palestinian Arabs but as a potential threat to the entire British position in that region.

Izzy Stone has pointed out the ceaseless struggle of the Jewish survivors of Nazi persecution against the British determination to maintain post-war control of all the Middle East. He correctly evaluates British policy, but I believe he has overlooked the fact that Britain could not possibly pursue that policy without the tacit and in some instances the active

Pablo Neruda

RESIDENCE ON EARTH AND OTHER POEMS

Neruda—the Communist Senator of Chile—greatest poet writing in the Spanish language today. A representative selection of his poetry—translated by Angel Flores—Spanish originals included.

. . . . A New Directions Book. $3.50 support of the American State Department. Our American policy of expediency and delay is followed despite the earnest, well-intentioned efforts of President Truman to clean out the camps of Europe.

I hope that every member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee will read "Underground to Palestine." The publisher should see that Ernest Bevin and Clement Attlee have copies. They need particularly to read it. Britain is making a ghastly mistake in Palestine. So are we.

We desperately need, together with the British, to recapture the moral prestige which the Western democracies have forfeited. In the long run, helping the Jews in the creation and development of the National Home in Palestine is helping ourselves. For it is not possible for the Middle East to remain an area of backwardness, a territory of natives and native rulers to be handled in the traditional, imperialistic way. The fact is plain for all to see: colonial peoples everywhere in the world are on the march toward freedom. In the vanguard of that march are the Jewish pioneers. It is of them that Stone has written so simply and so nobly.

BARTLEY C. CRUM

BRIEFER COMMENT

Roosevelt's Doctor

VICE-ADMIRAL MCINTIRE'S book, "White House Physician" (Putnam, $3), written "in collaboration with" George Creel, presents indispensable detail concerning Roosevelt's health during the twelve years of his Presidency. Its tone in these matters is inevitably somewhat defensive, but Dr. McIntire's cheery confidence about Roosevelt's physical condition in 1944 appears in retrospect to be justified by the available medical evidence, and cerebral hemorrhage is in any case swift and unforeseeable in its action.

Apart from the medical data, "White House Physician" contains a miscellany of reminiscence drawn from McIntire's tour of duty with Roosevelt. The doctor is typical of several people who were close to F. D. R. through his Presidency but managed to avoid much interest in or understanding of the New Deal. His political hero is evidently Cordell Hull; he regards Ed Stettinius as a much underrated Secretary of State, as if that were possible; and he can remark of Admiral Leahy, "No man had more intimate knowledge of French politics and politicians." One misses only a eulogy of Leo Crowley.

The political perceptions are thus not acute, but a wealth of revealing incident slips in none the less. McIntire supplies a pathetic and unforgettable addition to the picture of Roosevelt's acceptance address at Philadelphia in 1936. A bolt in the President's braces snapped open as he advanced toward the platform, throwing him off balance and scattering the pages of his speech; but he recovered to deliver that stirring oration—"This generation of Americans has a rendezvous with destiny"—reshuffling the misplaced pages with complete aplomb. There is a curious passage about Roosevelt's impulse to refuse the 1940 nomination because of the convention's resistance to Henry Wallace; and McIntire makes it quite clear that Bill Douglas was Roosevelt's first choice for the Vice-Presidency in 1944. Connoisseurs of the post-humous squabble over Roosevelt's foreign policy will note that the President apparently talked more skeptically about communism and the U. S. S. R. to his physician than to his son.

ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, JR.

Alexander H. Stephens

THE STATUE OF ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS in the Capitol in Washington is dwarfed between the over-size figures of Zebulon Vance of North Carolina and Ethan

COMMENTARY

Featured in the Current Issue

"THE INTELLECTUALS AND EUROPE'S FUTURE,"

by Stephen Spender

What hope is there for a reopening of the international lines of communication in the world of thought?

"FROM MARXISM TO JUDAISM," by Will Herberg

A labor leader and radical tells why he now thinks Jewish religious belief superior to Marxism as a dynamic for social reconstruction.

"PALESTINE: A POSSIBLE SOLUTION," by Alvin Johnson

An outstanding social thinker offers the non-territorial federal state as his answer to the dilemma of conflicting interests in Palestine.

"DEMOCRACY NEEDS THE OPEN DOOR," by Oscar Handlin

Why we need new immigrants if we are to overcome the social and political hardening that has resulted from our quota restrictions.

"TALES OF THE HASIDIM," by Martin Buber

Legends and sayings of the giants of eastern European Judaism, collected and retold by a great German-Jewish scholar.

"WHY THE DP'S CAN'T WAIT," by Leo Srole

A distinguished sociologist describes at first hand the life of the Landsberg DP camp, and outlines an international plan of rescue for the thousands who still await re-settlement.

"THE PARLOR TERRORISTS," by Nathan Glazer

The political implications of Arthur Koestler's Thieves in the Night.

"THE AMERICANISM OF ADOLPH S. OCHS," by Louis Berg

An analysis of the man who made the New York Times, and of his pattern of Jewish adjustment to America.

"ADJUSTING MEN TO MACHINES," by Daniel Bell

How the sociologists of factory life seek to make the worker happy—and increase "efficiency." An appraisal of recent studies.

PLUS: "The Month in History," by Sidney Hertzberg; "Yivo Comes to Morningside," by Milton R. Konvitz. Fiction, poetry, reviews.

SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER

This Issue and 3 Others for $1. Mail with a dollar bill.

COMMENTARY, 425 4th Ave., N. Y. 16, N. Y.

Please send me COMMENTARY for four months, starting with this issue, at the special introductory offer. I enclose $1.00.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

CITY.....ZONE.....STATE.....

One Year—$4.00

N 3

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST.
near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENCY
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

RKO NOW

"ON THE BEAM . . . DELIGHTFUL."—PM.

JEANNE CRAIN

LYNN BARI • ALAN YOUNG

'Margie'

IN TECHNICOLOR

Based on Stories by Ruth McKenny & Richard Branston

—AND—

"DICK TRACY vs. CUEBALL"
MORGAN CONWAY • ANNE JEFFREYS

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MABLE
HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT REPUBLIC
TILYOU
Coney Island

Queens
MIDWAY
Forest Hills
ALDEN
Jamaica
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

Manhattan
COLONIAL
B'way & 62 St.

PARAMOUNT Presents

Loretta YOUNG • David NIVEN

In HAL WALLIS' Production

'The Perfect Marriage'

Directed by LEWIS ALLEN

A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

—IN PERSON—

THE MILLS BROTHERS

OLGA SAN JUAN • TIM HERBERT

EXTRA ADDED ATTRACTION

ELLIOT LAWRENCE

AND HIS ORCHESTRA

NOW
TIMES SQUARE

PARAMOUNT

Midnight
Feature
Nightly

STAGE PLAYS

RICHARD RODGERS & OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN, 2nd, present

"SUPERB SPOOFING"—Walter Winchell

HELEN HAYES

—in—

"HAPPY BIRTHDAY"

A New Comedy by ANITA LOOS • Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN

BROADHURST Theat., 44th St. West of Broadway. Evenings 8:46, Matinees: Wednesday and Saturday 2:46.

"A SMASH HIT"—Life Magazine

ETHEL MERMAN

IN THE MUSICAL SMASH

"ANNIE GET YOUR GUN"

Music & Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN • Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
with RAY MIDDLETON • Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN

IMPERIAL Theatre 45th St. West of Broadway. Evenings at 8:30, Matinees: Wednesday and Saturday at 2:30.

STAGE PLAYS

"A smash hit of enormous proportions." —
Ward Morehouse, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEAT., 46th Street East of B'way. CH 4-4256
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wednesday & Saturday 2:46.

"RATTLING GOOD THEATRE."—Atkinson, Times

JOSE FERRER IN CYRANO de BERGERAC

FRANCES REID • RALPH CLANTON • HIRAM SHERMAN
PAULA LAURENCE • FRANCES COMPTON
ERNEST GRAVES • WILLIAM WOODSON

BARRYMORE THEAT., 47th Street West of Broadway. CI 6-0390
Eves., incl. Sun., 8:30. Mats. Sat. & Sun., 2:30

"WOWS THE HOUSE DOWN."—Newsweek.

BERT LAHR

with JEAN PARKER in

BURLESQUE

BELASCO THEAT., 44th STREET EAST OF BROADWAY
Eves. 8:40 Mats. Thurs. & Sat.

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE Nation

Money-Saving Magazine
Combinations

with Harper's Magazine $8.50
You save $2.50

with Consumers Union $9.25
You save $1.25

with Harper's Magazine and Consumers Union $11.75
You save $3.75

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses. Canadian and foreign postage extra.

THE NATION by itself:

☐ 1 Year $6 ☐ 2 Years $10 ☐ 3 Years $14

☐ Servicemen's Rate $4 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage—$1 a year extra

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed.

☐ Bill me.

NAME _____

STREET _____

CITY _____ ZONE _____ STATE _____

1-25-47

Allen. Even in marble Stephens seems frail and insubstantial. This is the Southern political leader who opposed secession but became the Vice-President of the Confederacy, who resisted the concentration of power in the hands of Jefferson Davis and was more concerned with the preservation of constitutional government in the Southern states than with the effective waging of war, who flirted with the idea of the secession of his native state from the Confederacy. On the base of his statue is carved the quotation, "I am afraid of nothing on the earth, above the earth, beneath the earth, except to do wrong," and it is more accurate than many a political epitaph; his concept of right may have been at times quixotic, but he served it with all the amazing energy and determination of his fragile body.

Stephens was a public figure for more than forty years, but it is his present biographer's attention to him "as a man, a problem in the psychology of personality, motivation, and behavior," which gives Rudolph von Abele's "Alexander H. Stephens: A Biography" (Knopf, $4) its particular appeal. Von Abele explores Stephens's prolonged periods of gloom and depression, his curious dependence upon his brother Linton, his "adoration of the twin concepts of justice and law." Stephens was elected to Congress from Georgia in his thirty-first year in 1843; his first speech was an attack upon his right to hold the seat to which he had been elected from the state at large, in violation of the act of Congress requiring election by districts. During his next sixteen years in Congress—he resigned on the eve of the Civil War—his pursuit of justice took him through all the political battles of that turbulent period; he led, for example, the Whig opposition to the war with Mexico as an illegal war of conquest.

As Vice-President of the Confederacy Stephens opposed conscription, opposed martial law, opposed the suspension of habeas corpus as attacks within the Confederacy upon the freedoms which he felt the Confederacy was fighting to preserve. It must have been with some restraint that Jefferson Davis wrote to him that he wished Stephens, instead of creating "distrust in me among the people," would devote his "great and admitted ability exclusively to upholding the confidence and animating the spirit of the people to unconquerable resistance against their foes."

After the war Stephens was imprisoned at Fort Warren in Boston harbor. He was elected to the Senate of the United States in 1866 but was not admitted to that body. In 1873 he was elected to the House of Representatives, and there he remained until 1882, "in his roller-chair, in the open space just under the Speaker's desk . . . the strangest figure in the Capitol since John Randolph." Already dying, he was elected Governor of Georgia in 1882 and clung to life until March of the next year.

Von Abele tells the story of Stephens's life and examines its significance in a highly readable volume—and one which is remarkably mature for a biographer in his twenty-third year. If, as one suspects, this is a reworking of the author's doctoral thesis, it is an example of imaginative academic research of a quality too rarely met with.

COLEMAN ROSENBERGER

Last week's review of "Lord Weary's Castle" was written by Randall Jarrell, whose name was accidentally omitted.

The Catholic Church--Its Nature and Purpose

Factually and Objectively Discussed

Without Offense to Catholic People

You Should Know--

HOW THE CATHOLIC CHURCH EXISTS IN A DEMOCRACY

WHAT THE STEPINAC CASE MEANS TO US

MUST WE CHOOSE BETWEEN ROME AND RUSSIA

CAN PROTESTANTISM SURVIVE THE POPE'S BID FOR WORLD CONTROL

For First-hand Information on These and Other Questions of Vital Importance to Every American

Read THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC MAGAZINE

Edited by Former Roman Catholic Priests

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE $3.00 A YEAR (10 issues) — Canada and Foreign $4.25

Order from CHRIST'S MISSION, 229 West 48th Street, New York 19, N. Y., Dept. TN

Name..... Address.....

City (Zone)..... and State.....

Films

JAMES
AGEE

Movies in 1946

OF THE films of 1946 that I saw—I missed a number of likely candidates—I liked most "The Best Years of Our Lives," "Brief Encounter," "Henry V," "Let There Be Light," "Open City," and "The Raider."

"The Best Years" is equivocal in story, but in front of the camera—and this is still more important—it is done about as well as a movie can imaginably be, made among the frustrating facilities of a contemporary American studio.

Much of "Brief Encounter" is very likable and affecting; it seems to me the best romance since "Mayerling." It is a shriveling commentary, though, on the reality of the run of films, that so many people have spoken of this one almost as if Noel Coward had personally invented realism—and wholly as if the realism in this film were of an adventurous or even a high order. It seems to me, instead, a particularly neat sample of how to package realism, astutely modifying everything that might make the package fit clumsily into a lady's handbag.

In making "Henry V" Laurence Olivier and his associates chose to serve Shakespeare rather than to compete with him—and served him with honor, ingenuity, and grace. The bolder attempt would even in principle have excited me more; great movie poetry, deliberately or intuitively undertaken from scratch, without benefit of hindrance of a classic, I think still better of than that. But neither preference qualifies my admiration or my love for this beautiful film as it stands; nor am I terribly disturbed because it is a patriotic film, finds a good deal of good in war, and tells sympathetically of a cynical invasion.

"Let There Be Light," John Huston's intelligent, noble, fiercely moving short film about combat neurosis and some of the more spectacular kinds of therapy, will probably never be seen by the civilian public for whose need, and on whose money, it was made. The War Department has mumbled a number of reasons why it has been withheld; the glaring obvious reason has not been mentioned: that any sane human being who saw the film would join the armed services, if at all, with a straight face and a painfully maturing mind. In a nation with half its forebrain left and a thousandth of its moral intelligence, even such a little suppression as this would cause a monstrous scandal, and an adequate fight. But in such a nation the general reaction to a good many more disastrous bits of crime and cowardice would long ago have had such effect that by now you would hardly recognize the place, and might not even need to be ashamed to be a part of it.

Of the films I have seen this year "Open City" is by all odds the best; and I beg leave—of those who don't dare admit they are ever capable of an opinion before they examine a piece of work—to doubt that "The Razor's Edge" or even "The Strange Love of Martha Ivers" is likely to be as good. "Open City" goes far in what I believe is the best general direction movies might take, now and within the discernible future. By this I don't mean they need be socially or politically hot under the collar—though much of the spirit and grandeur of this film come of that kind of heat. I do mean that the theme or story needs to be passionately felt and intimately understood, and that it should be a theme or story worthy of such knowledge and passion. I also put my deepest hope and faith in the future of movies in their being made on relatively little money, as much at least by gifted amateurs as by professionals, in actual rather than imitated places, with the binding energy, eye, conviction, and delight in work which are fostered in good-enough people by that predicament and which are at best hindered by commercial work in studios. As I saw to some extent when I reviewed the film and as an article by James T. Farrell has made much clearer to me, the film is among other things Communist propaganda. I don't enjoy this fact; but that cannot prevent my thinking "Open City" the best movie of its year and one of the best and most heartening in many years. It seems to be time, after many centuries of flagrant proof, to get used to the fact that by no means all one's enemies, or friends, for that matter, line up comfortably in the same camp, however the lines are drawn; and that no one group, however well accredited, has a monopoly on the human or the creative soul.

Like "Open City," "The Raider" put amateurs through a reenactment, mainly, of actual events. Like "Open City," it triumphantly demonstrates how well that can be done. It is less furiously felt and more honest; its theme, if less grandiose, is nevertheless a fine one. Since I think so highly of both films I should take special care to make clear that this is not because they use non-actors, or are semi-documentary, or are "realistic." It is, rather, that they show a livelier aesthetic and moral respect for reality—which "realism" can as readily smother as liberate—than most fictional films, commercial investments in professional reliability, ever manage to. If they are helped to this—as they are—by their concern for actual people and places, that is more than can be said for most documentaries, which by average are as dismally hostile to reality as most fiction films. The films I most eagerly look forward to will not be documentaries but works of pure fiction, played against, and into, and in collaboration with unrehearsed and uninvented reality.

A few notes at random.

We saw last year about the last of films made during or directly inspired by the war: it is clear that many gifted people, such as William Wyler ("The Best Years"), and Olivier, and Huston, and John Ford, grew greatly during the war. From now on we shall see what they can do with this new maturity during the next interval of peace. My best wishes, God knows, are with them; my bets are against them. Once in a while, quite certainly, a good film is sure to get made: but my bet is that the next ten years or so will be even harder for good people to work through than the last; that soon there will no longer be a place on earth where honest talent will be allowed to break loose from the asylum for more than a male nurse's afternoon off.

It is said of J. Arthur Rank, under whom three of the listed films were made, that he intends to continue shooting for big money with one hand and backing small-audience talent with the other. I hope so; and will bet that within five years—three if you like—it will be as hard to make a good film in England as in Hollywood; and that Mr. Rank will be chiefly responsible. My reason? I suggest that you consult both God and Mammon on which is the more successful in coping with the servant problem.

I have the same doubtful hope and

WHERE HENRY WALLACE WENT WRONG

by Louis Fischer

FEBRUARY ISSUE OF
THIS MONTH MAGAZINE
Newsstands or 247 Park Av. N. Y. 17

best wishes for Republic's low-budget investment in such films as Ben Hecht's "Specter of the Rose" and—in 1945—Gustav Machaty's "Jealousy." I hope the policy will be continued; I wish it would be extended. But that will be useless unless such opportunities are sought by, and given to, people who are capable of taking mature advantage of them.

This was the year during which Sergei Eisenstein once more got it in the eye. Part Two of "Ivan the Terrible" will never be released; Part Three will never even be made; Eisenstein was once more called a bourgeois and a formalist, and other words almost as dirty. Civilization has come a long way since the days when in Vienna, the High Altar of western music, Mozart and Schubert could die so young, largely for want of mere patronage. Today we appreciate our men of genius. In Russia we make corpses of them, living or genuine; here we drown them in cream.

The Hays office became the Johnston office. It remained possible, as before, to say almost anything if it was prudent, childish, or false enough in the first place and sneakily enough said in the second. It remained impossible, as before, to say anything whatever, without sneaking it, which might move or interest anyone past the moral age of five.

Quite a few Hollywood people amused themselves as best they could in their captivity by making such nostalgic and amusing, if far from original melodramas as "The Killers," "The Big Sleep," and "The Dark Corner." Such harmless little slumming parties were treated by a number of critics, reviewers, and editorial writers as if they were a sinister mirror of American morals, psychology, society, and art. Since practically every movie is, to quite some extent, I can't insist that these were happy exceptions, except in so far as they were relatively intelligent, accurate at least to something in this world, and entertaining. I realize also that on its most careful level, as practiced by Dr. Siegfried Kracauer or Barbara Deming, this sort of analysis is of interest and value, dubious as I am about a good deal of it. But to me, the most sinister single thing that happened during the movie year was the emergence of just this kind of analysis—or rather, was the way in which it was indorsed by those incapable of it. I have long postponed writing on this difficult subject and must now again postpone: but briefly, for reasons which transcend movie boundaries, I am deadly alarmed to find that the function once performed, harm-fully enough, by clubwomen and the nastier kinds of church pressure groups is now taken over, without a murmur or even a sign of divided consciousness, by the kind of people who used most earnestly to oppose priggishness.

Most lists of "the ten best" this year, including my own list of six, went very thin on Hollywood; and many reviewers commented on the fact, rather as if Hollywood had hit the nadir. It seems to me unjust to single out for sudden vilification one particular Hollywood year when every year for so long a time has been so very moderately fresh an egg.

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

COLUMBIA has issued three of Mozart's sonatas for piano and violin—the lovely K. 296 in C and K. 378 in B flat, the powerful K. 379 in G—performed by Alexander Schneider and Ralph Kirkpatrick on the violin and harpsichord (Set 650; $6.85). Mozart wrote for the piano; and the only justification for the use of the harpsichord is that his piano—as I once had an opportunity to hear in Salzburg—had a more delicate and otherwise different sound from ours. This justification is destroyed by the pounding that Kirkpatrick does much of the time; but whereas the pounding and clatter were unrelieved at the one concert of Schneider and Kirkpatrick that I heard a few years ago, and drove me out of the hall before the end, these recorded performances have passages in which Kirkpatrick plays with beautifully sensitive phraseological inflection—a particularly fine example being the penultimate variation in the finale of K. 379. In these passages his playing increases the pleasure I get from the superb playing of Schneider; in the others it is a disturbance which makes me long for the performances I can imagine Schneider giving with Franz Rupp. The recorded sound of the violin comes out of a wide-range machine brash and coarse, but improves with limitation of range; the sound of the harpsichord is dull—whether because of the instrument or because of the recording I do not know.

In another set (643; $4.85) Pinza sings several Mozart arias with the Metropolitan Opera orchestra under Walter. I have reservations about Pinza's operatic performances, but fewest

Because

"In his book we have Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson brought up to date in terms of education, soil erosion, freight rates, the Tennessee Valley, and true democracy."

—HENRY A. WALLACE

People are buying

The Shore Dimly Seen

By ELLIS G.
ARNALL

● "You read this book not only with a sense of the excitement of the battles he has fought but with a sense of the exciting days ahead."

—Lewis Gannett

● "Ellis Arnall has written a book not merely about the South for Southerners but about America for Americans. If Claghorn can read, he won't read it. But its reading is imperative for the rest of us."

—Jonathan Daniels

● "The book is marked by the kind of drive and inspiration which Government Arnall always exhibits in action . . . Inspiration and vision are found on every page."

—Thurman Arnold

3rd BIG PRINTING

At all Bookstores • $5.00

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY
Philadelphia New York

about his Figaro; and the sharpness of his Se vuol ballare, the bitter humor of his Aprite un po' quegli occhi—as against the smoothness, the pathos of Domgraf-Fassbender in the Glyndebourne performance—seem effective and excellent to me. His sustained singing of In diesen heiligen Hallen from "The Magic Flute," his animated delivery of Osmin's aria from "The Seraglio," (both in Italian), his performance of a—for me—rather uninteresting concert aria by Mozart, Mentre ti lascio, o figlia—these too I find good. The one performance which definitely does not come off, in spite of all the vocal hamming he puts into it, is the Catalogue Aria from "Don Giovanni." The records reproduce his singing with clarity and power that are lacking in the sound of the orchestra.

The Budapest Quartet's performance of Haydn's Quartet Opus 74 No. 3 (Set X-274; $2.85) sounds as though it was recorded last year, when the group betrayed fatigue and boredom from the excessive amount of playing it had been doing. It is polished in execution and style, but without the subtle and exciting animation in the ensemble inflection of the performance of Haydn's Opus 54 No. 1 by the Roisman-Schneider-Ipolyi-Schneider group in the HMV-Victor set. And its recorded sound has none of the warmth and luster of the Victor performance.

Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5 is not one of the works of his that sound as though they had been turned out by his technical apparatus while his mind was occupied with other things. It is a real and solid piece of music, with sustained and involved construction which required hard thinking from the composer and requires it from the listener. And it is a pleasure to know that Prokofiev is still able to produce such a work, and that it can be produced in Russia and succeed there. Knowing the work only from a couple of performances, and having no score, I can't tell whether Rodzinski's performance with the New York Philharmonic (Set 661; $5.85) is as good as it seems; but I can say that its recorded sound is cold and gray and a little harsh.

Even less well recorded—with drabber and murkier sound—is Ormandy's performance of Brahms's Third Symphony with the Philadelphia Orchestra (Set 642; $4.85). The performance is surprisingly straightforward for Ormandy, and quite acceptable—though hardly necessary with Weingartner's in the Columbia catalogue. And though Walter's performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony with the Philadelphia Orchestra (Set 631; $5.85) is very good and its recorded sound is clear and bright, I can't imagine anyone preferring it to Toscanini's marvelous performance and the additional warmth and luster of its recorded sound. That warmth and luster is lacking also in the recorded sound of Reiner's good performance of Mussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain" (presumably as edited by Rimsky-Korsakov) with the Pittsburgh Symphony (12460-4; $1).

Casadesu's smooth and characterless performances of Book 2 of Debussy's Preludes (Set 644; $5.25) do not give me any illusion of hearing more in the pieces than the playing around with mere stylistic formulas and mannerisms and piano sonorities that I have always heard. And poor recording—which deprives the piano sound of all its rich resonance and makes it weak in the upper range—robs the pieces of even their exquisite effects of piano sonority.

This poor recording aggravates the sound of Oscar Levant's insensitive treatment of instrument and music in a performance of Beethoven's Sonata Opus 27 No. 2 (known as the "Moonlight") (Set X-273; $2.85).

A surprisingly large number of the records have noisy, gritty, sputtering surfaces; and there are a number of sides with wavering pitch.

Drama Note

THE BIG TWO" (Booth Theater) is another instalment of the lengthening saga of the female war correspondent. A good many more plays, novels, and movies will have to be written before the full story is known, but it is already evident that neither the war nor the peace could have been won without her intelligence, her courage, and her sex appeal. Take, for example, the case of the better understanding—which you may or may not have noticed—between Russia and the United States. "The Big Two" reveals for the first time that it really began at a Bavarian hotel where a female correspondent engaged on an important but purely unofficial enterprise of her own fell for a handsome Russian officer. You would be surprised to know how human these Bolsheviks can become in the dark, and if it were not for this play you would probably never know that when the lights went up again the whole future of Anglo-Russian relations looked brighter. These things, it appears, are best settled, not around the conference table, but between the sheets. Claire Trevor is attractive as our heroine, and several competent actors do the best they can.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Dance

ONLY in performance is theater art sharpened to life or dulled to death—through the qualities of the interpreter. This is even more true of the dance than of drama and music, which can be partially realized in reading, or of sets and costumes, which to some extent convey meaning even as sketches or designs. But the dance, existing in performance only, depends almost entirely on quality of performance for communicating its effect.

In José Limón's recent Broadway debut at the Belasco Theater a quality of performance was maintained which once again demonstrated that the virtues of a "school" of theater art derive not from theories exemplified but from forms achieved in performance. Mr. Limón is easily the outstanding male dancer of that Sunday-night school of the dance commonly known as "modern." In "Lament for Ignacio Sanchez Mejias," after the García Lorca poem, Limón, dancing with a lyricism and strength rarely seen on Broadway, revealed the full beauty of the choreography created by Doris Humphrey. He has a compact yet free-flowing style in which every movement tells; it was perfect for the stylized Spanish material. The excellence of his interpretation was matched by Letitia Ide's fine performance as the Figure of Destiny. Together they wove a wonderfully compelling dance of doom to the reiterated "at five in the afternoon." The one jarring note was Meg Mundy's performance as Figure of a Woman.

Unfortunately the final curtain of the evening did not fall on "Lament" but on a long something called "The Story of Mankind," a dull, self-conscious attempt at social comment, irony, and so on, on which no self-respecting curtain should ever have risen.

The entire program will be repeated on February 22 at the Needle Trades High School on West Twenty-fourth Street and on February 23 at the Ninety-second Street Y. M. H. A. Because Limón is an exceptionally talented dancer and because "Lament" is a profoundly moving dance, these are performances not to be missed.

VIRGINIA MISHNUN

Letters to the Editors

Insult to Isherwood?

Dear Sirs: I must confess that I find Diana Trilling's remarks on Christopher Isherwood's novel "The Memorial" very puzzling. Are we to assume that she considers the date when a book was written an important factor in judging its literary merit? A number of English critics of the highest standing have at one time or another expressed the opinion that "The Memorial" was Isherwood's finest work of fiction. Accordingly, it seemed worth while to bring out an edition of it in America. I feel that Mrs. Trilling has been singularly insulting to a writer generally acknowledged to be a serious and important artist in denying the favor of her unquestioned critical gifts simply because the book was not written in the past years. Its theme is timeless, and literally dozens of experts—writers and critics—have commented on the brilliance of its execution.

JAMES LAUGHLIN,
New Directions Press

New York, January 2

No—Ethical Protest

Dear Sirs: Mr. Laughlin forces me to expand a comment which I preferred to keep brief. I think it was perfectly clear that the few sentences I wrote about "The Memorial" were not intended as a review of that book or as criticism of Mr. Laughlin for reissuing it. I think it was equally clear that they were intended as censure of Mr. Laughlin for bringing out an old book as if it were a new one. By omitting all mention, in the book itself, on its dust jacket, or in its extensive advertising, of the fact that "The Memorial" is an early work of Mr. Isherwood, originally published in England in 1932 but hitherto unknown in this country, surely the New Directions Press has been willing to let readers infer that here was a new novel by the author of the recent successful "Prater Violet"—a mistake which has been made very generally. I consider this bad publishing practice, even bad publishing ethics; and I am especially disturbed that a press which was founded in protest against ordinary commercial methods should be guilty of it.

Obviously, all this has nothing to do with the quality of Mr. Isherwood's novel. Or perhaps it has only this much bearing—that it might be useful for readers to know how to place "The Memorial" in the line of its author's development. When time permits, I hope to consider Mr. Isherwood's early novel as a literary work, quite without reference to the questionable circumstances of its republication.

DIANA TRILLING

New York, January 14

Everybody's Battle

Dear Sirs: When I hear the comment that the unions are cutting their own throats by making new demands in the face of public hostility after the Lewis fiasco, I note that the wish is frequently father to the thought. And I must admit that if, indeed, the unions could be exterminated the labor problem would be solved much as Hitlerism would have solved the Jewish problem by exterminating all Jews. But inasmuch as organized labor will not collapse and die until wage-earning America decides upon suicide, we may logically expect the unions to fight. In fact, a great number of non-union Americans have refused to be taken in by the anti-labor hullabaloo and have set out to get the whole truth. For just as the problem of Jewish survival turned out to be a problem of human survival in general, so the mounting attack on labor unions is today even more clearly an attack on the living standards of the average man and upon democratic rights in general. It is an ominous prelude to what is being prepared by American Action and similar outfits, and points up the need for an economic and political bulwark of democratic unity all along the line.

J. KNOWLES ROBBINS

St. Louis, December 23

Two Kinds of Realism

Dear Sirs: In the review of Sumner Welles's new book, by Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr. (Nation, November 16), I note with interest Mr. Schlesinger's statement that "his [Welles's] realism requires him to add that non-democratic countries have inherent tendencies toward instability which lead them to violate international agreements." From the context of the statement it is plain that prominent among the "non-democratic" countries referred to is the U. S. S. R. Since Mr. Schlesinger is a reliable reporter, I assume that the statement is a correct representation of Mr. Welles's views, and since Mr. Schlesinger describes it as realistic I assume that he concurs in it.

I am afraid that the Welles-Schlesinger "realism," like so many others, is not quite an accurate representation of reality. It is not my intention, needless to say, to defend the foreign policy of such non-democratic states as Japan, Germany, and Italy. But I think that the probity of the U. S. S. R. in the conduct of its foreign affairs since the First World War has been equal, at least, to that of such indubitably democratic states as England and France. There are, to be sure, some large black marks against the Kremlin, but on three of the most significant issues which confronted the world in the period before the recent war—Ethiopia, Spain, Czechoslovakia—the Soviets were right and Britain and France were wrong, legally as well as morally.

And what of events since the recent war? Score one against the Soviets for remaining in Iran beyond the date permitted by their treaty. But chalk one up, too, against Britain, for treating as a Crown colony the Holy Land, in which its only rightful title is as a mandatory power under the League. I am afraid that not even a Philadelphia lawyer could prove that the British have lived up to the terms of the mandate.

I have attempted to keep close to the subject—the relative records of the Soviet Union and the democracies in honoring international agreements. But the discussion would be far more revealing if we were to inquire into the tendencies—toward stability or instability—which bring about the remarkable spectacle of genuinely democratic governments laboring earnestly to stamp out the elements of democracy everywhere except within their own borders. The word "realism" has, I believe, been used in describing this policy, too.

B. R. SCHUTZ

Peekskill, N. Y. December 2

Aid for Chinese Writers

Dear Sirs: Chinese writers today have neither money nor markets. Many publishing houses have been forced out of business by the disastrous inflation, the paper shortage, the loss of printing machinery, and the lack of communications. More than two hundred newspapers and

Crossword Puzzle No. 196

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 It is lamentably bad art
- 5 They date from the days when floors were cold and dirty
- 10 Hogarth's marriage (1, 2, 4)
- 11 North African country from which we get A-1 lager
- 12 Choice
- 13 The colonel has a covenant to work with us
- 14 Sorry, I seem to have upset the cruet
- 16 Ammunition for a winter campaign
- 19 Song for a mad girl or a grim lad
- 22 "An elegant sufficiency, content, Retirement, ----- quiet, friendship, books, Ease and alternate labor, useful life, Progressive virtue, and approving Heaven!"
- 24 Around 51 it's clear one gets forgetful
- 26 Upper part of the hip-bone
- 28 Tea, Tess? (anag.)
- 29 Not a riot car, but a riot finishes it
- 30 In the sere and yellow leaf phase for some time, apparently
- 31 For the boy, or the buoy

DOWN

- 1 Rats! (4 and 4)
- 2 Surly animals when their heads are sore
- 3 Automobile with seats outside (3-6)
- 4 Sheep's coats—not their cotes

- 6 European capital which gives you "the shivers"
- 7 Not uniform, and usually doesn't wear one
- 8 Replacements for a press
- 9 A hunting cry
- 15 Quack
- 17 Breastwork much used in street fighting in Parisian insurrections
- 18 What Clem is at may be climbing the wall
- 20 Reformed rogues, these birds
- 21 "Better late than never" doesn't seem such a hot motto when you miss this (4 and 3)
- 23 They stir up burning matters
- 25 A matter of life or death, but mostly life
- 27 A flowery language, from the look of it

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 195

ACROSS:—1 PEREGRINATION; 10 RED-DOUBT; 11 WOLFRAM; 12 EARLIER; 13 EYEWEAR; 14 WEEKEND; 15 RESTFUL; 16 COPPERS; 20 GRANADA; 23 TOECAPS; 24 LOCKNUT; 25 MEASURE; 26 ANDIRON; 27 SEVENTH HEAVEN.

DOWN:—2 ENDOUSE; 3 ELUSIVE; 4 RETIRED; 5 NEW YEAR; 6 TELLERS; 7 OURSELF; 8 GREENWICH TIME; 9 UMBRELLA STAND; 17 PRELATE; 18 ERASURE; 19 SUSPECT; 20 GOLIATH; 21 ARCADIA; 22 AINTREE.

magazines have been closed down by the government in its rigid program of "thought control." The result is that the economic position of most writers has been worse rather than better since the end of the war.

With very little or no money to be earned by literary work, many have become clerks, bookkeepers, or teachers, but prices have risen so steeply that their wages are not enough to support their families. Others are too ill for any sort of work. Tuberculosis and other diseases caused by overcrowding and undernourishment are spreading among them. A whole generation of Chinese writers may be sacrificed.

There is an organization through which many of them can be helped. The Chinese Writers' Association, founded in 1938, became famous during the war for its work with the armies and behind the front. The association has never made an appeal for help from abroad, its members being too proud to ask for such assistance, but we learn that it is excellently equipped to distribute any funds contributed by American writers. The undersigned members of the P. E. N. Club, who are deeply concerned about their Chinese friends and colleagues, are therefore making this appeal on their own responsibility.

We are entreating you to send a check marked in the corner "For China" to the P. E. N. International Relief Fund, 123 East Ninety-fourth Street, New York 28. Such contributions are income-tax deductible, and they will be distributed without administrative expenses either here or in China. They will be used to make direct grants to the neediest writers for food, medicine, clothing, and shelter.

CARL CARMER, EDGAR SNOW, MALCOLM COWLEY, JOHN P. MARQUAND, AGNES SMEDLEY, THEODORE WHITE, JOHN HERSEY, ANNALEE JACOBY
New York, December 27

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING RATES

74c a line (six words)

Classified Display $7.39 per Inch

Attractive discounts for multiple insertions.

THE NATION

20 Vesey St., N. Y. 7, N. Y.

Barclay 7-1066

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 164

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 1, 1947

NUMBER 5

The Shape of Things

THE VEHEMENCE WITH WHICH PRAVDA SET about Ernest Bevin for his alleged desire to repudiate the Anglo-Soviet treaty of 1942 led some observers to believe that the Kremlin itself was seeking an excuse to denounce that pact. However, Mr. Bevin, by protesting directly to Stalin against the flagrant misinterpretation of a statement obviously intended to squelch rumors of an Anglo-American alliance, has drawn a reply which suggests that the Russian government's real purpose is to secure a revision of the treaty. This is a perfectly understandable and reasonable objective, since the treaty, signed when the defeat of Hitler was still a very distant hope, has become outmoded in some respects. For instance, Article 3 declared that Britain and the Soviet Union would join with other "like-minded" nations in examining "proposals for common action" and that "pending the adoption of such proposals" they would cooperate to prevent a renewal of German aggression. Article 4 provided that this undertaking might be superseded if such proposals were adopted. It might, therefore, be possible to argue that with the organization of the United Nations the most vital clauses of the Anglo-Soviet treaty have lapsed. The British government, however, has never indicated that it considered the treaty a dead letter; on the contrary, it has several times expressed a desire to extend its life. Thus a revision of the pact so that it will provide, like the Franco-Soviet alliance, for mutual assistance within the framework of the United Nations should not prove difficult to negotiate. But if this is all the Russians want, one wonders why they use such indirect methods to attain it.

✱

LEON BLUM MAY HAVE BEEN A LEADER OF a caretaker government, but he was by no means a mere political janitor, as the rapid and on the whole satisfactory solution of the French Cabinet crisis has shown. Largely as the result of the veteran Socialist's boldness, M. Ramadier has been able to form a government that not only represents fairly well the state of French opinion but has some chance of holding together during the difficult period ahead. There are some anomalies, it is true, and they draw attention to the narrow limits within which the government must work. The Socialist Party's nine seats are the just reward of initiative, but in giving the weak Left Republican Rally equality with the powerful Communist Party and the M. R. P. the new French Premier has performed a brilliant but precarious feat of jugglery. So long as the issues are not critical, the Left Republicans may be counted upon to balance the two major parties within the Cabinet, but they do not represent a strong enough section of the nation to uphold a Socialist Premier in graver disputes. The facts suggest that France's first "real" post-war government is itself something of a caretaker regime, reflecting the desire to postpone sharp dispute about the future of French society. The principal economic ministries are held by the Socialists, which means that M. Blum's mild deflationary policies will be strengthened. The question which disturbs middle of the road Frenchmen is how soon the working class, now in revolutionary mood, will show that impatience with present living standards which is already causing anxiety in Britain. Socialization, which might satisfy the communist-controlled C. G. T., will probably advance slowly, since the M. R. P. suffers from heart trouble when this sort of exercise is taken and has been recently cautioned by the Vatican physician. It would seem that in economic matters the Ramadier government can only hope to stave off radical discord until the international scene is clearer.

✱

THE MAKE-UP OF THE RAMADIER CABINET probably rules out a vigorous foreign policy. In demanding the Ministry of National Defense the Communists may have hoped to purge the army's active list of the reactionary officers who have found refuge within the occupation forces in Germany. More likely their intention was to challenge De Gaulle's public charge that they are unfit for such office. Whatever was the case, it was M. Bidault's nomination to Foreign Affairs which induced the party to compromise by accepting the chairmanship of the defense group of ministries. M. Bidault's vigorous dissent from British views on the Ruhr undoubtedly suggested to the Communists that he would support their opposition to the proposed Anglo-French treaty. Actually, the differences between the British and the M. R. P. may not prove irreducible. Yet for the time

Forger, Gamet, Coll.

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	113
Crisis in Britain	115
Braden or Messersmith? by Robert Bendiner	116

ARTICLES

Pay Day in Georgia by Lillian Smith	118
Berlin and the Russian Zone by Joel Carmichael	120
"Time Is Money" by A. G. Mezerik	121
After UNRRA, What? by Thomas J. Hamilton	123
India's New Destiny by Shiva Rao	125
The Cushing Health Plan by Martin Gumpert	127
In One Ear by Lou Frankel	128
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	129

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Next Depression by Robert S. Lynd	130
Ten Great Poems by Arthur Mizener	131
Satire and Ring Lardner by Irving Howe	131
The Dark Side of the South by Carey McWilliams	132
Reports from Everywhere by Harvey Bresler	133
Films by James Agee	134
Art by Clement Greenberg	136
Records by B. H. Haggin	139
Drama Note by J. W. K.	140

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 197

by Jack Barrett	140
------------------------	-----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchway

Managing Editor	Literary Editor
J. King Gordon	Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart
Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 29 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 818 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

being it is logical to conclude that the French government will not listen to Mr. Attlee's renewed plea for the treaty. This is not to say that M. Ramadier will thereby involve himself in a serious internal crisis. As The Nation pointed out last week, closer economic ties between France and Britain would do much to better European conditions. But there is an element in French thought almost as important as the fear of Germany, which the American press has rather neglected. The French people are not eager to become embroiled in the ominous dispute between the Soviet Union and the United States. There have been signs of an improvement in relations between the world's two most powerful states. However, one or two swallows do not make a summer, so that until British foreign policy markedly differs from American a majority of non-Communist Frenchmen may decide that to take a rain check on the Anglo-French treaty will be to show good weather sense.

★

THERE ARE SOME SERIOUS WEAKNESSES IN James Bryant Conant's suggestion that young men thirsty for education be assuaged with a federally financed, locally administered, two-year college program. But by and large it is a step, or at least a half-step, toward providing a broader base of educated citizens in this huge provincial nation. "One of the consequences of the present influx of veterans into our colleges and universities," said Harvard's president in his annual report last Friday, "will be a demand for the younger brothers and relatives to have similar opportunities." Dr. Conant notes that existing college facilities are already strained to the limit, both physically and financially. He proposes, therefore, as a way of meeting the demand, the two-year "college education." Facing up to the fact that "more and more thoughtful citizens are coming to recognize that in some way federal resources must be made available to assist certain states," Dr. Conant recommends passage of the Hill-Thomas-Taft bill, which would provide federal aid for public education "without federal control of education." Some of the funds thus made available, Dr. Conant believes, might well be drawn on to support the two-year colleges. The plan is a commendable one, though it still does not offer the poor equal educational opportunities with the well-to-do. A greater drawback might become apparent when the "local control" tacitly advocated by Dr. Conant was exercised, let us say, in Biloxi, Mississippi.

★

FLOWERY ORATORY AND SHEEP ROASTED whole are the essential ingredients of a real Arab feast. When Thomas J. Watson, president of International Business Machines, entertained Emir Saud, heir to the throne and oil royalties of Saudi Arabia, at the Union Club, he couldn't provide the second, but he did very well with the first by calling in Dr. Ralph C. Hutchison, president of Lafayette College, as chief speaker. Dr. Hutchison, an ordained Presbyterian minister who once taught in a Persian missionary college, has evidently more than a nodding acquaintance with the uses of Eastern hyperbole. Addressing the guest of honor he said: "You have denied yourselves as a people many of the enticing allures of materialistic civilization rather than lose the overpowering consciousness of the presence of God in every hour of the day, in every walk of life. You have a great value for the world." Sensing that his audience might take this last remark too literally, the Doctor hastened to add that America's concern with Arabian oil is to insure that the Arabs will profit by it primarily and to keep it out of hands that might use it for aggressive purposes. We have often read how a good Arab host demonstrates the warmth of his hospitality by picking out the eye of the roast sheep and popping it into the mouth of the honored guest. Dr. Hutchison, it seems to us, managed to Americanize this custom nicely.

Crisis in Britain

BRITAIN'S economic crisis, the government's new White Paper shows, has a number of different facets. Despite the considerable measure of success attained by the export drive, the foreign-trade position remains heavily unbalanced, and it has not been possible to import urgently needed machinery and consumers' goods. The gap between production and spendable income continues to exert a strong inflationary pressure. The acute shortage of coal handicaps the export drive and the housing campaign, throws men out of work at a time when output is desperately needed, and intensifies the pervasive and discouraging "austerity" of living conditions.

To correct these conditions and overcome the crisis both more man-power and greater production per head are required. The possibilities of increased recruitment into industry, however, are limited. Reduction of Britain's foreign commitments, as Aylmer Vallance pointed out recently, would be of assistance, but the release of service men will hardly counter-balance the workers withdrawn from industry by the forthcoming raising of the school-leaving age. Sir Stafford Cripps has appealed to housewives, who helped out so nobly in the war, to return to the factories, but they have little incentive to respond while goods remain as scarce as they are. Another partial solution would be immigration, and there are signs that the reluctance of the trade unions to consent to this step is being overcome by the gravity of the situation. The ill wind sweeping Britain may therefore eventually blow some good to forlorn occupants of the D. P. camps.

Union opposition to the employment of foreign labor, as well as to other measures for raising output, has been conditioned by the fear of unemployment which for so long has been dominant in the minds of British workers. They do not find it easy to adjust their thinking to the perspectives of full employment or to abandon restrictive practices and opposition to labor-saving machinery. But whatever justification such defensive measures may have had in the past, they are totally inapplicable at a time when it is man-power, not employment, which needs to be stretched to the uttermost.

Since the whole philosophy of the British labor movement precludes resort to those coercive steps which the Soviet government has taken in similar circumstances, Prime Minister Attlee and his colleagues must find a solution in cooperation with the trade unions. In particular, they have sought agreement on a wage freeze. Apart from those industries which are seriously undermanned, they have proposed that wage increases should be granted only when they are definitely linked to increased output. The trade-union leaders have not given unqualified assent to this proposal, but they seem prepared to use their influence to discourage indiscriminate demands for higher wages. They know that until production is raised there can be no increase in real wages however much may be added to money wages. As the recent White Paper pointed out, expendable income in Britain is $28 million while the total of consumable goods and services available amounts to $24 billion; until a balance is established, larger incomes only mean more inflationary pressure.

It is not, however, easy to bring this point home to the individual worker, for whom the first criterion of well-being is the size of his pay envelope. And it is equally hard to persuade him to stay on the job and speed up his work even though bonuses are offered for increased output. For a combination of high taxes and shortage of goods reduces the attractions of such incentives. The only way left for the worker to improve his well-being is to exchange income for leisure, and this has multiplied absenteeism.

In order to overcome such obstacles to greater production, it will be necessary for the British government to

A Plan for Germany

During the coming weeks, with the Moscow Conference of Foreign Ministers called for March 10, the attention of the world will be focused on Germany. Fritz Sternberg, author of "The Coming Crisis," reviewed in this issue of The Nation by Robert S. Lynd, has prepared an analysis of the current economic situation in Germany, related it to the problem of Western Europe's rehabilitation, and outlined proposals which might be considered a Memorandum for Moscow. The article will appear in next week's Nation.

enlist the enthusiasm of the workers so that they will fight the economic battle of Britain with the same spirited determination they showed when Hitler was the enemy. To do this, it seems to us, the grim facts set forth in the White Paper need to be dramatized in ways that will bring them home to the men in the pits and factories. Workers need to be shown just how their victory on the export front will lead directly to better meals in better houses. And they should be reminded of the eagerness with which reactionaries at home and abroad exploit every economic difficulty as a "failure of socialism." It may be obvious enough to unbiased observers that Britain's man-power crisis would be no less acute had a Tory government won power in 1945. But it is Labor which has responsibility for overcoming that crisis, and, unless it succeeds, the cause of democratic socialism both in Britain and throughout the world will suffer a disastrous reverse.

Braden or Messersmith?

BY ROBERT BENDINER

Washington, January 27

RESTING on Secretary of State Marshall's desk is the resignation of Spruille Braden, a document long and fondly dreamed of by Argentine President Juan Domingo Perón. The Assistant Secretary's offer to retire is not the routine courtesy normally extended to an incoming superior in the expectation that it will be rejected with a pretty tribute. It is a demand for a showdown by a blunt and harried man. What Marshall does with this piece of paper will fix the pattern of international relations in this hemisphere for a long time to come. It may also decide whether the low living standards of a peasant-populated continent will go up a few notches or sink to a new low under the weight of a billion-dollar arms program. And finally it will determine the immediate future, if that is important, of Ambassador George S. Messersmith, whose strange concept of diplomacy has led him to represent the Perón point of view in Washington rather more ardently than his own government's point of view in Buenos Aires.

The difference between Messersmith's position and Braden's is essentially the difference between the shadow and the substance. Messersmith, like Vandenberg and Sumner Welles—and like scores of South American politicians—makes a fetish of "hemispheric unity," and the hollower the reality becomes, the more vocal the protestations. The main thing is the façade. "If I promise to give you a dollar and fail to do so," Brazil's cynical Foreign Minister Joao Neves de Fontoura explained to an American reporter in defense of Perón, "that is a violation of an agreement, but it does not mean I constitute a danger to your security . . . it still was better to sign such agreements [referring to Chapultepec] because it helps to create an impression of Pan-American solidarity."

Braden sees no sense in this game of let's pretend. He insists that the Act of Chapultepec and the United Nations Charter bound Argentina to a course of action that would safeguard "the essential rights of man"; that the Argentines specifically agreed, moreover, to purge their country of Nazi influence; and that until they show convincing evidence of honoring past pledges it is foolish to exchange a new one with them—and downright fantastic to arm them on the strength of it. Far from displaying the required evidence, the Perón regime has brought Argentina close to being a corporative state. It has smashed the country's highest courts by wholesale impeachment, harried its press into craven subservience, and driven its finest teachers into exile. It has invited the quisling dregs of Europe to come in as settlers and paved the way for a one-party political system. It has threatened all the smaller countries around it with the direst economic consequences if they fail to enter the Argentine orbit, and it has been fostering throughout the Americas a campaign of virulent hate and distrust for the yanqui.

In the face of this record, the Welles-Vandenberg school of anti-Bradenites argues that by refusing to sit in on a conference that includes an unrepentant Argentina, we are presuming to dictate to the rest of the hemisphere. "This is a multilateral decision," says Senator Vandenberg, "which should always be made by all of us jointly, and not forced or dictated by us alone." And Welles, echoing the sentiment, writes that it "is surely not a question which should be determined by any unilateral decision of the United States."

This is a strange doctrine to come from the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Both Vandenberg and Welles know that a mutual-defense treaty, resting on arms distributed by the United States, is the chief item on the agenda of the proposed conference—in fact, its sole purpose. Nothing could be farther from their thoughts, moreover, than to have the conference called only to let it break up over the main order of business, a course that would rip open the façade of unity more violently than the failure to meet. What they urge, therefore, is in effect a double-barreled contention: that it is not for this country to determine for itself, and in advance, with what states it will enter into a mutual-defense agreement, and that such an agreement has nothing to do with trust or lack of trust between the signatories.

The view that Braden is pressing on Marshall is the reverse on both counts. First, he says, no defense treaty that includes Argentina is possible without a change in that country's political direction. After all, where is the "defense" in arming a regime that palpably despises you? And, second, even with a complete about-face in Buenos Aires, a hemispheric arms program is not what is called for. Only the Argentines really want arms. They find themselves for the first time a creditor nation, they have expansionist dreams, and they are ready to pay in hard cash. But a big military machine for Argentina calls for corresponding moves in the other countries of Latin America, which will certainly not care to be placed at a disadvantage to the most truculent power on the continent. It is certain, however, that a skinflint Congress is not going to distribute a billion dollars' worth of weapons gratis, and these countries can't pay for them without seriously depressing standards of living that are already among the lowest in the world.

A program of this sort can therefore serve only the interests of the military and authoritarian top layer in Latin America—and perhaps, by the popular reaction it produces, the Communists, whose growing strength, ironically, is one of the chief motivations in the Vandenberg - Messersmith approach. Yet even in top circles, outside Argentina, the prospect of a big arms program is cause for alarm. A leading diplomat told me that while President Truman's plan for standardizing the weapons of the continent was well received, there was fear in every Latin American republic that the end result might be an armed race that would intensify rivalries and drain the continent.

Braden's offer to resign confronts Marshall with three choices: he can dismiss Braden and keep Messersmith; fire both and start from scratch; or keep Braden and call for Messersmith's resignation.

Few believe that he will take the first course. In the past few weeks the dogged Braden has been gaining ground. Former Secretary Byrnes, who concerned himself very little with hemispheric policy during most of his tenure, talked with Braden for an hour and a half on December 6, and ever since he has backed him consistently against the maneuvers of Messersmith. Byrnes's opinion will unquestionably carry great weight with his successor. Under Secretary Acheson has always been an enthusiastic supporter of the Braden view, and Marshall, having coaxed him into staying on when he wanted earnestly to retire, is not likely to ignore his advice.

Finally, Marshall can hardly help being affected by the gross impropriety of Messersmith's anti-Braden campaign, which has created the sourest kind of impression throughout Washington. Messersmith appears to have lost all perspective. From Buenos Aires he has flooded Washington with bitter attacks on his superior. One publisher is reliably reported to have received a 30,000-word blast, and even Braden's subordinates have been included in the endless flow of bitter correspondence. He has come to speak of Perón as a "true democrat," established himself as an idol in the controlled Argentine press, and scandalously allowed the Argentine Foreign Minister, without challenge, to pit him against Byrnes in a public statement. So erratic has his behavior been that even his supporters are admittedly shocked. According to the Alsop brothers, Vandenberg, in spite of sharing the Ambassador's views, deliberately avoids meeting him.

The second choice open to Marshall, to let both protagonists go, is unfortunately all too probable as a makeshift solution. It is believed in some quarters that this course would ease the Secretary's relations with the Senate, where Braden has never been popular. A majority of the Foreign Relations Committee is probably against him, including the ranking minority member, Tom Connally, who bears him a grudge of long standing. But this choice would obviously solve nothing. Marshall would still have to decide between two conflicting policies.

To keep Braden at all, the Secretary will have to make the third choice and remove Messersmith, at least from Buenos Aires. On the basis of the Byrnes-Acheson opinion, and of President Truman's apparent inclinations, this hopeful course might well be taken if Braden's position revolved solely about the question of Perón. His objections to the arms program, however, may be too much for Marshall, who as Chief of Staff favored the hemispheric-defense treaty when it first came up for discussion. Circumstances have changed since then, however, and so, perhaps, has General Marshall. He saw clearly enough the evil effects of militarism in China, and had the integrity to denounce it. He may be statesman enough now to apply his findings to the Western Hemisphere. If he is, he will want to substitute for a dangerous and hollow military pact the kind of unity that Braden proposes—the unity that grows inevitably out of a commonly beneficial economic program and has never yet been known to grow out of the common use of identical rifle bores.

Caricature by Seligson

Spruille Braden

Pay Day in Georgia

BY LILLIAN SMITH

Clayton, Georgia, January 25

GEORGIA signed a bargain years ago with ignorance and fear and the "poor white," and today we are paying off. Herman Talmadge and the Crackers have moved into our Capitol. Ellis Arnall, and with him the liberals, the intelligentsia, the church women, and most of the urban rich, has moved out. Tear bombs, hoodlums, hate, tobacco-spitting, bad grammar, and obscene race jokes are chumming cozily together now under the old Georgia dome.

You cannot spot a Cracker by his bank account or lack of it, for some of the old "poor whites" are now Georgia's "rich whites" and some of the old "rich whites" are poor once again. He is more surely found by his possession of one or all of these qualities—ignorance, hatred of Negroes, envy of the "gentleman," and restlessness. The Crackers are the whites of the state who feel inferior. I have sometimes wondered whether their hatred of Negroes is as strong as their envy of people who are at home with the social amenities. They talk about "the niggers," but they also talk about "those city snobs who think they know so much." There is a profound sense of social inferiority among these people. They feel bitterly neglected and unesteemed as human beings. The Marxists do not take into account sufficiently the myth of the gentleman in the South, a myth that has created among uneducated—not necessarily unschooled—and socially unaccepted whites as deep a sense of inferiority as has poverty.

Herman Talmadge has jeopardized law and order in Georgia by a coup d'état so violent, so brazen, that it has shocked the entire state. By his arrogant jeers at the courts he has forced the issue of constitutional government into the front of Georgia politics, where it rightly belongs. He has unintentionally made of this issue of legislature versus the people a platform on which liberals, crack members, and even some of our biggest economic bourbons can stand and feel proud to be seen there. That was bad strategy for Herman; it was an earthquake for Georgia nerves; and it was a secret relief to the liberals, for now they can take a position openly for something good and decent. But it would be superficial to consider this issue as the basic one in Georgia today. There is a basic issue on which the people of Georgia are divided as they have not been for seventy-five years, but it has not been articulated by either of the two clashing groups. It is so deep-seated, it has become such a Frankenstein, that neither the liberals nor the Crackers want to confess to it. Yet it is the emotional force beneath the liberals' conviction of the need for change and for upholding constitutional government and the Crackers' desire for power, which are the two issues one hears talked about now along with the argument over who is governor.

The Cracker party is not for change. It wants to hold things just as they are, or were four years ago, because it believes that only in this way can it get back its power. It is being financed by the economic interests, rural and urban, that do not want change in Georgia, for other reasons. You would have found behind Gene Talmadge some of Georgia's biggest textile-mill owners, and bankers, and farmers, and soft-drink millionaires; you would have found men behind him who support Georgia Methodism and who with their fathers endowed our largest church schools—though Methodist women, not quite so wealthy, are for Arnall. Many of these same people are for Herman because they do not want change. They want to exploit the hatred of Negroes, the ignorance, and the social inferiority of rural people to their own ends. But some of these powerful interests have switched over, alarmed by Herman's disregard of law and order.

As for Thompson, in his eager desire to be governor he scampered so fast over to the white-primary side—saying in effect, "If you'll just let me be governor I'll be as black in my 'whiteness' as ever Herman could be"—that he left his liberal supporters swinging dizzily in mid-air. At the same time he did not convince rural people of his sincerity. I have heard their laughter.

Those who sincerely want orderly and lawful change, however they may differ as to tempo, are on Arnall's side, regardless of what Thompson does or does not do. All other issues are confused, except the as yet inarticulate deep conflict between the rural people and the social elect. Even race is confused as an issue, for few liberals on Arnall's side would oppose segregation. Economic conditions are also a confused issue, with the bourbons working both country and city, and labor undecided.

LILLIAN SMITH lives in a rural county which went for Eugene Talmadge last summer. Her brother has been county ordinary, a position that is equivalent to county administrator or manager, for eleven years. Miss Smith knows the courthouse crowd and county politics. She knows why the country people hold to the county-unit voting system as if it were their Magna Charta. While she is sympathetic, she sees this feeling as a growing menace to law and order and democracy in Georgia. She is the author of "Strange Fruit."

One of the two weak spots in Arnall's program for change is that the program and its supporters are so cautious, so timorous in saying what they really believe, that they take the adventure out of the fight. Silence is a poor weapon to use against a powerful club like white supremacy. Their second and profound weakness is their condescension toward rural folk and their lack of interest in rural needs. This is their Achilles heel. They have lost the country regions, and Georgia is 65 per cent rural. No politician can afford to forget that. Although there have been important demonstrations of college students against him, the young, wanting excitement, have gone over in large numbers to Herman's side, who is as outspoken as his old father. The country people still cling with pathetic loyalty to the memory of "Gene," who despite his economic bourbonism and a college education still chewed tobacco, talked bad grammar, and could make his manners as gauche as any hill-billy's. They know he really liked them. He shared the same tastes with them.

Man does not live by bread alone anywhere—certainly not in Dixie. He lives by his feelings for himself and other people. Too long down here all of us were poor. Money could not be our symbol of excellence because none of us had it. We chose other symbols—the gentleman, and when one could not claim that, then a white skin would do. That in itself was enough down in Dixie to give one a coat of arms. But as time went on, the rural folks and their kin on the side streets and back streets of the towns realized that a white skin wasn't enough. The city gentleman somehow cornered most of the money and all of the esteem. The rural folks are starved for esteem. They feel as good as anybody, but nobody else seems to think so. Even when a Cracker gets rich, the city folks still don't seem to think he is as good as they are. It hurts. If the clubs in Atlanta shun him, and the society pages of the papers, all right—he will take over the Capitol and the Governor's Mansion. There he can feel at home; hobnob with royalty even if he himself made the crown on royalty's head out of corn shucks. Bad grammar and tobacco chewing are welcome there. They were not during Arnall's administration.

And now the city folks, in the countryman's mind, are trying to take away the one thing that has kept his self-esteem alive, his superiority to Negroes. And they would take it away without giving the Cracker equality with "the gentleman." You can't snatch the bone of white supremacy from a starving man until you give him some real food to eat, and this food can't be just money—not in Dixie; it has to be mixed up with human esteem and lots of it.

Last week Ellis Arnall spoke out for democracy more firmly than ever in his political career. He spoke eloquently for constitutional law and order. He thrilled many people by his words and by his wise acts. If he would go "all-out" for everyone's right to be human, to be well fed, well employed, healthy, secure, and esteemed, he could substitute these fundamental rights for the phony right to be "Cracker and white" that the rural folks now cling to. He could tap great sources of energy in the state, for these people have boundless energy that will be used either for good or evil. And he would win back in larger, far larger numbers the following he has lost in Georgia. We who are liberal take all the fun out of being "good" by being so scary. We have not yet learned the fundamental principle of politics: you have to give the people something to believe in with all their hearts, or something to hate with all their hearts; and plenty of bread. This week the liberals have worked as I have never seen them do before, because they have had something they could at last believe in. It may seem important to them for only a few days or months. We shall see.

Herman knows how to take risks. He knows also about bread and circuses. A little bread and a lot of circus may be his formula as it was Hitler's, for his talk of white supremacy is strong and unceasing, and Negro-baiting, like Jew-baiting in Germany, rates above Barnum and Bailey with lonely, bored, rejected people. But on the morning of January 21 Herman Talmadge gave a message to the legislature which, if it was full of the circus, was also full of promises for rural white people who need so many little things. Rural white people will remember it. They will remember that kind of talk far more vividly than talk against monopolies and freight rates, for though these things are important to the South, the rural people do not know it. They know simple concrete facts about sick children who need hospital care when there is no hospital in their county, and about old people who need money for cornmeal, and about country teachers who must have more money to live. These things, close at home, and urgent, Herman Talmadge has promised them. And because he talks their language, they believe him.

To many country folks in Georgia, Herman's dictatorial regime is a rural revolution. They are not sure what they are revolting against—maybe just city snobbery, maybe just boredom; maybe they are tired of having their corns stepped on. But they are revolting, and Herman is their little Führer. Such people, deprived of so much, can easily forget that constitutional government is a necessity in a democracy. They can easily be persuaded that law and order are luxuries for city folks. Herein lies the danger which Georgians now see for the first time; though few would acknowledge, even yet, their responsibility for it. And few would confess even in their own hearts that such fine talk about good government is as ashes in the mouth for two-thirds of our people, white and colored, who have never in their lives known the sweet taste of acceptance as human beings.

Berlin and the Russian Zone

BY JOEL CARMICHAEL

Paris, December 15

IN THE Russian plan to make the Soviet zone of Germany at once a functioning element of the Soviet economic system and a political pole of attraction for the other zones—as discussed in my two previous articles—Berlin plays a special role. Owing to the presence of the other three powers it has come less under the quasi-monolithic influence of the Unity Party (S. E. D.) than other parts of the zone, and since that party's overwhelming defeat in the October elections it has been a rallying point for all the anti-Russian elements that remain submerged elsewhere.

Lately these elements have been receiving the support, tacit or open, of the other occupying powers, but in the beginning, while the S. E. D. was still in embryo, the Americans, for instance, not only gave no aid to the anti-fusionist Social Democrats but leaned over backward in their impartiality so as not to offend their military ally. This "correctness" has long since vanished. It is now a commonplace that the excessive number of Berlin newspapers is due to the eagerness of the rival powers to license "their own" papers. While I was in Berlin I often heard stories of inter-Allied bickerings which went something like this: "Why did your paper call us this and that?" "Well, yours called us such and such."

From the Russian point of view the trouble is that while Berlin is indispensable as a capital for the Russian zone, to say nothing of Germany as a whole, it has stubbornly resisted political coordination. Its recalcitrance is especially irritating because it cannot be isolated from the rest of the zone. It is a "window opening out to the West" in a sense that the Soviet authorities heartily dislike. At the same time it is the heart of eastern Germany; no other city could conceivably fill the same role. This inalienable position of primacy explains why the Russians accepted the challenge of the other parties and permitted the October elections, even though it was clear to dispassionate observers that the result would be a crushing defeat for the S. E. D.

The failure of the S. E. D. seems all the greater when one considers the tactical and material advantages enjoyed by the Russians. Not only had they obtained a death grip on the city administration through having been the first to march in, but ever since the quadripartite occupation was established they have controlled the radio stations, the university, and the municipal councils, besides the geographically largest sector. Moreover, a genuine and fairly widespread sentiment in favor of a fusion of the two working-class parties had long existed, and it seemed at one time as if they might spontaneously coalesce. I heard many well-authenticated reports of a strong un-inspired movement for a single workers' party.

Knowledge of this mass sentiment explains the Russians' strange readiness to believe the assurances of their German advisers that the S. E. D. would win a sweeping victory. The post-election interviews of the party's leaders with their Soviet patrons must have been very depressing. Although the magnitude of the opposition vote was to some extent concealed by the way the returns were announced, province by province, there could be no denial of the fiasco. Industrial towns like Leipzig and Halle, which before Hitler had always turned in decisive majorities for the working-class parties, reversed themselves in favor of the right-wing Christian Democratic Union and Liberal Democratic Party. And this in spite of the superior resources at the disposal of the S. E. D.

In Berlin the three parties competing with the S. E. D. entered the struggle on a more equal footing with it than elsewhere. But there too they suffered from various kinds of discrimination. Any outsider could observe the striking difference in the amount of printed matter put out by the S. E. D. and its rivals. The opposition parties were allocated only a few meager scraps of paper, while the S. E. D. had enough for a superabundance of placards, posters, and broadsides. In addition, the Soviet authorities launched an energetic campaign of public philanthropy which struck most people as a brazen attempt at bribery. Coal, bread, and other needed supplies were distributed where they would do most good up to the very eve of the elections. Some of the attempts to influence people were amusing illustrations of bureaucratic ingenuity: women who for years had had no word from their husbands, presumably languishing in Siberian prisoner-of-war camps, suddenly received notes with the curt message: "Am well. Vote for the S. E. D."

The Kremlin of course realizes that if it is to control Germany it must either keep the country more or less permanently in subjection by means of an occupation army or set up a "friendly" government on the style of the Soviet Union's sister states, the so-called Slavic bloc. The second method undoubtedly seems preferable, and the election defeat must have occasioned a reexamination of its possibilities. The immediate reaction, however, was a hysterical outburst of plant removals and deportations of industrial workers. If it turns out that the Unity Party—or the Communists—cannot acquire a sufficiently broad base to take over the government in Germany, the occupation will no doubt linger on and on. But if the Unity Party—or the Communists—finally wins out, the Soviet forces will probably be withdrawn and a more or less coordinated German state will crown the Soviet system. I am convinced that if the Soviet Union could obtain Germany as a voluntary associate it would gladly relegate its Soviet "sisters" to the rubbish heap should the occasion demand. Since the Kremlin is evidently firmly resolved not to relinquish its grip on Germany, the question which alternative it will follow is a purely tactical one. In other words, it will pursue its goal as best it can.

JOEL CARMICHAEL, Nation correspondent for Central Europe, was attached to Army Intelligence in Berlin for a number of months. This is the last of three articles on the Russian occupation.

The practical difficulties in the way of making Germany a willing partner are enormous, and they all arise, it seems to me, out of Russia's material impoverishment. Surely only a desperate situation at home can explain Soviet high-handedness about both food and industrial equipment. Just as the atrocities committed by the Red Army after its irruption into Germany are to be attributed to a total breakdown of discipline rather than to Kremlin policy, so the dismantling, requisitioning, and mass kidnappings must be due, if we grant the Russian intention of retaining a foothold in Germany, to a peremptory domestic need. The political consequences of the Soviet economic program in Germany have been so disastrous that the economic compulsion must have been overwhelming. Evidently the Russians are so badly off themselves that they can leave no margin of surplus for Germany. This brute fact alone would counteract the most adroit propaganda—and Soviet propaganda has been far from adroit.

It need hardly be pointed out that Germany's resuscitation can only be conceived of in terms of the worldwide rivalry of the great powers. That is why French stubbornness on all questions involving German unity or economic rehabilitation seems obsessive and outmoded; the French are evidently still thinking of yesterday's Europe, in which Germany was the decisive factor. Germany's present prostration is so great that the most elaborate plans for its reconstruction amount merely to plans for strengthening it for future use by a greater power. The solution of the German problem, in short, cannot be found in Germany but must be looked for in the field of international politics.

"Time Is Money"

BY A. G. MEZERIK

Detroit, January 20

THE United Automobile Workers' headquarters is a tidy, low brick structure above which rise on two sides the huge limestone General Motors buildings. For about three-quarters of the working day the U. A. W. building is literally darkened by the shadow of GM. But only literally; figuratively it is the high executives of GM who sit in gloom as they scan the portal-to-portal claims of the union and wonder if the old David and Goliath routine is to be played through again under the auspices of the United States Supreme Court.

While the size of the portal-to-portal claims has depressed the GM executives, it has also had a sobering effect on the leaders of the union. Walter Reuther, R. J. Thomas, and George Addes are men who earn modest salaries. Their union feels rich when it has a million dollars on hand. Now this Mt. Clemens Pottery case has forced them to think of sums which seem more comparable to the national debt than to anything in their personal experience. They are determined to be conservative in their demands. They say to their attorney, Maurice Sugar, "File only for the amount which is unquestionably owing to the workers; don't pad." But when statisticians dig out the figures for a big industry like GM, they are bound to be startling.

One hundred thousand workers are affected. The extra time is all overtime, for the men have already been paid for a forty-hour week. That makes the portal-pay rate time and a half. Take a man who gets $1 an hour straight time. He has spent fifteen minutes morning and evening in portal-to-portal walking. Half an hour at time and a half is 75 cents, and the law adds a 100 per cent penalty. That makes $1.50. For one hundred thousand men it makes $150,000 a day. Now multiply $150,000 by the number of days the men have worked—five days a week, fifty-two weeks a year, over a period of at least six years—and it is easy to see how the astronomical figures get into the suits. The total of the claims already filed by all unions is more than four billion dollars, and that in anybody's language is a large sum.

No wonder the executives of the motor industry and the gentlemen of the National Association of Manufacturers have been aroused to a new pitch of fury against labor. This portal-to-portal business seems to follow an all too familiar pattern—and just as a change was in prospect: the Republicans had come to power, and the Supreme Court seemed to be behaving. There was reason to relax a bit, and the annual meeting of the N. A. M. was complacent, even generous in its faintly liberal pronouncements. Then, bang, the Mt. Clemens decision!

A. G. MEZERIK, author of "Revolt of the South and West," is continuing his study of current political and economic developments in the South and Middle West.

"Our New Way of Avoiding Suits"

—they know it by the violence of the press and radio reaction. The bear, however, is neither expropriation nor revolution but the definition of a work day in terms which unmistakably require the worker to be paid for the full time he gives and has given his employer.

Such a definition has been needed ever since the wages-and-hours law was passed. Labor has recognized the need right along and has urged Congress to make the definition. But management mistrusts labor and has opposed legislative action, preferring to leave the matter to the courts. In 1938 Elmer F. Andrews, the first administrator of the wages-and-hours law, proposed that the law be amended so that its administrator could make a definite ruling on portal-to-portal pay which would not be subject to alteration by court action. Again management objected, declaring in no uncertain terms that it was opposed to handing over any more power to New Deal agencies—the courts were good enough for them. In 1944 L. Metcalfe Walling, reporting to Congress in his capacity as wages-and-hours administrator, urged that he be permitted to issue binding regulations defining working time and to protect employers who complied with such regulations against civil or criminal liability. If in 1938 management felt it was a bad idea to hand more power to a New Dealer, it felt it was a much worse one in 1944, with the outlook for a return to Republican rule growing brighter day by day. It still preferred the courts, definitely.

But the situation has changed. Industry is now calling for legislation, and Representative Clare E. Hoffman of Michigan has a bill ready. This would amend the Fair Labor Standards Act to wipe out claims based on the portal-to-portal principle. It is a sort of Alice in Wonderland bill, disposing of all troubles with a casual "off

To hear the old guard of the N. A. M. tell it, the Supreme Court has expropriated the factories of the nation and handed them to the workers. But revolution via the Supreme Court does not seem very plausible to most men. Labor leaders and their lawyers are aware that they have a bear by the tail with their heads," completely ignoring the little matter of money owed by violators of an existing law, and incidentally smacking down the Supreme Court's jurisdiction. Management applauds Representative Hoffman's law and is ably seconded by the New York Times, which says ingenuously, "Representative Hoffman's proposal would appear to be the most forthright legislative approach to the problem." Forthright seems the right word, but the use of the phrase "approach to the problem" can be questioned. Representative Hoffman wants to use a legislative bulldozer not to approach but to eliminate the problem.

In the Mt. Clemens Pottery case the Supreme Court held that "the time necessarily spent by employees in walking to work on the employer's premises, following the punching of the time clock, was working time." This decision, according to Maurice Sugar, general counsel of the U. A. W., affects and perhaps invalidates almost every existing contract between management and labor. At the same time it immeasurably widens the area of collective bargaining. At future discussions around a bargaining table there will be argument about whether or not basic hourly rates have taken into account "preparatory time." When they have, portal-to-portal will not be a big issue. When they haven't, the concept of the work-week is in for some thorough overhauling. The new concept will be that the time a worker gives his employer is to be considered in one piece and not separated into compartments by an employer's arbitrary decision. Eventually management will see that it is profitable—in dollars—to provide facilities for washing up and for changing into and out of necessary work clothes, to have convenient exits and entrances, and to give workers a good many other things which will make life more pleasant for them. And after a few years the extra cost of portal-to-portal pay, spread over the entire wage bill, will be a small matter, as is now the cost of social security, which in its day, according to the N. A. M., promised revolution and bankruptcy.

As to Congress, it will probably move quickly to rescue employers from the frying pan into which the Supreme Court dropped them. It would be a very good idea if Congress did finally legislate those definitions of a work-week which were so persistently requested by the wages-and-hours administrators and by labor. But it would be a very bad idea to put the whole economy into the fire by such legislation as Representative Hoffman now proposes.

Meanwhile the N. A. M. has intervened in the court case which will decide the amount due the workers in the Mt. Clemens pottery, and made a modest request. Let the court declare a new principle, it says; let it rule that all portal-money claims start from June 10, 1946, the date of the Supreme Court decision. Let the court declare all obligations incurred earlier uncollectible. This from a group which boasts that industry meets its contractual and legal obligations!

On labor's side there is a good deal of confusion. Individual workers are dazed by the huge sums for which claims are being filed. Not having expected money for preparatory time, many workers have been receptive to newspaper criticism of union leaders who have filed suits. But the amounts awarded to the workers will be decided by the courts, not by the unions, and if the sum is large, the unions, I am certain, will help the companies find a way to pay. In fact, if the law can be changed so that the suits can be settled by a compromise, a method not now legal, the unions will be the first to applaud. The last thing they want is to put employers out of business.

Labor leaders have reacted in a variety of ways. District 50 of the United Mine Workers, an affiliate of the American Federation of Labor which does not subscribe to William Green's denunciation of portal-to-portal suits, would trade a demand for a wage increase for a settlement of the workers' portal claims. The more democratic unions of the C. I. O. will have no part in giving up a necessary wage increase in return for money to which the workers, according to the Supreme Court, are already entitled. Nor will they call off the suits if a wage increase is granted. This attitude will surprise many commentators, who view the portal-to-portal issue as primarily a bargaining advantage to be used, as Mrs. Elinore Herrick put it, "to sweeten pay envelopes."

The U. A. W. leaders are emphatic that the union's demands for wage increases must be kept separate from portal-to-portal claims. In the future, portal-to-portal pay, they agree, will have a place in bargaining about conditions of work, but claims based on past violations of the law have no part in present wage discussions. However, they are realistic; they know that they cannot expect both increased wages and portal-to-portal back pay unless the employers have the ability to pay the total sum, and they are prepared, I believe, to go a long way in working out reasonable adjustments. There is little reason for hysteria here, though on some sectors of the labor front real dangers exist. A good many shyster lawyers of the ambulance-chasing type have sniffed the pot of gold in portal-to-portal suits and are busy persuading local union leaders, on a fifty-fifty basis, to file huge claims, with or without merit, against local employers.

Portal-to-portal pay undoubtedly increases the complexity of labor-management relations. But when the smoke of the struggle has cleared away, labor and management may find that the enlarged area for bargaining makes all other disputes easier to negotiate. Society, which is forever seeking ways to stabilize industrial relations, may discover that it has passed through a portal leading to a happier land. Our friends of the N. A. M. should not complain; haven't they filled the copy books with the slogan "Time is money"?

After UNRRA, What?

By THOMAS J. HAMILTON

THE reports that UNRRA's European operations would come to a dead stop on December 31 were fortunately a trifle premature. The organization is of course rapidly disintegrating, but shipments of food and other supplies to Europe are continuing. As was already known, they will continue to China until March 31 at least. The end has been delayed not by new funds but simply by the fact that UNRRA, owing to various difficulties, has not been able to spend its money as fast as it expected. From the standpoint of international cooperation, the continuance of UNRRA, even on half rations, is welcome because it puts off for a time the application of the brusque 1947 policy that the war's victims hereafter are on their own.

But the last bushel of wheat and bale of cotton will have been delivered within a few short months. What will be done then? Thanks to the position adopted by the United States at the recent meeting of the General Assembly, virtually nothing by the United Nations. That body has set up a committee of experts which on January 6 solemnly began considering whether the average diet of the various countries needing help should be 2,200 calories, 2,600, or the same amount as in 1946. Of course unless these countries' governments are approved by Washington, they must look out for themselves.

The United States, in association with Great Britain and Canada, decided last summer that "the gravy train"—the phrase was Under Secretary of State Clayton's—had gone around for the last time, and that the three governments would furnish nothing more to UNRRA. No serious effort was made then or later to determine what the actual demand would be. It was assumed that the worst of the need was over, and that if it turned out otherwise, the countries feeling the pinch could always ask Washington or London for a credit. So, of course, they can, but it is easy to imagine what chance of being granted, a request for a loan, say, from Tito would have.

THOMAS J. HAMILTON is chief of the United Nations bureau of the New York Times.

Fortunately, it appears that only Poland, Austria, and Italy will be in dire straits before next year's harvests, and probably the last two can get help from the democracies. Considering the existing feeling between the United States and the Soviet Union, it was hardly to be expected that Poland or Czechoslovakia, still less Yugoslavia, the Ukraine, or White Russia, would get anything from Washington. According to the best information available, the two Soviet republics will need help, but perhaps Moscow will come to their rescue.

The situation of the refugees and displaced persons, for whose care UNRRA has funds until June 30, will be critical. Though the United States was sternly opposed to international action for relief, it fought determinedly in the General Assembly for international action on refugees and displaced persons. As a result the General Assembly approved the formation of the International Refugee Organization, which is to take over UNRRA's charges. But the prospects for the actual establishment of the I. R. O. are extremely dubious.

This is because a substantial number of the countries that voted to set it up are far from enthusiastic about paying for it. Among these must be reckoned Great Britain, which from the inception of the U. N. has championed the cause of the refugees but has not yet found it possible to sign the I. R. O.'s constitution. Consequently, although the required eight signers have been found—among them are the United States and Canada—Secretary General Lie hesitated a considerable time before calling a conference for February 11 in Geneva to set up an interim organization. This body can be formed whether or not financial support is forthcoming from the eight signers, but the I. R. O. itself cannot be established until fifteen countries the signers thus far are France, 4.1 per cent; the Dominican Republic, .04 per cent; Guatemala, .04 per cent; Honduras, .02 per cent; Liberia, .02 per cent; the Philippines, .24 per cent. Their quotas add up to practically 54 per cent, which is not too disappointing. Unfortunately, there is not the slightest indication that, aside from the United States, Canada, and France, any of these will actually pay. Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, in her final appeal for approval of the I. R. O. constitution, gave the specific assurance that a vote in its favor, or even signing it afterward, did not constitute an undertaking to put up any money.

The action of Belgium and the Netherlands, scheduled to provide 1 per cent and .9 per cent respectively, will apparently depend upon what Great Britain does. Since it is unthinkable that the British Labor government would withhold its support, these countries will presumably come around in the end. But even though the British sign, it will be hard to get the requisite fifteen nations to do so, and it is almost impossible to see where more than 73 per cent of the budget will come from.

The care of people made homeless by the war or fascist persecution would seem to be an obvious United Nations responsibility. If it is not discharged, the U. N. will lose much of its influence. Of the 1,000,000 who now need aid, from 200,000 to 220,000 are Jews. The rest are chiefly Balts, Poles, Yugoslavs, Ukrainians, and White Russians, who refuse to go back to the Soviet Union, Poland, and Yugoslavia because they dislike or fear the Communist or Communist-controlled governments there. The idea prevailing among even well-informed persons that refugees and displaced persons are largely Jews and leftists has persisted in spite of the Soviet bloc's determined opposition to any international help for "traitors," who, they say, should be compelled to return to their homes. Although the right of refugee must of course be protected, there seems to be no reason why an apolitical peasant should not go back to the country he came from. And there is in fact a small trickle eastward of D. P.'s willing to try their luck behind the "iron curtain."

In comparison with this trickle, however, a flood of refugees, mainly Jews, continues to pour into the British and particularly the American zone of occupation. By the time UNRRA's camps are closed next summer, the total number will probably exceed the present 1,000,000. The question what is going to happen to them seems unanswerable. Migration to Palestine is out of the question for the rest of the year; not more than 20,000 or 25,000 can expect to settle in Latin America; unless Congress acts on President Truman's vague request for liberalization of the immigration laws, the United States will receive relatively few of them. Apparently they are in Germany and Austria and Italy to stay. It is unthinkable that they should remain indefinitely in have not merely signed but ratified the I. R. O. constitution—that is, voted to pay their share, which would amount to 75 per cent of the bill. Understandably enough, Mr. Lie has been reluctant to commit the U. N. to the support of what may turn out to be a lost cause. The Assembly resolution does not even provide postage stamps for the interim organization, and all funds for its operation will have to be advanced by the U. N. itself.

In addition to the United States, which is scheduled to pay 45.75 per cent of the operational budget of $150,000,000, and Canada, which will pay 3.5 per cent, camps; yet their dispersal over the enemy countries, with the American, the British, or the French army as their sole protector, would hardly be practicable. Unless the I. R. O. can be set up in time as a going concern, the occupation armies will have to take over, and it appears that the American army is already planning to do so.

The worst of army rule is that it would prevent the formulation of a long-range plan for the solution or even the amelioration of the refugee problem. If the D. P.'s refuse to go home, and other countries refuse to take them in, they must stay where they are. But under what conditions can they be assimilated into the German, Austrian, or Italian economy? How can they be encouraged to develop a sane and relatively hopeful attitude? It is obvious that only the I. R. O. can give the answer, not the Pentagon or the Horse Guards.

India's New Destiny

BY SHIVA RAO

New Delhi, January 22

THE adjourned session of the Constituent Assembly was resumed yesterday after an interval of four weeks. The hope that the Moslem League would decide during this interval to enter the Assembly did not materialize. It is clear that many Moslems, particularly those from provinces where they form the minority population, find Jinnah's demand for Pakistan with an exchange of populations impracticable. They have begun to realize that however effective such a slogan might have been as a rallying cry for Moslems throughout India, as a solution for the Hindu-Moslem problem it won't work. Leading members of the Moslem party are big landlords who cannot migrate to neighboring provinces without sacrificing their properties and influence. Nor is that the only consideration. A week ago I met in southern India two educated Moslems who are accomplished scholars in Tamil, the chief language of the Hindus of South Madras, but completely ignorant of Hindustani. Such people—and they form a large part of the population—would regard the transfer to northern India as fantastic.

So far as the Congress is concerned, it has accepted after a sharp debate the Labor Cabinet's statement of December 6 interpreting certain disputed passages in the original document in favor of Jinnah. But left-wing elements in the Congress were extremely critical of the policy of appeasement of the Moslem League represented by this gesture. They asserted that Jinnah had allied himself unreservedly with Churchill and the British Tories in order to delay India's independence. Voting on the resolution was significant: 99 supported it and 252 opposed it, the rest preferring to remain neutral. Nehru and his colleagues seemed uneasily conscious of the strength of the opposition. They argued that while a renewal of the struggle with Britain might later become inevitable, it was desirable to choose the proper issue and favorable circumstances.

Jinnah has delayed summoning the central executive of the Moslem League in the hope of overcoming internal opposition. The call, however, cannot be postponed indefinitely. If the league should again indorse the resolution to boycott the Constituent Assembly, Nehru is bound to raise the awkward question of whether the league's nominees can continue as members of the interim government. Lord Wavell, the Viceroy, has steadily supported the league whether inside or outside the government, but even he may be compelled by the Labor Cabinet to point out to Jinnah that membership in the interim government has always been conditional on entering the Constituent Assembly. Nor can the Moslem League decide in favor of participation without accepting the Cabinet's declarations, which—as Congress ceaselessly maintains—imply repudiation of Pakistan.

At this stage, therefore, it is difficult to forecast what policy the Moslem League council will recommend to its followers. The odds are in favor of their entering the Constituent Assembly when it meets again in April. The Congress Party will go through the business of this session during the next few days and then disperse: it will adopt Nehru's resolution and appoint an advisory committee on fundamental and minority rights, leaving places for nominees of the Moslem League should they decide later to take them.

Rajendra Prasad, president of the Constituent Assembly, made an important statement yesterday in answer to Churchill's mischievous suggestion that the Assembly, in the absence of the league, was only a caste Hindu organization. Analyzing the figures, he said that of 296 elected members, 210 were present—that is, 155 Hindus out of a total of 160, 30 caste representatives out of 33, 6 Christians out of 7, all 5 backward tribesmen, all 5 Anglo-Indians, all 5 Sikhs, all 3 Parsees, and 4 Moslems out of 80. With the exception of the Moslem League, whose absence he "deeply regretted," the Assembly, he said, represented every section of the people.

SHIVA RAO is correspondent in India for The Nation and the Manchester Guardian. He is on the staff of the Hindu of Madras.

Despite this refutation the Tories will continue to claim that the Assembly is not adequately representative and therefore its decisions cannot merit the British Cabinet's serious attention. This is also the line of argument which a number of the princes are likely to adopt: some because, being Moslems, they would prefer to await Jinnah's decision; others because they find the radical nature of the demands for a responsible government made by Congress leaders like Nehru embarrassing.

All the princes, however, do not think alike. Ten years ago Churchill, then only a leader of a diehard group of Tories, led a vehement opposition to the policy of Baldwin's Cabinet on India. Through private negotiations with the princes he successfully delayed the inauguration of the federation until the beginning of the war, when Linlithgow, then Viceroy, suspended it indefinitely. The question many princes are now asking is whether Churchill is likely to come to power again as leader of a Tory government in Great Britain. Meanwhile, can they expect assistance from Nehru's government to suppress any popular uprisings within their territories? Their treaty rights provided that the Viceroy must furnish assistance. But the defense forces are now under the control of Nehru's government.

The Moslem League and the princes will have decided by the middle of February whether they are joining the Constituent Assembly or not. The decision of the princes will not be unanimous, since a number of them would rather deal directly with the Constituent Assembly than accept the directive of a negotiating committee.

Factors outside the Constituent Assembly will also exercise considerable influence on its future course. One is how soon British officials, both civil and defense, will quit India. The Indian Civil Service now consists of about 1,000 men, half of whom are British—some of them young but many nearing retirement. The Indian Police Service contains some 600 men, 60 per cent of whom are British. The British officials demand compensation for retirement in addition to their pensions, arguing that constitutional changes force them to leave India. The British government has scaled down their compensation demands, making £8,000 the maximum, but has otherwise supported their case. The Congress leaders view the problem from a different standpoint. They cite the example of South Africa and Eire, which have retained the officials who served under previous regimes, and express their willingness to do likewise.

The problem is not primarily financial. Nehru recently complained in a public speech that there was a definite understanding between the British officials and the Moslem League. In the past an aggrieved officer could seek the protection of the Secretary of State and thus enjoy a considerable measure of immunity from disciplinary action. With the disappearance of that privilege, officers can expect just treatment from the Indian national government—but not the freedom to indulge in intrigue. How many will ultimately choose to continue in service under the altered conditions must be decided by the end of March. They can stay if they are willing to drop the protection of the British Secretary of State in London.

A committee composed entirely of Indians except for one British military officer has just been appointed to draw up a program for complete nationalization of all defense forces. Progress must necessarily vary with the different services—army, navy, and air force. At higher levels it will inevitably be slow since hardly any Indian has advanced beyond the rank of brigadier.

One thing, however, seems certain. By April, when the Constituent Assembly will hold its next session, the process of eliminating British personnel from India's administration will have definitely begun. Those who continue to serve will do so by accepting the authority of Nehru's government as final. The significance of this change will be great.

As Mrs. Pandit, the distinguished leader of the Indian delegation to the United Nations, told the Constituent Assembly yesterday, "India is rapidly becoming conscious of a new destiny which is awaiting her as a champion of the cause of freedom for all dependent people of Asia." It was a striking speech. India, she said, had a dual task. The first was to throw off all traces of imperial domination and thus lead the way for Burma, Indo-China, and Indonesia. The second was the establishment of a social democracy. The fulfilment of these objectives, she said, would be a powerful contribution to world peace.

The negotiations now going on in London concerning Burma's political status are being eagerly followed by India. The close relationship between the two countries was emphasized by the recent visit to New Delhi of General U Aung San, leader of the Anti-Fascist People's Freedom League of Burma. The youthful general—he is only thirty-three—gives one the impression of a man molded by the hard realities of the war years. "What do you want for Burma?" I asked him. "Dominion status won't do. We must have independence," he replied without hesitation, adding after a moment's pause, "and complete freedom during the interim period." He was particularly critical of the limitations regarding defense and foreign policy, for both of which he is nominally counselor to the governor. The troops in Burma are not even under the control of the governor, and foreign affairs are directed from London. "The British have divided us," he said without a trace of bitterness, "but those tactics won't succeed." He was confident of popular support in the struggle to achieve independence in the event the London negotiations proved a failure. And he added with a laugh, "The Burmese people haven't any inhibitions about violence."

U Aung San looks forward to closer association with India—but on a basis of independence for both countries. He made it abundantly plain that Burma can never become part of an Indian federation. The first step after Burma's independence, he thought, would be to form a Southeast Asian federation. Later it might be possible to visualize a confederation of all Asia, in which China, India, and Southeast Asia would be three distinct units. As head of the newly established Burma Council of World Affairs U Aung San hopes to attend the coming Inter-Asian Relations Conference in New Delhi sponsored by Nehru and scheduled to meet the last week in March. Indo-China, Indonesia, the Philippine Islands, China, Ceylon, Afghanistan, and Syria are other countries which have so far responded to the invitation.

Nehru has just answered Dulles's charge that India seems to accept Soviet guidance. He has described the policy of his government as one of cultivating friendly and cooperative relations with all countries, notably the United States, while avoiding alignments with any particular power or group. The primary and immediate concern of India, Burma, and Southeast Asia is to eliminate imperialist domination. During the coming months the question will be settled in India as to whether this purpose can be achieved with the cooperation of Britain and other European powers or whether aggressive methods must be used.

The Cushing Health Plan

BY MARTIN GUMPERT

DR. HARVEY CUSHING was one of America's most eminent physicians. He was a gifted writer, an erudite historian, a philosopher of medicine. Probably he is best known as the man who by lifelong, systematic, tenacious labor learned how to wrest from the grip of death persons afflicted with brain tumors. Cushing's biography, written by his pupil and friend, John F. Fulton, has just been published.* It should be read not only by every student of medicine but by everyone who needs reassurance about the existence of human dignity in our time.

The book contains a letter which Dr. Cushing sent to President Roosevelt more than twelve years ago, on November 10, 1934. This letter is still timely and in view of certain proposals made recently in Washington is worth quoting.

Dear Mr. President: May I venture to hand on to you a suggestion for what it may be worth? . . . Would it not be a good move just at this time to take into consideration the establishment, if not of a government department, at least of a super-bureau of public health to coordinate a number of welfare agencies?

Such a department would naturally include such scattered interests as infant welfare and the Children's Bureau, old-age insurance, possibly the matter of the veterans' hospitals and health compensation, vital statistics, the administration of the Food and Drug Act, and the existent Public Health and Marine Hospital services.

* Charles C. Thomas, Springfield, Illinois.

DR. GUMPERT, a New York physician, contributes a monthly page to The Nation on new developments in medicine and related fields.

I know that such a fusion would be difficult owing partly to inter-departmental jealousies. . . . But I am sure that opposition could be overcome, and it certainly would mean a great saving of energy, prevent much duplication of work, and lead to a proper concentration of authority on subjects that have to do with public health. This is not infrequently an interstate matter, as, for example, when Chicago dumped its sewage into the upper waters of the Mississippi River.

There will be difficulties about such a concentration, but you are accustomed to overcoming difficulties. . . . When the "Committee of One Hundred" some years ago broached such a proposal to Theodore Roosevelt, he admitted the importance of the project but said the time was not ripe for it. The time may be ripe for it now—or you may be able to ripen it, which amounts to the same thing. One difficulty is the proper man to head such a department . . . but the opportunity usually brings the necessary man to the surface.

There is an old adage of the operating room that suggestions spoil good surgery—that is, that the assistant is not supposed to draw a red herring across the operator's path while he is at work. Nevertheless, I hand this suggestion on to you for what it is worth. . . .

[Signed] HARVEY CUSHING

Strangely enough, the advent of a Republican regime seems to have brightened the chances of realizing Cushing's idea. President Truman in his message to the Eightieth Congress recommended the establishment of a single Department of Welfare to administer federal programs concerned with health, education, and welfare. Senator Robert A. Taft, now in power, should be able to have enacted the bill which he prepared during the last Congress in collaboration with Senator J. William Fulbright. This bill would establish a Department of Health, Education, and Security which would comprise the Federal Security Administration, the Social Security Board, the Children's Bureau, the Public Health Service, the Office of Education, the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation, and the Food and Drug Administration. Though many persons think Senator Taft's national-health bill an entirely inadequate substitute for the controversial Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill, the nomination of a Secretary of Health would be a tremendous step forward—provided, of course, that the man chosen was not a bureaucrat or politician but a physician of outstanding scientific and executive ability.

The health of peoples will be a decisive factor in the future of this small and overcrowded world. World sanitation seems indeed more promising, and perhaps more constructive, than world diplomacy today. The United States could easily assume the leadership of the crusade for health and welfare if its great research and public-health facilities were united and fully utilized.

The time is ripe for a federal Health Department as envisioned by Harvey Cushing.

IN ONE EAR

BY LOU FRANKEL

LAST month the frequency-modulation operators had a banquet and back-patting session at the Hotel Statler in Washington. More than 100 FM operators plunked down $100 in yearly dues and another 200 FM stations are expected to enrol soon to finance the Frequency Modulation Association. The chairman of the Federal Communications Commission spoke, a number of FM men spoke, and an executive director was hired. The calculated effect was to promote FM, and that will be done.

One topic not on the agenda was the wishes of the FM audience. Neither the set manufacturers, the radio retailers, nor the FM broadcasters, with few exceptions, seem to be worrying about the listener. But if FM is to prosper, something will have to be done, and soon, about the quality of the FM sets being sold and of the FM stations being erected. The one thing most people want from FM is static-free reception and superfine tonal quality. Pre-war stations and sets provided this; present-day sets and stations, again with a few exceptions, do not.

Every FM set I've seen for sale has been a combination of FM and a regular radio. These sets receive FM but reproduce it on the AM speaker, which means that FM's sound range of 15,000 cycles is heard over a speaker with a sound range of only 5,000 cycles. To give full FM tonal quality separate sound systems are needed, but such sets will cost around $400 when they come off the production line.

Full-range FM sets—15,000 cycles—cost about $600. And even the listener who can afford these prices does not get the best FM quality unless the set can tune a pre-war FM station. For unless a station uses all the power required for its particular transmitter, the FM signal received by the listener will not be static free. And too many of the post-war FM stations are rushing on to the air with patchwork equipment, makeshift antennae, and partial power. Listeners ten miles away often cannot get these stations, and those near by pick up static. The reason is that while FM is unaffected by vacuum cleaners, electric razors, and dial phones, it comes within the range of such an infinitely widespread and vexing static as the buzz made by the spark plugs of an automobile.

Numerous tricks are being worked on the listeners. Suburban residents, supposedly within range of an FM station in a metropolitan center, buy AM-FM radios or even the high-priced FM sets, and then, when they don't work, learn they need a special $25 FM antenna. Or they buy an FM set which works perfectly in the shop in the city but not so well at home. Then they discover that the retailer is either not equipped to service the set or can't afford to send a man out to where they live. Some retailers are selling AM radios with room for FM equipment, although they do not know when the attachment will be available or what it will cost. I've seen $400 radios sold on this basis.

As a result of all this a good deal of listener dislike for FM is being built up. Already radio retailers in some communities are finding themselves overstocked with AM-FM receivers. Retailers in other communities, where there are no FM stations, buy up these sets and sell them to FM-hungry listeners. The situation is not the fault of anybody in particular. The station manager wants to get on the air as soon as he can to start building an audience. The retailer, in most cases, is just a salesman with little knowledge of the set he sells. And the manufacturer is making sets as cheaply as he can to meet his competition; the manufacturer's engineers know the score, but the sales manager, not the technician, is responsible for sales volume.

To protect themselves and their listeners FM broadcasters need standards. The manufacturers have AM sets and transmitters and electrical appliances to make and sell; they are not worrying about FM. Nor are the retailers. Only the FM broadcaster with his sizable investment has all his eggs in one basket. It is up to him to cure listener-irritation while it is still limited.

You are bound to enjoy an FM set. But before you buy one, be certain that you can get an FM station using its full facilities, that the set will give you FM's full 15,000-cycle sound range, that an FM service man can be sent for when needed, and that you have an FM antenna.

And remember, until the FM stations and the musicians come to terms, you'll hear none of the popular AM programs that use live music on your FM set

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Storm in a Cocoa Cup

UP TO October 1, 1946, the wholesale ceiling price of cocoa beans had been held firmly at 9 cents a pound. It was then raised to 14½ cents, close to the price Brazilian growers were receiving in the world market. A little more than three weeks later OPA was flung to the Republican wolves, and members of the New York Cocoa Exchange rejoiced at their escape from controls. In the first free-market deals cocoa changed hands at 14.95 cents, and traders predicted that prices would only advance moderately. Their judgment proved poor, to put it mildly, for since then spot quotations have rocketed and the current price of around 25 cents may easily be pushed higher, especially if candy-makers are allotted more sugar.

People in the trade disclaim any responsibility for this sad state of affairs. It is all the fault, they say, of the West African Produce Control Board set up by a socialistic British government to buy and market the cocoa crop in Nigeria and the Gold Coast—about half the world supply. In a cabled protest to the board on November 20 last, the New York Cocoa Exchange flatly accused it of manipulating the advance in prices by withholding offers. "We suggest," they added, "that our long-expressed fears that the American cocoa industry would be subjected to a monopolistic squeeze are now being realized. We protest against your marketing policies as being contrary to the basic spirit of the Atlantic Charter, which promised free access by all nations to the raw materials of the world."

How far is this serious charge against the British government justified? My own investigations suggest that the story is not so plain a tale of villainy as the Cocoa Exchange indicates.

The West African Produce Marketing Board was organized during the war when the shutting off of European markets and the lack of shipping threatened to ruin the West African cocoa growers, all of whom are native small-holders. As a result prices were stabilized at rather below the average of the three pre-war years, and the board, although forced to destroy a large tonnage of beans, which cannot be stored for long under tropical conditions, made a modest profit.

British colonial administrators decided that this wartime expedient made possible marketing methods which contrasted rather happily with those in vogue before the war. Then cocoa was sold by the cultivators through brokers to twenty-eight large European merchant firms, which alternated between cutthroat competition and organized collusive buying. Prices were apt to fluctuate violently, and the unsophisticated growers were often cheated and forced into debt. The marketing system, according to the Economist, was one "riddled with abuses." It is such considerations that have influenced the British government in its decision to leave marketing in the hands of government boards until native cooperatives are sufficiently developed to take over the job. Any profits that are made will be spent for agricultural research and education or similar purposes.

This plan, it should be noted, gives no kind of preference to British cocoa merchants or candy manufacturers; in fact, the "trade" in London has protested just as vehemently as that in New York. Its sole objective is the protection of many thousands of native farmers, who in the absence of such a scheme could not enjoy any equality of bargaining power with the handful of buyers through whom their produce would pass to the world market. The conception of colonial trusteeship, it is claimed, makes the safeguarding of their interests an imperative duty.

Granted the force of this argument, it remains true that a colonial power is obligated to allow other nations equal access to the raw materials produced in its territory. Does the West African cocoa scheme constitute a violation of this pledge? I do not think so, as long as all buyers, irrespective of nationality, are treated alike, but final judgment can only be made on the basis of the actual behavior of the West African Board. It should be noted, however, that as long as price ceilings were maintained here the board cooperated with the OPA. When controls were dropped, it waited to see how demand would develop before offering new contracts and asking for competitive bids. If American consumers were going to pay more for cocoa, the board wanted to make certain that part of the profit would accrue to West Africa.

In fact, once ceilings were abandoned, there was nothing to stop a rise in the price of cocoa in this country since demand was greatly in excess of the allocation of half the world production made to the United States by the International Emergency Food Council. This gives America the same share as it secured before the war but a smaller absolute amount since, mainly owing to the ravages of a plant disease, cocoa output has fallen sharply in the past few years. Until this condition is remedied, or until depression reduces the demand for candy, cocoa will remain comparatively expensive no matter how it is marketed.

The real test of the West African Board will come when a more normal relation between supply and demand is reestablished. Should it then try to hold the price level by artificial means—for instance, by borrowing the parity concept from the United States Congress—protests from American consumers may be in order. However, it is not unreasonable to suppose that British colonial administrators have learned something from the fate of the famous "Stevenson plan," designed to jack up rubber prices and hold them at a level satisfying to the planters. That scheme ended in fiasco because it so stimulated production that its organizers were drowned in a flood of rubber. The West African Board, anxious not to invite a similar inundation, will aim, it appears, at ironing out seasonal fluctuations rather than at exacting a monopoly price. Meanwhile, it is encouraging to know that it is devoting part of its profits to defeating the "shooting sprout" disease, which consumers of chocolate malteds must regard as their chief enemy.

BOOKS and the ARTS

This Is It

THE COMING CRISIS. By Fritz Sternberg. The John Day Company. $3.50.

THIS review is written as the research program of the Committee for Economic Development for the coming two years is announced. The program, characteristic of the vast industry of current American research, trudges into the future biting off and masticating endlessly small separate bits of "objective reality"—"Business inventories and their effect on business," "Incentives for investment," "Special problems of small business," and so on. Is it a lack of insight or courage that makes American research fail to see or unwilling to work in terms of the magnitude and the over-all political character of the choices we Americans are making, so to speak, in our sleep?

Fritz Sternberg's book is so different from the thinking of American social researchers that either he or they are colossally wrong at a time when such wrongness involves the central function of intelligence. Reading this book, I get the sense that, in contrast to this kind of thinking, American research operates with the most crucial function of the human cortex inactive, namely, the function that perceives isolated phenomena together as wholes, in terms of over-all direction of thrust and meaning.

Four major ingredients of Mr. Sternberg's thinking as an economist are largely lacking in our American approach: (1) He thinks historically, alert to the sequences of fundamental social change. (2) As a displaced European he can examine a hypothesis that tends not even to occur to the American mind, namely, that this is a revolutionary era in which immensely important things are at stake in the unrolling gray ribbon of events. (3) He approaches our economy not as an array of processes but as a total system and a capitalist system, with the characteristics that go with such a system—a class-stratified social base, the resolution of differences by power struggles, a dynamic need to expand which makes certain predictable things likely to happen and as surely prevents other identifiable things from happening. (4) He has a theory of the complexity of causation which prevents lapsing into the liberal's linear view of progress through a chain of discreet, well-intentioned steps.

Here are the conclusions Mr. Sternberg reaches by this kind of thinking: Down to the First World War capitalism's economic depressions were self-healing, for the expansion of markets more than compensated for the tendency within capitalism to increase unemployment. But by 1913 this ceased to be the case; and when the 1929 collapse came it was so serious as to be different in kind from all its predecessors, and it still had not been overcome a decade later when World War II began. The new stage of capitalism that 1929 signaled is characterized by chronic mass unemployment and the overt alliance of economics and politics.

The United States emerges from World War II with productive capacity heavily augmented and "the factors making for economic crisis tremendously intensified." Not only is there no chance that we can increase our foreign trade enough to absorb even 10 per cent of this new productive capacity, but each effort to do so will aggravate the crisis difficulties of the rest of the capitalist world. Nor can the gap be closed by increasing domestic consumption, for in our monopoly-capitalist social system, in which power is in the hands of the big corporations, there simply is no likelihood that real wages will be allowed to rise by the necessary 30 to 40 per cent.

Current proposals for the state as investor to fill the gap needed for full use of man-power and resources fail to recognize that such a permanent peace-time program acknowledges that "capitalism in its contemporary form has failed to justify its existence at its most critical point." The sponsors of such state activity evade the central problem of the relation of state investment to private capitalist investment; but it would unavoidably affect profit-making. And here again one faces the raw fact of class power, for "no government mainly influenced by capitalist circles could possibly accept" a policy operating to abolish unemployment as a class-control weapon and to increase substantially the working-class share of the total social product.

So a crisis at least as severe as 1929 is coming in the United States, and for reasons cited by Mr. Sternberg it will develop without effective state interference. But the state will be intimately involved in the deepening crisis. "In the United States, as in all other countries, we are now faced with a decisive transformation of the functions of the state." It will lose its "façade of independence as between, or above, the classes, [and] the more the state intervenes in economic affairs, is compelled to intervene as a result of intensifying social antagonisms, the more big business will have to fight to obtain direct influence on the state. Thus in the coming epoch . . . the class struggle will be fought primarily to secure direct influence on the state, [and this] will become the decisive political and economic battlefield in the U. S. A."

"Whether there will be a Third World War or not will depend to a very large extent, to a decisive extent perhaps, on the policy pursued by the United States economically, militarily, and in foreign relations in the period in which the coming crisis will take place." Conditions in the United States in the crisis will be more favorable to the growth of American fascism, though increased popular sophistication may operate somewhat to curb this tendency. But "the strength of the monopolist-capitalist forces and their satellites in the United States is so very great that it will represent a considerable success for the left-wing progressive forces if they can play a role at all beside the reactionary forces in the crisis." As the crisis comes, big business will very probably plunge the country into a war-preparation-economy (Wehrwirtschaft) as a depression counter-measure, as this is the only anti-crisis device that can be developed "without greatly limiting the functions of the employing classes."

This is Mr. Sternberg's appraisal of how things are. He may be right or he may be wrong. I believe he is right. The need is for organized labor and middle-class progressives to stop indulging in factional fights and to get to work on the real issues; and for American research to come out from behind its fig leaf of "objectivity" and test step by step the bases for Mr. Sternberg's conclusions, rather than dismiss them as "speculation."

ROBERT S. LYND

Ten Great Poems

THE NOBLE VOICE: A STUDY OF TEN GREAT POEMS. By Mark Van Doren. Henry Holt and Company. $3.

THE NOBLE VOICE" is a collection of ten academic lectures, and certain of the book's faults may be at least partly excused by this fact. Mr. Van Doren has, for instance, a tendency to fall into a highfalutin poetical vein: "Motes of the vernacular are always dancing in its ['Troilus and Criseyde's'] beams, as proverbs get up and stretch in the dry light of noon." Doubtless this sounded better than it reads. What is perhaps more disturbing is the way Mr. Van Doren commits himself to an unhappily exaggerated justification of the necessary translations. Too much has certainly often been made of the fact that Homer wrote in Greek, but it is, none the less, something more than "an interesting fact" that he did so, just as Spenser's language is something more than "antique orthography which keeps so many readers away from 'The Faerie Queene.'" And what Professor Krapp's Modern English does to Chaucer's Middle English, which is not after all unreadable, is really gruesome. "What I shal after doon, I can not saye;/But trewely, as yet me list not pleye," says Chaucer's Criseyde to Diomedes; and Professor Krapp's: "Though how my heart may change, I cannot tell;/The future may, of course, my grief dispel."

Mr. Van Doren has, to be sure, his theoretical as well as his practical reasons for using translations. "Their merit as subject matter," he says of his ten poems, "... is that they offer a perspective through poetry," and adds of his favorite, Homer: "Nothing prevented him from believing and loving the deeds and men that he saw, exactly as he saw them." For Mr. Van Doren, that is, the permanent, common values are the heart of poetry, and the great poet always finds them in the everyday world. That is why what he calls "style" or even the poet's native language is only a "superfluous barrier . . . between the reader and the work." There are certainly great poets of this kind, though not all great poets are of it, and perhaps no single great poet is exclusively of it.

In any event, there are only two ways to get at such values in a poem; either you understand it in all its local particularity and, by a final critical act, discover at the heart of this understanding the poem's universal qualities; or you trust your intuitive notion of what the great poem must be and measure each poem against it. Mr. Van Doren's method is the second, and, apart from the necessary assumption of superiority to his poet which this method forces on him, it shows, in his hands, another weakness. However true it may be that all great poems are trying to deal with a very few "permanent truths," it is apparently a fact that no such truth exists for anyone as such; it exists at all only in a particular local habitation and with its own name. As a consequence a poet must deal with it in the form in which it exists in his time, and the failure of a critic to consider this may make everything he says irrelevant. Mr. Van Doren passes all these considerations off as matters of "style," but just as the Criseyde of Professor Krapp is not the same person as Chaucer's—nor his world the same world—so the values of "Paradise Lost," conceived in a different set of particulars, become something different, something, moreover, impossible for a man in the seventeenth century to conceive at all. Mr. Van Doren is very busy correcting Milton's blunders, such as making God a theologian or trying for vastness in his poem or describing Adam and Eve in Paradise as he does ("We could," he says, giving Milton a little hint of how to improve matters, "accept them in a state . . . wherein they breathed the truth with bivalvular ease and peace"). All this is to ignore the form man's understanding took in the seventeenth century for an irrelevant account of how much better "Paradise Lost" would be had it been written in the twentieth century, with the concrete particulars and convictions which pose the question of man's fate most sharply for us, by Mr. Van Doren, with his private ideas of a paradise overflowing with bivalvular ease.

When Mr. Van Doren likes a poet, as he does Homer and Dante and Chaucer and, with qualifications, Lucretius, he is full of apologetics and of frequently admirable appreciation. When he dislikes a poet, as he does Milton and Spenser and Wordsworth and, with qualifications, Vergil and Byron, he is likely to spend most of his time displaying prejudices which are no better for being old and familiar. He is surely right that we ought to know more than most of us do about these poems—and all other great ones—even though we cannot hope to be experts on all of them. It is not easy to believe, however, that his manner will encourage a reasonable understanding of many of them.

ARTHUR MIZENER

Satire and Ring Lardner

THE PORTABLE RING LARDNER. Viking Press. $2.

THE sensitive reader is certain to be profoundly moved by this collection—if not always because of the quality of the writing, then because of its evidence of the American writer's unique dilemma. Ring Lardner began writing as a popular columnist, and until his last days he was suspicious of the judgments, even of the favorable judgments, of "highbrow" critics. He was in no sense of the word an intellectual. He lived in and wrote about a very constricted world, beyond the limits of which he seldom ventured; his characters usually come from the theater and sports, and occasionally from the small town with which Lardner never lost emotional contact.

Yet no American writer had a more certain vision of what is cheap and futile in our national life. By comparison Dreiser was gentle, Anderson a publicity agent for the village, and Lewis a kindly Rotarian. But this very depth of Lardner's penetration into the internal terrors beneath the sham surfaces of our life—the terrors of self-recognition and the gripping fear of the self—was to prove a major source of the dilemma from which he was never to escape.

His notorious misanthropy—what was it but a dead end, a desperate defense against his own uncorrupted vision, which he could not temper with faith, belief, or hope?

Lardner's characters were doomed. Perhaps he pitied them; perhaps he had some vague glimmer of understanding that they were dried up and defeated—for they were all dried up and defeated: Lardner made sure of that—by social molds they could not shape. But he gave them no leeway; each of them, in no matter how different a way, was doomed. One's first and most native reaction to his best stories is a shudder mixed of horror and despair. What a terrible act of condemnation: the movie magnate and his dipsomaniac wife of "The Love Nest," the bored old nannies of "The Golden Honeymoon," the barber and his customers of "Haircut," the disappointed girl and her "friend," Chas. F. Lewis, Mr. Man of "Some Like Them Cold." In these stories pity is at a loss and compassion almost irrelevant; there is only the shudder of contempt for the Yahoos.

For Ring they were all Yahoos, all wretched frauds in the jungle of American deadliness, where security could be found only in boredom and boredom was the price of security. The tragedy was that Lardner himself was just a little bit of a Yahoo too, that there runs through his work a strain of egotism as uncritical and unattractive as that of his characters. He snickered together with them at what he imagined was sophistication and intellectuality, and he could not always distinguish between the pretentiously phony and the real thing; hence his unreadiness to face his dilemma as a writer shuttling between popular and serious mediums. Hence, too, his crippling self-limitations.

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

The Nation

Money-Saving Magazine Combinations

with Harpers Magazine	$8.50
You Save $2.50
with Consumers Union	$9.25
You Save $1.25
with Harper's Magazine and Consumers Union	$11.75
You Save $3.75

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses, Canadian and foreign postage extra.

THE NATION by itself:

- ☐ 1 Year $6 ☐ 2 Years $10 ☐ 3 Years $14
☐ Servicemen's Rate $4 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage—$1 a year extra

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed. ☐ Bill me.

NAME _____

STREET _____

CITY _____ ZONE _____ STATE _____

2-1-47

There seems to have been in Lardner some internal check which would not let him progress too far above the level of the sideswipe mimic, a level on which his victims might have appreciated him—as in fact many of them did. Intensely serious though he was, Lardner's attitude toward serious writing is constantly betrayed as ambiguous—which is why a much inferior writer, Sherwood Anderson, never so sharp or true as Lardner, stumbled to an instinctive grasp of the human dilemmas that Lardner seldom reached. Only in a few pieces, such as his greatest story, "Haircut," is there the density of atmosphere and delicately implied reserve of emotion which can legitimately be expected in first-rate writing.

What was this internal check: his need to be accepted by large groups of readers, his so American fear of being labeled highbrow, his sense of self-doubt and self-castigation, or a social intelligence unequal to his eyes and ears? On each level of his work there is a failure to develop, to move beyond ready competence and ready satire. Several times he made the leap from one level to another, but the very fact of these disconnected and conflicting levels is a source of the uneasy and irritating limitations of his work.

For eventually irony became a rut. The sharpest ears, the keenest eyes remained—the sharpest ears, the keenest eyes. Lardner refined his accomplishment a little more; he crucified a few more Yahoos and even bled a little himself from the stab of the nails he drove. But the always-awaited transition to tragic scope, to a full grasp of life—so tantalizing because it seems always so near in his best work—is never quite negotiated. Lardner's irony became fixed, a hardened attitude, at times even a blinder and an earstop.

Lardner, then, is a peculiar ironic instance of the central problem of American literature—the inability of its talents to reach fulfillment. Few of our writers had a greater native endowment, and few reached the peaks that Lardner did in a few pieces. Yet the gap between potentiality and accomplishment is especially glaring in Lardner precisely because of the magnitude of his talent. He was not able to face the ultimate consequences of being a writer, a dedicated creator transforming his perceptions into enduring structures of the imagination. How much we thereby lost we shall never know, but surely it must have been a great deal. IRVING HOWE

The Dark Side of the South

SOUTHERN EXPOSURE. By Stetson Kennedy. Doubleday and Company. $3.

WITH the revived KKK and the activities of Columbians, Inc., so much in the news, Stetson Kennedy's new book could not have been published at a more opportune time. There seem to be two schools of thought among those unfairly abused individuals known as "Southern liberals"—those who recognize the ills of the South but insist on discussing them within the framework of the mores of the region, and those who like Mr. Kennedy prefer to let the chips fall where they may. On no question are these two groups more sharply divided than on that of whether intervention, in the broadest sense of the word, by non-Southerners in the affairs of the South is to be desired. Recently that courageous Southern liberal Hodding Carter told the readers of the Saturday Evening Post, in a familiar phrase, that "intervention is likely to do more harm than good." What distinguishes Stetson Kennedy's book from other recent books about the South by Southern liberals is that he has broken entirely with this time-honored myth. From his point of view, the "slavocracy of the South" must be uprooted, or in its fight for survival it may involve the entire nation in its machinations to preserve a scheme of racial dominance.

Both historical and contemporary experience confirms this point of view. Was it "intervention" for Northern individuals and organizations to interest themselves in the recent Bilbo hearings in New Orleans? If so, then the fruits of this interest have amply justified whatever risks were involved. While the material which Mr. Kennedy has so carefully collected is not as well organized as might have been desired, this shortcoming is more than offset by the passion and conviction with which he marshals facts to serve a social purpose. One section of the book is of particular value—that in which Mr. Kennedy traces the history, background, and shifting personnel of the South's racist "front" organizations.

It is only in the next to final chapter that Kennedy's liberalism begins to falter. There he argues that the Southern Negro must be emancipated socially. As part of this thesis he contends that it is foolish to argue that segregation violates the Fourteenth Amendment. Actually, there is abundant reason to believe that such decisions as Plessy vs. Ferguson, upholding the constitutionality of a segregation statute, are based upon a deliberately perverse construction of the history, meaning, and purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment and that these cases will be reversed. It is to be doubted, furthermore, that the Southern Negro can be emancipated economically and politically unless a frontal attack is made at the same time on the whole structure of Jim Crow segregation. Despite this minor weakness "Southern Exposure" is must reading for all who wish to understand the revolution that impends in the South.

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

Reports from Everywhere

RECONQUEST: ITS RESULTS AND RESPONSIBILITIES. By Hallett Abend. Doubleday and Company. $2.75.

SPHERES OF INFLUENCE. By Sydney Morrell. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $3.50.

THERE used to be a time when studies of spheres of influence and treatises on "reconquest" and its implications were solely for the professional political scientist. But history today is running too fast for the historians; the field is wide open for the newspaper boys. The reporter-turned-analyst is today a fast-selling item on the publishers' shelves. And one may not categorically say Caveat emptor; after all, most of them were on the spot, and they at least provide a modicum of information which contributes to our understanding of what goes on behind the heavy curtain which overhangs most of the world today.

Hallett Abend's book is a case in point. A top Far East correspondent for the New York Times for many years, he was one of a party of journalists on a War Department junket to Europe and the Orient during the summer of 1945. On one level his book is a froth of personal impressions, descriptions of army accomplishments—like the superb war-time job of the Army Transport Command in flying supplies and personnel over the Himalayas—and bits of commentary on the various trouble spots visited by the group. Here Abend shows a sense of humor and an easy style that make for good reading. On the other level—the interpretative one—the results are not so happy. An over-long synoptic history of Japan, although it correctly interprets that country's overweening ambition and double-dealing, is painfully dull. There is, finally, a vitriolic attack on Yalta as a secret, iniquitous pact among Stalin, Churchill, and Roosevelt to sell out the Atlantic Charter, the Four Freedoms, and so on. According to the author, our Chinese ally and the millions in Burma, Malaya, the Dutch East Indies, and Indo-China, not to say countless Europeans, have been betrayed as part of a bribe to Stalin to enter the war against Japan and to join the United Nations. Except for the chapter on Yalta and a plea for a hard peace with Japan and Germany there is little in the book to justify its rather pretentious title. "My Sixty Days in a C-54" might have been more appropriate.

Mr. Morrell's book examines the psychological aspects of power politics in four European countries—Iran, Italy, Yugoslavia, and Greece. The author is interested primarily in attitudes rather than events—the attitudes of the peoples of these four countries as they emerge from the war, in interplay with the attitudes of the Big Three. He traces virtually the same pattern for each country. Russia is on the offensive, with a coordinated plan. This leads it secretly to encourage the terroristic cliques which infiltrate into all phases of national life, by fair means or foul, but always under color of the democratic ideal; once they gain power, as in Yugoslavia, "democracy" becomes but a façade for totalitarian rule. England plays a defensive game in which it gives material and psychological support to all elements that oppose the dynamic Russian sweep. As for the United States, as usual we are vacillating and unsure of our policy; consequently we shift, hedge, and generally confound the other two with our confusions.

This book is a violent attack on the motives and conduct of the Soviet Union. Despite the obvious animus of the author, the charges which he makes are very serious. We have too little information about Iran and Yugoslavia to check their validity, and Italy was until recently under a severe military censorship. Greece, however, has had the benefit of long visits by observers with a reputation for competence and political maturity, among them Leland Stowe, Frank Gervasi, and the Mowbrays. If what Mr. Morrell says is true about the E. L. A. S. and the E. L. A. M. being no better than a gang of Communist cutthroats, if the left-wing movement in Greece places "importance on advertising slogans rather than upon ideals," if Soviet interest in Greece stems only from a desire for imperialist expansion, then one can credit similar charges about the other three countries discussed. But the reports by others do not square with the author's appraisal of the Greek situation. This reviewer's vote on the merits of Mr. Morrell's interpretations is an unequivocal "Nay."

HARVEY BRESLER

Films

JAMES
AGEE

NON-POLITICAL" or essentially "humanistic" movie artists have made many unbeatable comedies and quite a few good dramas; but with exceptions so rare I can scarcely think of them, the only movies whose temper could possibly be described as heroic, or tragic, or both, have been made by leftists. This fact agrees neither with my wishes nor with my deepest convictions as to the source of great tragic art, nor am I persuaded of any merely "historical" explanation of it; but I do think it needs to be remembered, and questioned at length, as I cannot question it here, by those who like myself trust only the individualist in art, and who tend automatically to dismiss all political and propagandist art.

The latest example of what I mean by a great leftist film, and one of the finest, is André Malraux's "Man's Hope," which was made during the last days of the Spanish civil war and is only now released in this country. It is clear that this film is not going to lack for an audience, if probably a small one; but I suspect that its appeal will be chiefly political, and that even those among this political audience who are particularly interested in films will overlook, or undervalue, some of its most important qualities as a film.

I will accordingly by-pass a good deal that is the heart and soul of the movie—that it is, including and far beyond its political intensity, one of the few wonderful film records of men in courage and sorrow—as so clear and so compelling that it needs no detailed comment. I prefer to use this space to defend things about the film that I have heard talked of as weaknesses and imperfections.

I will not worry about, or argue with, those who may regret the use of amateurs as actors. So far as I am concerned, the film merely emphasizes, even more sharply than most of its kind, the superiority of amateurs over professionals for a large and crucially hopeful part of achievement and possibility in films. The people in this film—Spaniards and members of the International Brigade—do and are things, over and over again, which are beyond acting and utterly different from it; and the one considerable piece of acting that is required—a peasant's face as, in avalanching despair, he tries to locate a Fascist flying field from the unfamiliar perspective of a Loyalist bomber—is as inspired a blending of reality with imagination as I remember to have seen. Of course it adds immeasurably to the force, poignancy and realness of these players that the were not merely amateurs but also fighters, in the last ditch of a lost war whose "reenactments" here were hardly that, pinched as they were into spare moments between actual work and actual war.

The early scenes, of staff conference and small interlocking missions, are fitful, nervous, ragged in pace and series and apparent aim; compared with more traditional films they seem repetitive and undramatic. But they seem to me an original and important achievement. Barring a few literary touches they go dead against every one of the graces of art, including the good ones; and instead of those graces they achieve scrawny kinds of pace, immediacy, and personal detail which I have never before seen art attain. In their over-all shape and linkage, moreover, even in their near-repetitiveness, these scenes communicate with sharp success the lost, near-blind, yet intensely alive and responsible experience of men as individuals and, at the same time, the desperate interdependence of their efforts. They are also filled, in fantastic paradox to all that is hostile to liberty in left-wing politics, with that strange nascent-oxygen vitality, the very quintessence of liberty, which so far as I can make out is an ambience peculiar to dedicated revolutionists.

It is in these scenes, moreover, that Malraux does his most interesting things with "excess of energy" and with his sound-track. By excess of energy I mean his interest—which he may have learned from Eisenstein—in letting things and movements into his frame which have nothing to do with the central action or which enhance it only queerly and surprisingly—a guerrilla's sudden skipping change in step and his sudden hand to his sweating neck; or a dog wandering in from one corner of a street scene while a ball maunders in from another—little things which brilliantly lock men and their efforts and feelings into the exact real place and time of day. Some of these devices remain "studies"—the work merely of a highly gifted beginner in films—in a not wholly satisfying way; but generically I believe in them and in the few people who use them rather than trying their best to keep their

The rebels, radicals and reformers who were our frontiersmen of freedom

Critics & Crusaders

A CENTURY OF AMERICAN PROTEST

By CHARLES A. MADISON

● A stimulating book about the "rebels" in American history—Garrison, Margaret Fuller, Debs, Henry George, Altgeld, Randolph Bourne, Steffens, and many others. Here are their stories, and the stories of their "crusades"—Abolition, Utopia, Liberalism, Radicalism, etc.—presented in absorbing detail. $3.50

AT ALL BOOKSTORES

HOLT
RINEHART & COMPANY

Announcing A NOTABLE SCREEN PRODUCTION OF THE PROVOCATIVE NOVEL BY GUY DE MAUPASSANT

LOEW-LEWIN, Inc., presents Guy de Maupassant's

THE Private AFFAIRS OF BEL AMI

Hollywood said that this brilliant characterization of a scoundrel was too sensational to be filmed... but David L. Loew and Albert Lewin have met and conquered the delicate problems of its unconventional story. They now bring to the screen the daring narrative which for years has delighted lovers of the world's finest romantic literature.

In his adaptation and direction, Albert Lewin adds another signal achievement to the screen successes which he has made of literary masterpieces — such pictures as Somerset Maugham's "The Moon and Sixpence" and Oscar Wilde's "The Picture of Dorian Gray"—pictures also said by Hollywood to present "unconquerable problems."

Produced by David L. Loew, "The Private Affairs of Bel Ami" presents distinguished performances by one of the most talented casts ever assembled in Hollywood. The stars are GEORGE SANDERS, ANGELA LANSBURY and ANN DVORAK, with Frances Dee, John Carradine, Susan Douglas, Hugo Haas, Marie Wilson, Albert Basserman, Katherine Emery, Richard Fraser and Warren William. Released thru United Artists.

WATCH FOR OPENING DATE AT YOUR LOCAL THEATRE!

films tidily to one nicely shaped and euphonious event at a time. Malraux's sound-track is more successful: blendings and counterpointings, along an echoing street, of the bawling of cattle and a rooster's shout, against the metal, vindictive language of modern war's stupendous guitar.

A little later Malraux dares, as few others would, so to extend a night drive through deep country in search of the automobiles needed to headlight the bombers' night take-off that for once the hypnosis, exhaustion, sadness, and beauty of such a task, and the passage of hours, are utterly communicated, not just comfortably suggested. I may as well mention here as anywhere else the remarkable thoughtfulness and beauty of form in this picture: the jagged, scratchy, miscellaneous scenes of exposition, almost an orchestra's tuning-up, first swept up and bound into a sheaf by the poring motion of this night drive—catapulting the film into the air and its wildest action—which in turn drains down a mountainside in one of the most ambitious codas ever designed in a film. It is a commonplace that movie and musical form are closely related, but films which show any creative reverence for the relationship are not so common.

Malraux's climax—the Loyalists' attempt to bomb a flying field and a bridge against impossible odds, and their dependence on the eyes of a peasant who has never been off the ground before—is more clearly within movie dramatic tradition. I need say of it only that it is so powerful in emotion and meaning, and so beautifully done, that as pure accomplishment it excels every other excellence in the film, and stands with the few great classical passages which have been achieved, in films, through the perfect identification of melodramatic suspense with meanings which are normally far above the proper use of melodrama.

Once the Loyalist fliers have crashed, Malraux begins his closing movement: the slow and painful bringing down of the dead and wounded from mountaintop to valley, assisted and attended by more and more peasants. I am not sure that this sequence is wholly successful; I am sure only that I was so deeply moved by all I saw, and by Malraux's confidence in the grandeur of the interlocked fact and symbol, and by his determination to build this wonderful symbol through a virtually endless series of near-repetitions into a colossal dirge for heroes, that for me it towered above most successes, and most attempts, that I have ever seen in films. A man of poetic genius, say an Eisenstein, would, I am sure, have adorned his central meaning with many and brilliant smaller symbolic perceptions; and this, I suppose, would have been even better. But I revere the way Malraux has done it as much for its nakedness as for its nobility.

Last week, speaking of "Henry V," I said that I prefer to see great poetry attempted on the screen from scratch. "Man's Hope" is a glorious example of what I mean. The heartsick peasant in the disastrous plane is great movie poetry. The descent of the broken heroes from the desperate stone crown of Spain, as from a Cross, to the maternal valley, a movement so conceived that a whole people and a whole terrain become one sorrowing and triumphal Pietà for twentieth-century man, falls possibly short of its full imaginable magnificence, considered syllable by syllable; but in its mass it is poetry even greater. Homer might know it, I think, for the one work of our time which was wholly sympathetic to him.

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

JEAN DUBUFFET, the new French painter so much discussed in Paris—a small sample of whose art provoked this writer to two successive pieces last June—is now the subject of a one-man show at Matisse's (through February 1) containing twenty-two oils. Among them are three pictures painted in 1943, six in 1944, six in 1945, and seven in 1946.

Inevitably Dubuffet will be called a "primitivist," or "primitivistic," or even, by some of the more habitually unqualified critics, a "primitive." He has, indeed, gone to sidewalk graffiti and children's art for a considerable amount of plastic inspiration; he has reduced his drawing to the rudimentary linear schematizations by which children and untutored or ungifted adults reproduce nature; and he has, in his horizontal pictures, made design a matter of sectioning off the rectangle into smaller rectangles with straight up-and-down and all-the-way-across lines—as Klee did, and as his followers and the gifted but incomplete Adolph Gottlieb (at the Kootz Gallery through February 1) and Torres-Garcia and many others still do. But this is something that comes from impressionism and Cézanne and cubism even more than from primitive and children's art. Like so much of modern art it is a kind of geometry impelled by the need, conscious or unconscious, to remind ourselves of, and repeat, an acknowledgment of the physical limitations of the medium, among which is the shape usually rectangular, of the picture space. Dubuffet is obviously, as every fleck of paint on his canvases shows, an erudit painter, and no more a primitive than Klee. Like the latter, whose influence he is one of the few Frenchmen to feel, he paints the primitive and the childlike at a remove, portraying it, so to speak, from the heights of culture and as a state of mind, not a way of art.

In his earlier paintings, those of 1942 and 1944, Dubuffet tries to find an equivalent in color for the "primitivist" reduction to which he subjects his drawing. These pictures are in flat, thin, high-unmodulated tones. But they do not work, they falsify the artist's sensibility and experience; this elementary spectrum is not sincere; and none of the pictures of this period are truly successful. In contrast to the directness and richness obtained by Matisse and Miró when they take lessons in chromatism from barbaric or children's art, the result is impoverished, giving us to suspect frustrated talent at the most.

The tonality of Dubuffet's 1945 and 1946 pictures is a radical departure. There is a sudden scaling down to blacks, browns, grays, and dirty whites with pinkish, lavender, or bluish overtones running in and out like glazes. The pigment is mixed with tar, asphalt or gravel and laid on thickly, roughly and, apparently, with plenty of varnish. The drawing remains more or less the same in principle, but now the lines are scored or scratched into the paint as if with a stick. The result is, on the whole original and profound. The large "Vue de Paris," with its flat, cubed surface is a major picture, not so much in its conception, which echoes Klee, Dufy and Utrillo, as in the "artistry" of its rendering—"artistry" being the only word I can find for the subtlety and instinct with which Dubuffet maintains every part of the surface flush with the canvas and exactly inside the frame. This painting is proof, if it is still needed, of how completely Dubuffet has assimilated all that the School of Paris has had to teach since 1908.

The almost outright abstract and somewhat smaller "Grand Paysage," also f 1946, is a more original but less spectacular and immediately successful work than "Vue de Paris," and bears resemblance at points to a sort of thing many painters over here have been trying to do with Klee's heritage: even, over-all treatment, scratches in bark, lines, graffiti scraped into limestone. But where the Americans mean mysticism, Dubuffet means matter, material, sensation, the all too empirical and immediate world—and the refusal to be taken in by anything coming from outside it. Dubuffet's monochrome means a state of mind, not a secret insight into the absolute; his positivism accounts for the superior largeness of his art.

"Black Beauty," "Moulesse de café," and "L'Homme à la cravatte rouge," and perhaps "Minerve," all of 1945 and monochromatic, are also strong paintings, if not equal to the above two. As happens, none of these, including the two above, have the concentration and quiet intensity of the 1945 "Promeneuse Parapluie," which is missing from the show, although exhibited at the same gallery last June. Three or four more pictures on the level of "Promeneuse" would suffice almost of themselves to make Dubuffet one of the major painters of the twentieth century. In fact, even though his art still suffers under the limitation of being too essentially personal—which is a limitation it shares with Klee's. Where Picasso, Matisse, and even Mondrian speak for a whole age, Dubuffet still speaks for but a single mood inside a single period of that age.

Jackson Pollock's fourth one-man show in so many years at Art of This Century (through February 7) is his best yet. It is his first one and signals what may be a major step in his development—what I regard as the most important so far of the younger generation of American painters. He has now largely abandoned his customary heavy black-and-white or gun-metal chiaroscuro for the higher scales, for alizarins, magentas, cerulean blues, pinks, and purples. Like Dubuffet, however, Pollock's art goes in a similar if less abstract direction. Pollock remains essentially a draftsman in black and white, and must as a rule rely on these colors to maintain the consistency and power of the surface of his pictures. As is the case with almost all post-cubist painting of this kind, if it is the tension inherent in the constructed, re-created surface of the surface that produces the strength of his art.

This was not an accident

PM's Appeal Gets $210,000. Saves Hospital

This ought to be called "How a Little Newspaper Saved a Big Hospital," the newspaper being New York's PM and the hospital Sydenham, the country's only interracial voluntary hospital.

Faced with the alternative of raising $300,000 or closing down, Sydenham, which serves the 500,000 people of Harlem, appealed to the PM for help, and PM picked up the ball.

Between Thanksgiving Day, when the first story about Sydenham appeared in PM, and New Year's Day, 10,000 letters all containing money ranging from crumpled dollar bills to checks up to $1,000, many letters, while signed by individuals, stated that the attached checks represented two to fifty persons.

As for money, PM's readers dug down for about $210,000 of the $275,000 raised by the first of the year, and the balance of the contributions was directly attributable to PM's appeal.

What's particularly unusual about the story is that PM went direct appeal to its readers—no gimmicks, no parties, no luncheons, no rallies with big names. Sydenham is in Harlem, and its staff of Negro and white physicians, nurses, technicians and general employer ministers to patients of all races and creeds. The slogan is: Pain knows no color.

Three days before Thanksgiving, Sydenham's future seemed bleak. It had been struggling along under a $300,000 deficit, left in great part as an inheritance from the previous administration before it became an interracial hospital. It looked like the jig was up. The ambulance service was to be closed down, and next to go were to be part of the wards, the clinics and the emergency service.

In desperation, Director David M. Dorin called up PM Reporter Gene DePoris and put his cards on the table. He said the Sydenham would be finished unless the hospital could get some money—but quickly. DePoris discussed Sydenham's plight with PM Editor John P. Lewis, who decided to open up with both barrels to get the hospital over the hump....

EDITOR & PUBLISHER
JAN. 4 '47

Any newspaper should be proud of such reader response. It is tangible proof of reader loyalty—and it is easily explained.

PM readers know that PM wants to get and does get the stories behind the headlines—and presents those stories as only a liberal and progressive newspaper can. PM readers also know a good cause and an honest appeal when they see one. That is why they came through so generously. But as any reader will tell you, PM features more than the news that is most important—every day. It supplements that news with background and related information which makes the issues and forces crystal clear. The commentators who do this job are men of wide experience and national reputation. They include:

MAX LERNER—educator, radio commentator, author, and chief editorial writer.

JENNINGS PERRY—Tennessee newsman who resigned his editorial writing post rather than attack Henry Wallace in violation of his own beliefs.

ALBERT DEUTSCH—whose reporting on veterans affairs, the care of our mentally ill, and other public welfare subjects has won many citations.

I. F. STONE—whose stories of his perilous journey with refugees from Central Europe to Palestine attracted world-wide attention.

BILLY ROSE—Broadway impresario, producer, showman, restaurateur and cracker-barrel philosopher.

FRANK SULLIVAN—New York World Alumnus whose humorous sidelights on the passing scene delight PM's Sunday readers.

F. H. LAGUARDIA—former mayor of New York and UNRRA's last director general who writes Sundays as he chooses—of New York, national politics or world affairs.

Under the direction of Editor John P. Lewis, PM will, in '47 do as good a job as it did in '46. If you haven't already found out just how good that can be—buy PM at your newsstand or fill in and mail the order blank below, today.

(TEAR OUT HERE)

I wish to subscribe to PM.

(CHECK CHOICE)

No.

Daily and Sunday	6 months	$8.25 ☐	12 weeks	$4.20 ☐
Daily only (5 issues)	6 months	6.00 ☐	12 weeks	3.00 ☐
Sunday only (PM's Weekly)	6 months	2.50 ☐	12 weeks	1.25 ☐

I am enclosing a check or money order.

Name.....
Street.....
City..... Zone..... State.....

(Mail to PM, Box 81, Times Square Station, New York 18, N. Y.)

MOTION PICTURES

MANHATTAN

ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
80th ST.
59th ST.
near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENCY
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

ECHO

CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE
HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

WESTCHESTER

MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

BROOKLYN

BUSHWICK
DYKER GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island

QUEENS

ALDEN
Jamaica
MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

MANHATTAN

COLONIAL
B'way & 62 St.

RKO

NOW

ERROL

ELEANOR

FLYNN • PARKER

'Never Say Goodbye'

- AND -

'THE BEAST with FIVE FINGERS'

Starring ROBERT ALDA

Andrea KING

Peter LORRE

"ON THE BEAM . . . DELIGHTFUL."—PM.

JEANNE CRAIN

LYNN BARI • ALAN YOUNG

'Margie'

IN TECHNICOLOR

Based on Stories by Ruth McKenny & Richard Bransten

- AND -

'DICK TRACY vs. CUEBALL'

MORGAN CONWAY

ANNE JEFFREYS

Loretta YOUNG • David NIVEN

In HAL WALLIS' Production

'The Perfect Marriage'

Directed by LEWIS ALLEN

A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

- IN PERSON -

THE MILLS BROTHERS

OLGA SAN JUAN • TIM HERBERT

EXTRA ADDED ATTRACTION

ELLIOT LAWRENCE

AND HIS ORCHESTRA

NOW
TIMES SQUARE

PARAMOUNT

Midnight
Feature
Nightly

Classified Advertising Rates

SEVENTY-FOUR CENTS A LINE (6 WORDS)

MINIMUM THREE LINES

Classified Display $7.39 per Inch

Attractive discounts for multiple insertions

THE NATION

20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

BARclay 7-1066

STAGE PLAYS

RICHARD ROGERS & OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN, 2nd, present
"IRRESISTIBLE HUMOR."—Barnes, Herald Tribune.

HELEN HAYES

- in -

"HAPPY BIRTHDAY"

A New Comedy by ANITA LOOS • Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN

44th St. West of Broadway. Evenings 8:30

BROADHURST Thea., Matinees: Wednesday and Saturday 2:30

"JUBILANT AND JOYFUL."—Brown, Saturday Review of Literature

ETHEL MERMAN

IN THE MUSICAL SMASH

"ANNIE GET YOUR GUN!"

Music & Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN • Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELD with RAY MIDDLETON • 45th St. West of Broadway. Evenings at 8:30

IMPERIAL Theatre Matinees: Wednesday and Saturday at 2:30

MELVYN DOUGLAS & HERMAN LEVIN present

"CALL ME MISTER"

THE NATION'S TOP MUSICAL REVUE

Songs by Harold Rome • Sketches by Arnold Auerbach • Staged by Robert Gordon

New York—NATIONAL Thea.—with Jane KEAN
Boston—SHUBERT Thea.—with Betty KEAN

"BROADWAY'S BIGGEST REVUE HIT"—Life Magazine

"A smash hit of enormous proportions." —
Ward More-
house, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way. OH 4-4261
Evenings 8:30. Matinees Wednesday & Saturday 2:40.

"RATTLING GOOD THEATRE."—Atkinson, Times

JOSE FERRER IN
CYRANO de BERGERAC

FRANCES REID • RALPH CLANTON • HIRAM SHERMAN

PAULA LAURENCE • FRANCES COMPTON

ERNEST GRAVES • WILLIAM WOODSON
BARRYMORE THEA. 47th Street West of Broadway. CI 6-0399
Eves., Incl. Sun., 8:30. Mats. Sat. & Sun., 2:30

Buy Your Books through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price post-free if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D. No C. O. D.'s outside of United States. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible. Make checks payable to The Nation.

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION

THE NATION

20 VESEY STREET

NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

Pollock, again like Dubuffet, tends to handle his canvas with an over-all evenness; but at this moment he seems capable of more variety than the French artist, and able to work with riskier elements—silhouettes and invented ornamental motifs—which he integrates in the plane surface with astounding force. Dubuffet's sophistication enables him to "package" his canvases more skillfully and pleasingly and achieve greater instantaneous unity, but Pollock, I feel, has more to say in the end and is, fundamentally, and almost because he lacks equal charm, the more original. Pollock has gone beyond the stage where he needs to make his poetry explicit in ideographs. What he invents instead has perhaps, in its very abstractness and absence of assignable definition, a more reverberating meaning. He is merican and rougher and more brutal, but he is also completer. In any case he is certainly less conservative, less of an self-painter in the traditional sense than Dubuffet, whose most important historical achievement may be in the end to have preserved the easel picture for the post-Picasso generation of painters. Pollock points a way beyond the easel, beyond the mobile, framed picture, to the mural, perhaps—or perhaps not. I cannot tell.

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

ONE of the great events of the year is Victor's release of the recording (Set 1080; $4.85) of Mozart's Symphony K. 551 (known as the "Jupiter") made by Toscanini with the N. C. Symphony. The performance gives the work with all its majesty and rance, and with the unusual feature of the second movement played Andante mentoso instead of the usual Adagio. And it is reproduced with clarity, spaciousness, and brilliance. But my review copy has a generous share of this month's amazingly blemished records, including two sides with especially noisy surfaces that make the second movement, with its muted violins, difficult to hear.

For those who hear not by names but by their own ears the early little Mozart Symphony K. 184 that Koussevitzky has recorded with the Boston Symphony (11-9363; $1) is largely the conventional flourishes and bustle of the inconsequential fast movements, with an interlude of Mozartian cantilena liness. It is a work that requires no more than Koussevitzky brings to the performance of Mozart; the orchestra plays well; and the recorded sound is rich, but a little coarse from the excessive reverberation.

I have been at a loss to understand the to-do about Monteux in recent years—and I am not referring to the extravagances of Virgil Thomson, most of whose judgments of French conductors, quartets, violinists, and pianists are among those which seem to be concerned with experiences in some private world of fantasy unrelated to the realities the rest of us hear. I am referring to the general line, which has been that recognition has come belatedly to one of the giants, and which I say is nonsense. I am fully aware of Monteux's competence as conductor and musician, but also of its limitations. At a concert a couple of seasons ago I heard the Philadelphia Orchestra play very beautifully, but only as it would in any case, not with any special qualities of sound and style that could be attributed to Monteux; and the details of tempo and phrasing that could be attributed to him in the performance of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony made it a very unsatisfactory performance indeed.

On records the San Francisco Symphony is clearly a well-disciplined and fine-sounding orchestra, with which Monteux gives some good performances of French works. But if one could not be certain that the occasional faulty balances in Debussy's "Rondes de printemps" were his doing rather than the recording engineer's, there can be no doubt of his responsibility for what happens in the newly issued performance of Brahms's Second Symphony (Set 1065; $4.85). At several points, as the performance proceeded, I thought I heard something sound strangely different from the way I remembered; but it was not until the third or fourth time, and when the difference struck me with special force, that I stopped the record and began to investigate. The passage was a phrase near the end of the beautiful Tranquillo episode in the development section of the finale, beginning in the sixth measure before the return of the opening theme of the movement: over string tremolos the flute, clarinet, trombone, and bass tuba in unison play D, A, B flat, F; but as far as I could tell—by repeatedly playing the record at that point and checking with the score at the piano—the trombone in the recorded performance went from B flat up to C while the other that is characteristic in its poignant love-instruments went down to F. More than once I have seen Toscanini stop an orchestra in the midst of a terrific uproar (for example in Shostakovich's Seventh) and ask a contrabassoon or some such instrument to play what he had just played, and then point out that the G flat should be G natural; and Stokowski, from what I have heard, is capable of the same thing. But here, on the other hand, is a false note that leaps out at one from a slow, quiet, lightly scored, open-textured phrase; and Monteux seems not to have heard it when it happened and when he played the test record.

In his performance of the work Monteux reveals a lack of the necessary sense for the proper relation of tempos. Thus his pace for the cello theme in the first movement is disproportionately slow for the pace of the movement up to that point. And in the third movement, in which Brahms carefully establishes related tempos for the sections to achieve continuity of the basic pulse throughout, Monteux's mishandling of these tempos destroys the continuity of pulse and make the Allegretto grazioso slower the second time than the first. (Brahms directs that the time-value of the quarter-note in the three-quarter measure of the Allegretto be maintained as the time-value of the entire two-quarter measure of the Presto, so that groups of three such Presto measures, at its conclusion, lead back into Allegretto three-quarter measures that are in exactly the same tempo as the first time. But Monteux makes the Presto measures slower than the quarters of the Allegretto, so that the groups of three Presto measures lead back into Allegretto three-quarter measures that are also slower.) There are also incorrect relations of dynamics—e. g., the excessive loudness of the brass just before the cello theme in the first movement—and occasional faulty balances, all of which may be produced by the recording. The sound

THE JOHANNES STEEL REPORT ON WORLD AFFAIRS

Subscription $5.00 a year

Send remittance to JOHANNES STEEL
P. O. Box 878, Grand Central Station
New York 17, N. Y.

Crossword Puzzle No. 197

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Makes admissions to the man in the street (5 and 4)
- 6 Bare the head
- 9 Wide, but not wide-eyed
- 10 Educe (4 and 3)
- 11 This punch might make you feel groggy
- 12 The gold-digger's profession
- 13 Make a hit, but cause no sensation
- 15 Boniface (4 and 4)
- 16 The amount a volt can send through an ohm
- 18 Floating in water gives Nat a tan
- 20 Bifurcated feminine apparel
- 23 The one who succeeds
- 24 Humpty-Dumpty's last seat
- 25 "... like the countryman who looked for his --- while he was mounted on his back"
- 28 As a result of a counter-attack
- 29 A letter
- 30 This kingdom in turn averted famine in the East
- 31 Is it not observable with the naked eye?

DOWN

- 1 You are in for it
- 2 "Alas, the love -- ----! it is known To be -- lovely and a fearful thing" (2 and 5)
- 3 Celebrating a victory over an insect
- 4 He must always have a manual before him when he plays

- 5 Means of correction frequently put to the proof (3 and 3)
- 6 The two-toed sloth, you know
- 7 Humorous ejaculation which seems to offer the choice of two letters or three
- 8 Father needs heaps of help at golf
- 14 A person who suffers from this might well work for a reduced figure
- 15 The rising sun cast its shadow early over this
- 17 What would a lackey be about to get this? Brawling, perhaps (5 and 3)
- 19 Isolde instructed her handmaid to prepare a poisonous draught for him
- 21 Springy result of mixing ice and salt
- 22 They make firm representations
- 26 Petrified steel
- 27 Pass over lightly

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 196

ACROSS:—1 SOBSTUFF; 5 CHAIRS; 10 A LA MODE; 11 ALGERIA; 12 TASTE; 13 COLLEAGUE; 14 RECUT; 16 SNOWBALL; 19 MADRIGAL; 22 RURAL; 24 OBLIVIOUS; 26 ILIUM; 28 ESTATES; 29 CHARIOT; 30 SENILE; 31 BREECHES.

DOWN:—1 STAR TURN; 2 BEARS; 3 TWO-SHATER; 4 FLEECE; 5 HAGUE; 7 IRREGULAR; 8 SPARES; 9 HALLOO; 15 CHARLATAN; 17 BARRICADE; 18 CLEMATIS; 20 GROUSE; 21 LAST CAR; 23 POKERS; 25 VITAL; 27 IRISH.

of the performance on the records is fine, but with some automatic leveling off and limiting of volume and brilliance at climaxes.

Beecham goes through the first movement of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony (Set 1081; $4.85) as though he were not conducting the London Philharmonic Orchestra but driving a bulldozer; and the effect is not improved by recording which makes the sound heavy and muffled with an enormous amount of bass and almost no treble. He relaxes for the other movements and plays them very beautifully; but their recorded sound is only slightly better balanced. More nearly—but not entirely—normal in balance is the recorded sound of his performances of the Waltz and Polonaise from Tchaikovsky's "Eugen Onegin" (11-9421; $1).

Two singles offer some Stokowski performances with the Hollywood Bowl Orchestra. On one (11-9418; $1) is "Forest Murmurs" from Wagner's "Siegfried," with the usual exaggerated retardations of pace and expansions of the sonorities that are well reproduced. On the other (11-9419; $1) are the popular Haydn Serenade from the Quartet Opus 3 No. 5, which Stokowski renames Eighteenth Century Dance after transcribing it to provide antiphona effects for solo woodwinds; and what he calls a Trumpet Prelude by Purcell, in which he has the trumpet phrases repeated by the violins—these performances also being excellently reproduced.

Drama Note

PROGRAMS still assume that spectators are more interested in the life history of the actress who carries a tray than they are in any information about the author of the play. I am therefore, only guessing that "Little A" (Henry Miller Theater) is the maiden effort of Wallis Clark. Half melodrama and half character study, it exhibits some real talent without completely succeeding, or avoiding entirely some disturbing echoes. There is a hint of Strindberg's "The Father" and there is more than a hint of "Craig's Wife" in the story of a man who finally turns against a domineering wife. Alternately too static and too violent, it jerks itself along toward a sensational finish that is neither uninteresting nor quite satisfactory. Otto Kruger is excellent in a part which seems more satisfactorily written than that assigned to Jessi Royce Landis.

J. W. K.

MAY 14

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 164

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 8, 1947

NUMBER 6

The Shape of Things

PALESTINE IS HARVESTING THE BITTER FRUIT of a policy of indecision and cowardice the blame for which, if resting primarily on the British government, must be shared by the government of the United States. The order to evacuate British civilians from Palestine occasioned by the recent kidnappings can only be interpreted as a signal to convert that tragic land into an active theater of war. The military will now attempt to repair the failure of the diplomats of London and Washington, and their efforts are doomed from the start. The Nation has stood firmly against terrorist tactics and warned that they would become the excuse for just such action as has now been decided upon. It now urges with equal insistence that the British government rescind its decision and not, in the words of the London Herald, "surrender to terror." If it is not too late, the condemned Irgun member should be granted a reprieve in consideration of his war services in the British forces or his case, even over his protest, be sent to the British council. Above all, the present crisis should be sufficient to stab the London and Washington negotiators awake to the necessity for an immediate and permanent plan for Palestine. If the solution is a partition that guarantees a "viable" Jewish state, then let the governments of Great Britain and the United States declare it and stand by their decision.

✱

THE DEBATE ON ATOMIC-ENERGY CONTROL resumes as the Atomic Energy Commission's report moves into the Security Council. Preliminary skirmishes suggest the stormy rough-and-tumble over principles and top-policy prerequisites that has from the beginning marked American-Russian exchanges. It can safely be predicted that as long as the one side insists on the abolition of the veto and the other on the priority of a convention outlawing atomic arms, no compromise will be arrived at. It is perhaps useful to recall that the focus of discussion is or ought to be a report which by the widest stretch of the imagination cannot be considered an adequate basis for a treaty or convention. The Atomic Energy Commission report is an interim report, as its own text emphasizes. A vast amount of work remains to be done: the "detailed powers, characteristics, and functions of the international control agency" will have to be defined with great exactitude. All this spells months of hard work for the commission. Why cannot the Security Council instruct the commission, which has proved its competence in the technical and scientific fields of the atomic problem, to get on with its job, and leave the disputed section of the current report to debate when all the facts are in?

✱

GEORGIA IS MORE NEWSWORTHY NOW THAN at any time since Sherman crashed through to the sea. With two governors in Atlanta, its finances half-frozen, and a legislature bent on making suffrage the affair of private "clubs," it presents a picture of democracy about to receive extreme unction. On the other hand, indignation meetings are reported throughout the state, the brassy legislative maneuver contains pleasant possibilities of boomeranging, the courts cast a long shadow over the path of the Pretender, and former governor Ellis Arnall is barnstorming the country preaching the tenets of democracy. At the moment, the most important of these developments is the passage of the white-primary bill by the state House of Representatives. The essence of the measure is to prevent federal interference in behalf of would-be Negro voters by the simple device of repealing all state controls over the primary, leaving it up to local Democratic clubs to make such regulations as they see fit. The theory is that the primary is purely a party affair, and the party can insist on lily-white exclusiveness where the state government cannot. But three rude contingencies tend to modify the rapture of the Talmadge legislators in perpetuating this bit of parliamentary larceny. First, the Georgia Supreme Court may throw out "Governor" Talmadge, and along with him all legislation carrying his signature. Second, the federal courts are likely to decide to hold Georgia to the spirit as well as the letter of the Fourteenth Amendment. And, third, if the courts do not so decide, Negroes might flock to receptive Republican "clubs" or eventually to a third party—with the result that Georgians might wake up some November morning to find that at last they really had a better electoral system than Poland or Yugoslavia.

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	141
Pulling Out of China?	143
Socialization in Germany	144

ARTICLES

The Labor Pains of Senator Taft by Wilbur H. Baldinger	145
Cancer Spot of Europe by Fritz Sternberg	146
China's Dark Destiny by Peggy Durdin	150
Letter from Paris by Michael Clark	152
Highballing with Kilowatts by Richard L. Neuberger	154
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	157
In One Ear by Lou Frankel	158

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Citizen and the Ideal by Louise Bogan	159
Typical Cartels by George Soule	160
Surrealism in Chile by René Blanc-Roos	160
Briefer Comment	161
Art by Clement Greenberg	164
Records by B. H. Haggin	165

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 166

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 198 by Jack Barrett	168
---	-----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor
J. King Gordon

Literary Editor
Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 813 Kelllogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

THE AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE BRITISH Labor government and the Burmese delegation, reached in the astonishingly short period of five weeks, is one of the most heartening of recent events. There is now no insuperable obstacle in the way of Burma's achievement of either dominion status or total independence. It does not diminish the Labor Party's credit to say that Britain has done no more than recognize a plain necessity. The Anti-Fascist People's Freedom League has also shown wisdom in resisting counsels of violence. That the majority nationalist party has chosen the peaceful way may be due to the fact that Burma, ravaged by two military campaigns, is in great need of immediate economic help. In converting the $300,000,000 loan, upon which Burmese reconstruction depends, into an outright grant and in promising further financial help during the interim period, London doubtless hopes to influence Burmese opinion. The negotiations were marked by frankness, vigor, and a realistic willingness to compromise upon all issues. The British yielded to U Aung San's demand that the April elections must return, not a mere legislative body, but a Constituent Assembly empowered to draw up a constitution; the Burmese made concessions on the problem of the hill tribes of the frontier regions, who, distinct in mode of life from the rest of the country and formerly an oppressed group, make up one-third of the population. The Anti-Fascist People's Freedom League, which has always objected to partition as proposed by the White Paper of 1945, has agreed that the constitution must safeguard the rights of the minority. Difficulties and dangers remain. Nevertheless, if the present wisdom continues to be shown, Burma has every chance of achieving its liberty during the British Labor Party's present term of office.

✱

REPRESENTATIVE WALTER ANDREWS OF NEW York, chairman of the House Committee on the Armed Services, appears to be painfully confused over his committee's place in the scheme of government. How else explain his almost idiotic directive to the committee staff? According to an Associated Press dispatch, these people, including high-salaried professional assistants, have been ordered by Mr. Andrews to dress just so, to avoid all fraternization with members of other committee staffs, and to remain standing when officers or members of Congress are present until given the command "At Ease." We can no more imagine a self-respecting civilian paying attention to such impertinence than we can picture Representative Helen Douglas shouting "At Ease" out of the corner of her mouth. But Mr. Andrews should be set straight all the same. His committee is a civilian watchdog, charged with keeping the military and naval services properly subjected to popular control, and not a low-echelon service command designed to cater to the brass and braid. If the gentleman from New York ants to play the old soldier, a uniform can surely be ug up for him and perhaps a garrison platoon in, say, Korea.

✱

DAVID STERN'S ACTION IN SELLING THE Philadelphia Record and his two Camden, New Jersey, papers rather than settle with the Newspaper Guild strikers seems to us like the gesture of a defeated dictator. Unable to attain absolute rule, he has sought to ruin his 1,675 employees and has succeeded in destroying his reputation as a liberal. In 1935 Mr. Stern, then publisher of the New York Post, signed one of the first "guild-shop" contracts and thus gave the young union a very welcome boost. But in recent years he has attempted to overcapitalize on this good deed and has become increasingly difficult to deal with. Now he has left Philadelphia with only one morning and two evening newspapers, while Camden has none at all. However, the Bulletin management has announced that efforts will be made to enable publication to be resumed under "independent ownership." The strikers' solidarity is unbroken; whoever buys the properties, they insist, will have to sign a contract before starting the presses.

✱

SIXTEEN MILLION TENANTS RECEIVED A last-minute reprieve on January 29 when the President, performing a hasty and undignified somersault, stopped the mimeographs which were grinding out a release authorizing a 10 per cent boost in rents. Mr. Truman's approval of this plan had been originally secured by his too clever confidant, Clark Clifford, and some top officials in the Office of Temporary Controls, who persuaded him that it would be smart politics to forestall a G. O. P. bill providing for a 15 per cent increase. Fortunately, the news leaked out, and frantic calls to the White House from labor leaders and democratic Congressmen induced the President to think again. Even politically this pandering to the real-estate lobby would have been folly; much better leave the responsibility of killing or revising rent controls to the Republicans. From the point of view of national economic welfare, a rent increase at this time could well prove disastrous. It would wipe out the much-advertised but actually very modest fall in the cost of living and would certainly strengthen demands for higher wages. Moreover, an OTC report just issued shows that landlords as a group are doing nicely with profits ranging from 25 to 43 per cent higher than before the war. As Senator Tobey, chairman of the House Banking and Currency Committee, has very properly stated in the course of hearings on the Republicans' rent-increase bill, the burden of proof is on them.

IN THE PASSING OF DAVID LOUIS PODELL The Nation has lost a valued counselor and loyal friend. In his distinguished career as an attorney he was habitually on the side of the people against the rude pressures of an industrial society. His firm belief that society was made for man and not man for society brought him into the group that gathered around Franklin D. Roosevelt to map out a program for America when the country was overwhelmed by economic crisis. When the war broke out, he was elected to head the small-business section of the Department of Justice. It is probable that the war burden he ungrudgingly carried in spite of failing health contributed to his too early death. He was identified with The Nation Associates from its beginning, and his wise counsel contributed greatly to the work of the organization. David Podell was a man whose liberalism was not something to be donned like a Sunday suit for a special occasion: it was part of the warp and woof of his life.

Pulling Out of China?

IN WITHDRAWING American troops from China General Marshall has taken the course that was logically implied by his report of January 7 on the breakdown of his year-long mediation effort. He has done wisely, for in no other way could the United States have been restored to a position of influence. But when the Secretary of State considers what program he will adopt for the future, it is to be hoped that he will draw more radical conclusions from his experiences than those contained in his report.

From the outset it was obvious that there could be no hope of success if the mediating power gave such aid to one of the contestants that the ratio of military force between them was seriously altered. That principle has been persistently flouted. Since V-J Day the United States has trained and equipped some forty divisions for the Kuomintang. Moreover, by transporting nearly half a million troops to strategic points the United States army and navy have served as effective allies of a militarist group which at least once during the negotiations declared its intentions of exterminating the other party. It is true that a part of this aid was given before January, 1946, when General Marshall began his peace effort. The greater part, however, was given during the negotiations of the Committee of Three. The result was extension of the civil war and repeated violations of political agreements. Inevitably, the Yen'an regime concluded that the American mediation effort was nothing but a mask for Western imperialism.

The refusal of the middle-class Democratic League to participate in the Constituent Assembly or to enter the coalition government is another indication of the extent to which Washington defeated General Marshall's purpose. To borrow General Marshall's words, "On the side of the government, which is in effect the Kuomintang Party, there is a dominant group of reactionaries who have been opposed . . . to almost every effort I have made to influence the formation of a genuine coalition government." Again in his words, the action of this group "has been devastating in its effect." Stronger terms have not been used by the Yen'an regime itself. In effect, the United States has strengthened an intolerable dictatorship and helped to prevent the rise of those very middle-of-the-way parties upon which, in the latter part of his report, the American mediator declared the salvation of China depends.

If the Secretary of State is to take full advantage of the liberty he has now given himself, the course he must follow is noonday clear. The Chinese reactionaries, Chiang included, have without doubt banked heavily on the outbreak of war between this country and Russia. In such a war they have seen their best chance not only to recover territories formerly controlled by China but to arrest social revolution and democratic reform alike. This pernicious notion must be dissipated.

Then, if the United States is truly resolved to give no more military aid to Chiang, this country can do much to bring a real coalition government into existence. The Communists at present refuse to enter the government until a return is made to the military situation of January, 1946, and the new constitution has been annulled. It is unlikely that these conditions will be met. But that does not mean that all-out civil war is inevitable, for neither party is strong enough for such a campaign without foreign aid. A compromise can therefore be reached. Although, on paper, the new constitution satisfies most of Yen'an's demands, it is certain that without powerful persuasion from General Marshall Chiang will not give substance to the promised reforms. But if the Kuomintang is made to understand that no help whatever will be given to China until the promised democracy becomes a reality, the result may well be a genuine coalition government. The inclusion of the Democratic League is vital, not only because it is the one minority group that promises to become a major party, but because fulfilment of its conditions for entry would satisfy nine-tenths of the demands of the Communists.

Will American policy permit General Marshall to deliver what amounts to an ultimatum to Chiang-Kai-Shek? Nothing less will undo the harm this country has done. Powerful interests, both military and political, will doubtless urge support of the mock coalition government now set up in China. To do so would be to sentence China to protracted civil war, with unforeseeable results. Secretary Marshall must bear in mind that not all the power of the United States can arrest a revolution so profound as that which is occurring in China.

Socialization in Germany

IN HIS article on page 146 Dr. Fritz Sternberg paints a somber picture of western Germany as a subsidized slum and sets forth a program of economic reforms urgently required if the Germans are to become self-supporting and to build a democratic state.

One particularly ugly element in the situation is the comfort enjoyed by the Nazis and their collaborators, which contrasts bitterly with the misery of the urban masses. A few Nazis, of course, have been punished, and others have been deprived of their jobs; but millions are free and still able to enjoy their ill-gotten gains. It is as Dr. Sternberg points out, essential both from the economic and the moral point of view that the privileged position of these men should be ended. That measure must be accompanied by the drastic reorganization of the whole economic and financial structure. Government debt, a burden which the weakened economy cannot support, must be canceled, and an entirely new currency created.

The most necessary step of all is the socialization of the major German industries, for as long as these remain in the hands of those who cooperated so ardently with Hitler, we shall not have a peaceful and democratic Germany. Unfortunately, there seems to be a major conflict between America and Britain on this question—a conflict which may prevent many of the hoped-for benefits of zonal unification from being realized. The British government has very definitely committed itself to a policy of public ownership, subject to international controls, of the heavy German industries, including coal, steel, chemicals, and engineering. Officially, the American occupation authorities are neither for nor against this program; the matter, they say, must be decided democratically by the German people themselves. However, this attitude does not preclude unofficial discouragement of any moves toward public ownership. For instance, the new Social Democratic chairman of the Bi-Zonal Economic Committee has been pointedly warned by General Clay that he will not be allowed to use his position to foster socialization plans.

These attitudes reflect not only the personal inclinations, and sometimes interests, of American officers in Germany but also pressure from big business at home. A note in the Journal of Commerce of January 29 reveals the line clearly. The United States, it pointed out, cannot oppose socialization abroad but has a legitimate interest in safeguarding American investors from confiscation. Since Germany could not indemnify American owners of property in a satisfactory way, that is, in dollars, nationalization would become in fact confiscation. Therefore it is argued, the State Department should officially discourage nationalization in any case where American investors are involved, which means the whole of heavy industry.

The American people, however, did not fight the war to rescue American business from ill-advised investments. It fought to overthrow Nazism and German militarism once and for all. This aim will not be achieved if the monopolists who financed Hitler's rise to power and collaborated in all his plans for world conquest are allowed to keep their economic, and hence their political, power. It is idle to talk of democracy in Germany unless the German people are allowed to eliminate the industrial oligarchy and gain control of their own economy. And it is futile to hope for economic revival on a scale sufficient to relieve American taxpayers from their present German burden until this question, which is basic to reorganization, is settled. American liberals must wake up to this situation and insist that alleged American interests are not permitted to camouflage the resurrection of the Thyssens, the Krupps, and the Stinneses.

The Labor Pains of Senator Taft

BY WILBUR H. BALDINGER

Washington, February 2

REPRESENTATIVE Fred A. Hartley, Jr., who in his Congressional Directory autobiography exults that he is the "only living person after whom an aerie of the fraternal Order of Eagles has been named," sets out this week to stake an even bolder claim to a page of history. The rugged Republican from Kearney, New Jersey, chairman of the Education and Labor Committee, is going to wrap up the labor program in a bill which, he says, will be more than good enough to stop John L. Lewis.

Mr. Hartley's chief helpers in this enterprise are the committee's two next-ranking Republicans, Gerald W. Landis of Indiana and Clare E. Hoffman of Michigan, names which strike terror to the minds of children of all good union card-carriers. Their endeavors can be counted on to put the party back in good standing with the National Association of Manufacturers, which has been disturbed by the slowness of anti-labor legislative processes in the first month of the Eightieth Congress: Robert R. Wason, chairman of the board of the N. A. M., declared last week that there had been a Republican "sell-out" to labor for 1948 vote purposes.

What aroused the N. A. M. board chairman was the apparently plodding way in which the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee was going about its appointed task of banning closed shops and industry-wide bargaining. Senator Robert A. Taft of Ohio, until now a dependable man, was chairman. Senator Joseph H. Ball of Minnesota had proposed bills to accomplish the two N. A. M. objectives. So what was the need for all the talking in the Senate committee?

The need for the talking was made clear at a Taft hearing on the Ball bills. From the far Democratic left of the table Florida's Senator Pepper wondered persistently if the evils of capital should not be considered along with the evils of labor. Between Pepper and Taft, New York's Irving M. Ives—who can make Taft watch his labor step in 1948—asked searching questions. At the right Ball, a younger Lincoln to his Minnesota adherents, was jealously proud of his legislative handiwork but uncertain in his answers to questions about it.

The witness was Ludwig Teller, New York labor-relations counselor, who found Ball's bills faulty in at least some respects and who had his own "balanced" labor program. Teller would set up special courts to replace the National Labor Relations Board in cases involving enforcement of the Wagner Act. He also urged "crisis measures for crisis situations" and said there ought to be a law on secondary boycotts and strikes. Taft asked unhappily, "Have you tried to draw a statute on the subject?" Teller said he had not, and Taft nodded in confirmation of his own uncertainties.

The need for the talking was also made plain yesterday morning at the White House, when President Truman held a special press and radio conference to announce joyfully a no-strike, no-lockout peace treaty between the Associated General Contractors of America and the Construction Trades Department of the A. F. of L., affecting at least two million workers. The President said that the compact for settlement of disputes between the tough A. F. of L. craft unions and the just as tough contractors was a "notable step along the road to industrial peace." In this opinion even Senator Homer E. Capehart of Indiana and his colleague from Wisconsin, Joseph R. McCarthy, concurred, and nobody pointed out that such a gratifying development in labor-management relations would not be permitted under the Ball bills, which have been regarded in Republican policy circles as legislative minima.

Ball's Senate Resolution 105 declares "unlawful any contract or agreement making membership or non-membership in a labor organization a condition of employment." The A. F. of L. building-trades unions are traditionally closed-shop outfits, and they negotiated their understanding with the industry on that basis, specifically excluding from the treaty any "employers in whose operation a non-union condition exists."

Ball's Senate Resolution 133, preventing "the use of certain monopolistic practices in collective bargaining," forbids industry-wide negotiations. It provides that "no labor organization shall be a representative for purposes of collective bargaining of any employees of an employer if such an organization also acts as the representative . . . of employees of any other employer engaged in the same industry . . . unless . . . located within the same labor-market area."

Both the A. F. of L. craft unions and the contractors are largely Republican in their voting habits. Perhaps that consideration will act as a further deterrent to precipitate action by Taft and his labor committee.

In any event, little hope is seen in Washington that the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. will regard the situation on the Hill as a compelling reason for merger. The Miami proposal of President William Green of the A. F. of L.—and John L. Lewis—to President Philip Murray of the C. I. O. for amalgamation conferences was as cynical as the earlier Murray proposal to Green for a united front against pending labor legislation.

No adult reading this will live long enough to see a united labor movement in the United States. But both labor groups will be around long enough to see a legislative blitz against their very existence. In the Senate the enemy may withdraw tentatively from his heavily armed positions. The House forces are eager for the fray, and Hartley has the votes. Taft will need many of his talents to resolve the conflict to the credit of the Republican Congress and to the end of industrial peace.

Cancer Spot of Europe

DIAGNOSIS OF THE GERMAN PROBLEM

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

THE starting point of any realistic program for Germany must be the present economic situation as it is reflected not only in production figures but in the condition of the various classes in the population.

Economic conditions are immeasurably worse today than they were even in 1932, the year of deepest depression, and social antagonisms are much sharper. The leader of the Social Democrats in the British zone, Dr. Kurt Schumacher, said recently, "The situation in Germany is such that 35 per cent of the inhabitants have not only retained all they possessed before the war but have become in effect even richer because the others have become poorer. Another group, about 25 per cent, have not enough to live on but through connections of all sorts manage to keep body and soul together. The rest of the people, 40 per cent of all Germans, have nothing but their food ration cards. Such conditions mean latent social revolution."

ALMOST HALF THE POPULATION DESTITUTE

Making up the destitute 40 per cent are the many millions who were bombed out of their homes, the other millions evacuated from the former German and Polish provinces now in the hands of the Russians and Poles, and the vast number of Germans who were expelled from Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and other countries. These people have nothing but the clothes on their backs. They live in cellars or crowded into rooms without furniture or kitchen utensils. Not for a hundred years has such destitution existed in Germany. Even during the blackest years of the world crisis the unemployed had shelter, could obtain coal in winter, and drew insurance which enabled them to eat twice as well as they can today. The basic fact in the whole German problem is that the living standard of nearly half the population has been depressed far below anything in the experience of living generations.

Among the 25 per cent who manage to gain a livelihood are the workers and other employees in the smaller towns and those in the large cities who were not bombed out. These people, even if they get no more food than the official rations, still have an apartment with living facilities and so have some hope of survival.

The 35 per cent who, according to Dr. Schumacher, have suffered little from the war fall into two groups—farmers, and the Nazis and their collaborators. The countryside except in a few places has not been devastated. The German farmers—some 20 to 27 per cent of the population—still have their homes and personal property intact. They have their land. And what is particularly important in the western zones, they are fully employed, in contrast to the city workers; their output lags behind demand, and the black market is open to them. The farmers are, in fact, the only existing middle class, FRITZ STERNBERG, a German economist now living in this country, is the author of "The Coming Crisis," which has probably been more widely discussed than any other recent book in its field.

for the former urban middle classes, after having been impoverished during the inflation period and almost ruined by the great depression, were the particular victims of the Wehrwirtschaft (war-preparation economy) and the war.

The top 10 per cent is made up of the Nazis and their collaborators, men who made vast profits out of the armaments economy before and during the war. With the exception of a few who have been brought to trial, these people have not been deprived of their wealth, and their use of it has been very little restricted in the three western zones. The progress of denazification in the American zone is frequently reported—in September, 1946, at the time of Mr. Byrnes's Stuttgart speech, General McNarney, then American commander-in-chief in Germany, even declared that denazification had been completed—but in reality little has been accomplished. A number of Nazis have been thrown out of administrative posts, but so far nothing has been done to break their social and political power. In almost every town under American control big and small Nazis remain in undisturbed possession of their bank accounts and their property. They are well housed and well dressed, and because their money allows them to buy food on the black market, they have good health and sufficient energy for political activity. Punishment of the Nazis and their collaborators would have meant decisive changes in the social structure, and such changes have been strictly avoided in the American and French zones, though some are now being initiated by the British.

INDUSTRY STAGNANT

An American economic policy in western Germany is non-existent. The most essential repairs have been made in the transport system, but for the rest American policy has been and still is one of waiting until free enterprise again sets the wheels of industry in motion. And because free enterprise is not equal to the task, the blame has been placed on the three-zone system. German production at present is far below the level fixed at Potsdam, and with conditions such as they are it is hard to see how it can be raised by the methods of private capitalism.

The situation is quite different in the territory under Soviet control. The Russians are keenly interested in production because a considerable part of the current output goes to the Soviet Union. Some of it, however, stays in Germany, and this provides an incentive to German labor. There is even a man-power shortage in the Soviet zone, though unemployment prevails elsewhere.

Incentives to industrial activity are painfully lacking in western Germany. There is at present no functioning currency, and no one in Germany can know what money will be worth in the future. There is no certainty about the availability of raw materials. And because of the latent revolutionary ferment, the capitalists are not even sure that their factories will remain in their possession. Under these conditions it is no wonder that capitalist industry is at a standstill. And since the American administration finds a planned economy absolutely foreign to its mind, it has failed to take the necessary steps to restore production. The result is that the output of even the most essential consumer goods is disastrously insufficient. This is also the case in the British and French zones.

As evidence I will quote the following appeal to the British Minister in charge of German affairs, published in the Hannoversche Presse.

We are speaking mainly of our own city, which we take to be neither better nor worse off than other devastated cities in the British zone. Hanover has again 334,000 inhabitants. Among them are 200,000 bombed out people, 16,000 refugees (40,000 more stand before our doors), 3,200 former concentration-camp inmates, and an indefinite number of people, certainly several thousand, who have had their homes and their furniture requisitioned for the occupation forces. . . .

In the fifteen months since the capitulation there has been hardly any possibility of replacing these losses. Allotments of goods have been so ridiculously low that not even the normal demand could have been filled. To illustrate: in a period of a year and a half only fifteen pfennigs' worth of sewing and darning material has been allotted per family.

Since the introduction of new allotment cards by the Military Government for necessary consumer goods, the city of Hanover has twice received supplies. The first shipment was a sort of advance for extremely needy cases until the result of the goods inventory was available; the second was the first regular allotment for one month. If one compares these two allotments together to the needs of a city of 344,000 inhabitants, one is tempted to believe that a careless clerk forgot three, or at least two, zeroes in every amount. For example, for about 150,000 men and youths the allotment for a period of four months was 89 suits, 31 coats, 227 pants, 206 work jackets, 469 work aprons, 416 work suits, 76 work pants. For 1,700 mothers with new-born babies there were 82 jackets, 118 baby shirts, 217 rubber sheets, 4 baby carriages. A total population of 344,000 people received 43 mattresses, 55 bedsheets, 5 gas stoves, 9 gas cookers, 99 beds for adults, 30 children's beds, 27 clothes closets, 48 tables, 260 chairs.

All the large cities of Germany are in the same straits. And in consequence the people are sullen and despairing. The first post-war winter, 1945-46, was of course one of great hardship. But the winter of 1918-19 had also been hard, and it was followed by recovery. So people thought that this time, too, when spring came, things would take a turn for the better. But spring came, and summer, and the hunger rations of 1,500 calories were still further reduced—in the British zone to just over 1,000. This winter the amount has been raised, but it remains a hunger ration. With reserves at a low point, the German people are going through the second peace-time winter in an almost starving state.

It is reported that should the winter be a very severe one, small but violent uprisings may occur in the western zones. On the other hand, the Germans may have become so tired and fatalistic that they will have no strength for this kind of resistance, which after all would not change the situation. But whether uprisings break out or not, the fact remains that industrial Germany today is a stagnant slum in which only the former Nazis and their collaborators enjoy a fairly decent standard of living.

RESPONSIBILITY OF THE UNITED STATES

How can this situation be changed? The first thing necessary is a clear understanding of the elements that enter into it, but in furnishing the needed information the American press has been singularly negligent. It has reported that the Germans are on hunger rations but not the extent to which the United States is responsible for this condition through its adherence to the Potsdam agreement. The essence of the difficulty is that the three western zones, with 66.7 per cent of the population of Germany, produce much less than two-thirds of its food. Before the war their output was only 43.8 per cent of the total amount of bread cereals, 40 per cent of the potatoes, and 32.2 per cent of the sugar beets. It must be remembered, too, that before the war Germany imported about 20 per cent of its foodstuffs, and today, with the population swollen by the influx of millions of displaced and evacuated persons, would need to import 50 per cent, even if agricultural production reached its pre-war level. Germans in the western provinces are responsible neither for the presence of the refugees nor for the political barriers that prevent the free movement of foodstuffs from the agricultural regions in the east. The United States, by signing the Potsdam agreement, assumed at least part of the responsibility and should do what it can to discharge it.

With respect to industrial production the American press has supplied even less adequate information. For example, on October 26 the New York Times printed the following dispatch from Berlin: "The September industrial output in the United States zone suggests that after unbroken expansion of such activity during the year a seasonal decline is starting, according to Brigadier General William A. Draper, Jr., director of the Economic Division of the Office of Military Government." The fact is that when Germany collapsed, production dropped to nothing, from which point, of course, any recovery at all can be represented on paper as an unbroken expansion. But it is absurd to describe the present complete economic stagnation as a seasonal decline.

Though the American public is meagerly informed about the economic situation, it is constantly told about German progress toward democracy, as manifested by the existence of a free press and trade unions. Again the reality in no way corresponds to the picture. The German press is strictly forbidden to criticize the policies of the occupying powers and is therefore not at all a free press. It cannot discuss the lack of food, the unemployment, the unsettled currency, the prosperity of former Nazis—all questions of the utmost importance to the German people. Trade unions, it is true, exist—in a society which does not even produce the necessities of life—but they are not allowed to make representations in the matter of wages.

These are the economic and social facts from which democratic planning for a new Germany must start. Is there any possibility of developing real democracy among a people living at a below-subsistence level, without houses, without jobs, and without hope?

SOCIALIZATION INEVITABLE

Capitalism as it existed in Germany before and during Hitler's regime will not be restored. In the Russian zone as everywhere else in Eastern Europe the Soviets have destroyed the social foundations of capitalism. In the west the conditions described above make the reconstruction of capitalism almost impossible. Moreover, the British Labor government is now definitely moving toward the socialization of key industries. This policy, if carried out with determination in the face of the expected American opposition, will bring about a fundamental change in the structure of society in Western and Central Europe, just as the decision on independence for India may change the social structure of all Asia. Its announcement by Mr. Bevin in the House of Commons was a decisive step toward the realization of democratic socialism in Europe.

Some time ago the British government socialized the coal mines of the Ruhr. Then, in the summer of 1946, it placed steel production under the management of the British military authorities. These might be regarded as isolated acts, but Mr. Bevin's declaration that the chemical and engineering industries would also be socialized revealed that the British government has a systematic plan for the expropriation of German heavy industry, cartels, and monopolies. Mr. Bevin left no doubt about the Labor government's program when he said, "Our intention is that these industries shall be owned and controlled in the future by the public. . . . They should be owned and worked by the German people, but subject to such international controls that they cannot again be a threat to neighbors. . . . The case for public ownership of these heavy industries was never stronger than it is in Germany today."

In embarking upon a policy of socialization for Germany, the British government is well aware that its ideas are not shared by the United States. It can hardly be an accident that Mr. Bevin chose to make his declaration concerning its intentions just as the economies of the American and British zones were being merged. He was informing Washington at the outset that he would give no support to the reconstruction of capitalism. Undoubtedly the British will encounter difficulties in carrying out their plans against American objections, but they start with the advantage of having most of the coal, iron, and steel production of Germany centered in their zone, especially in the Ruhr. Seventy-eight per cent of the coal, 72 per cent of the pig iron, and 72 per cent of the steel of Germany are produced in the British zone; none of the coal, 2 per cent of the pig iron, and 2 per cent of the steel, in the American. As for the other zones, 8 per cent of the coal, 14 per cent of the pig iron, and 14 per cent of the steel are produced in the French; 14 per cent of the coal, 12 per cent of the pig iron, and 12 per cent of the steel, in the Russian.

Controlling such a large proportion of these important commodities, the British, if they stand firm, will be in a strong position to introduce socialization, provided they can gain the mass support of the German people for the change. This should not be too difficult, for the election results in the British zone showed that the Social Democrats, whose program insists upon socialization, are the strongest party. The conditions under which the Social Democrats will cooperate with the British government were indicated in a resolution passed at a recent conference of party executives at Cologne, which was attended by delegates from the American and French as well as the British zone. After referring to the destitution of the people and to the responsibility of the Nazis for the state to which the country was reduced, the resolution declared: "In politics, economy, and administration the same powers rule which brought us to our present situation." And then followed a very important statement: "The German Social Democracy has for a long time observed this development with the greatest anxiety. Its repeated proposals and opinions have not led to any real changes in policy. It is not willing to assume political responsibility for conditions forced upon it. It makes its political cooperation dependent on binding promises."

A SHORT-TERM PROGRAM

The Cologne meeting also formulated a program to deal with the immediate present. This program covered three points—food, production, and finance. With respect to food, it demanded "that sufficient nutrition be assured and an equalization in the food supply between town and country be brought about." No lengthy documentation is needed to prove that even the increased food ration of 1,500 calories is absolutely insufficient. With the workers so undernourished, an increase in German production to the minimum figure set at Potsdam is impossible. People must get more than 2,000 calories a day if industrial activity in Germany is to be revived. And they cannot get it without larger food imports. Obviously, imported foodstuffs must be paid for by the export of German manufactured goods. But let us be clear about this. Additional food imports must come first; they are the indispensable prerequisite for increased production.

After food the prime necessity is an agreement among the occupation powers to permit the manufacture of homes, or barracks, furniture, crockery, clothing, and other articles which the millions who possess nothing but their ration cards must see in prospect if they are to work with any hope or energy.

These steps toward reconstruction must be accompanied from the very beginning by financial measures which are not mere technical devices. The injustice which permits the Nazis and their collaborators to live parasitically upon their former gains must be ended; the security of German democracy demands a drastic elimination of the advantages at present enjoyed by those who brought Germany to ruin. The debts of former German governments must be canceled, and all their obligations except provision for the care of invalids and the aged must be repudiated. Finally, as an absolute essential, a new currency must be created.

Such a program would of course encounter resistance from certain classes in Germany—former Nazis and their collaborators would know that their hour had struck—but it would be enthusiastically supported by the great majority of the population.

The United States will permit the socialization of Germany only slowly if at all, and only out of sheer necessity, for socialization runs counter to the policy so far followed in the American zone and to the capitalist tradition in which this country has been educated. But if it is done, the consequences will be decisive for world history. The issue is clear. Shall there be a continuation of the policy hitherto followed by the United States in Germany, which perpetuates the slum, favors the Nazis and their collaborators, and lays the foundation for a revival of neo-fascist, militarist tendencies; or shall there be a planned German economy—that is, socialization of the basic industries—and the resultant emergence of a democratic-socialist Germany? If Germany is reconstructed along democratic-socialist lines, the Socialist forces in the whole of continental Europe will be strengthened or rebuilt, and there will thus be developed a great independent center of political power between the Soviet Union on one side and the monopoly capitalism of the United States on the other.

China's Dark Destiny

BY PEGGY DURDIN

Nanking, China, January 3

THE recently adopted democratic constitution for China has had, outside of official circles, an extremely lukewarm reception. The dearth of rejoicing noted in even such moderately liberal papers as the Ta Kung Pao is due to the depressing realization that the promulgation of the constitution has solved none of China's pressing political problems and may in fact have complicated them.

Convocation of the National Assembly, in clear contravention of agreements reached by the all-party Political Consultative Conference last spring and, it is reported, against General Marshall's advice, was the signal for a decisive break in the year-old Communists vs. government negotiations. The Communists have since made it abundantly clear that they consider the Assembly illegal and the constitution it produced a "fake." No wonder there is little optimism about a constitution which instead of unifying the country solidifies its divisions. The character of the Assembly which produced the constitution would alone dampen enthusiasm for it. Although Chiang Kai-shek, through the political maneuvering of which he is a master, split the "third-party" front and brought the Social Democrats, the pro-Kuomintang Youth Party, and many reputable non-partisans into the Assembly, it remained in general an unrepresentative aggregation of Kuomintang and Kuomintang-approved delegates.

Moreover, the difficulty with which the government pushed this liberal draft constitution through the Assembly augurs ill for its implementation. Incorporating as it does certain basic principles laid down by the all-party

P. P. C. Draft Constitution Committee last spring, it is a much more democratic document than the Kuomintang-sponsored draft of May, 1936, which it replaces. Chiang Kai-shek achieved the participation of the Youth Party and the Social Democrats in the Assembly—thereby rescuing it from being a blatantly one-party affair—by his promise that the revised draft would be adopted. He forced its passage in order to keep his word and to prevent the disastrous shock to American official and non-official opinion that adoption of a constitution markedly less democratic than the draft would have caused.

A very considerable number of the Kuomintang members of the Assembly, principally those "elected" ten years ago, were determined to destroy those very articles of the draft constitution which the Communists and other left parties in the Political Consultative Conference had thought most vital. Chiang Kai-shek cajoled and argued; he reminded party members that political expediency required the passage of the draft and that it could be legally amended at some later date. Chen Li-fu, head of the party's Board of Organization, tried—or at least made a pretense of trying—to whip the party into line. Finally, through the maximum exertion of his authority as party leader, Chiang subdued the revolt: he gave definite orders that no important changes in the draft could be made and invited Kuomintang members who would not follow his leadership to leave the party.

There is widespread disbelief that the Kuomintang is at all prepared to keep to schedule on handing power back to the people. Chen Li-fu recently likened the Kuomintang to a famous prime minister of ancient times, one I Ying. When Emperor T'ai Chia was young, he said, I Ying was accused of usurping the power. He refused to defend himself against the charge, saying simply that his actions would be understood in the future. When T'ai Chia came of age, I Ying retired from politics, voluntarily relinquishing his power to the proper au-honor. Only then was the nobility of his motives recognized. The aptness of this analogy seems dubious.

PEGGY DURDIN, China-born, was correspondent for Time in Chungking during the war. She is the wife of Tillman Durdin, correspondent in China of the New York Times, and now lives in Nanking.

The period of Kuomintang "tutelage" officially ends with the Presidential election next fall. Although funds for the party are noticeably absent from the current budget, there is little doubt that the Kuomintang will continue to draw on the public treasury this year. It will be the only well-financed party in the elections. Unless civil liberties are restored in China, so that parties in overt opposition to the Kuomintang can speak and write as they will, the free elections which form the basis of a constitutional democracy cannot be held. Elections that are boycotted by both the Communists and the Democratic League, China's only approximation of a liberal party, and that are contested by the Kuomintang, the Youth Party, and the Social Democrats under the present limitations on political activity would be hardly more than a form.

The new constitution is the work not only of the P. C. C. Draft Constitution Committee and the Legislative Yuan but of such constitutional authorities as Dr. Wang Chung-hui, secretary general of the Supreme National Defense Council; Dr. John C. H. Wu, Minister to the Vatican; and Carson Chang, head of the Social Democratic Party. It definitely provides for a democratic form of government, although in some ways a clumsy and inefficient one. The central government is to be composed of a large popularly elected National Assembly (a Sun Yat-sen conception), a President elected by the assembly, and five "Yuans"—Legislative, Executive, Examination (civil service), Judicial, and Control (a combination of upper house and investigation committee).

The National Assembly, a huge body elected for a six-year term on an occupational as well as a geographical basis, has power not only to choose the President and Vice-President but to amend the constitution and, eventually, to exercise the rights of initiative and referendum.

The President has less power than the President of the United States. He is elected for a six-year term and may be reelected once. He chooses the head of the Executive Yuan (Prime Minister) and its other members with the consent of the Legislative Yuan. He appoints members of the Examination and Judicial Yuans with the consent of the Control Yuan. He proclaims pardons and amnesties, issues emergency orders which must be ratified within a month by the Legislative Yuan, represents the nation in foreign relations, summons disputing Yuans for consultation, and shares with the Legislative Yuan the power of declaring war, negotiating peace, and concluding treaties.

The Executive Yuan has a limited responsibility to the Legislative Yuan, which can question its members at any time and to which it must present reports. The Executive Yuan must comply with any laws passed by the Legislative Yuan or resign. It can request reconsideration of any bill passed by the Legislative Yuan, but on repassage of the bill by a two-thirds' majority the head of the Executive Yuan must comply or resign.

The Legislative Yuan, popularly elected for a three-year term by provinces, municipalities, Mongolian Leagues and "Banners," the "frontier regions" (Sinkiang), overseas Chinese, and occupational groups, is the highest lawmaking body of the state. Its financial control is limited by the qualification that it can decrease but not increase expenditures announced by the Executive Yuan.

The Control Yuan, elected by provincial and municipal councils, with representatives from Mongolian Leagues and Banners, Tibet, and overseas Chinese, has the power of impeachment, audits the Executive budget, and passes on certain Presidential appointments.

The constitution guarantees the customary protection of civil liberties, stating that they may not be "restricted by law" except "for preventing infringement of the freedom of other persons, averting an imminent crisis, maintaining social order, or promoting the public interest." Many Chinese view this qualifying clause with uneasy skepticism, having had the experience of being formally granted civil liberties which they have yet to enjoy.

The constitution comes into effect on Christmas Day, 1947. All enabling legislation must be passed in the first three months of this year.

The Communists have not only asserted the illegality of the constitution but criticized its provisions—its "abridgment of civil liberties" and its limitation of provincial autonomy and executive responsibility. The Democratic League, after some initial indecision, objects mainly to the method by which the constitution was adopted, declaring that since the Assembly was convoked in violation of P. C. C. decisions, the constitution was illegally drawn by the Kuomintang.

In some ways the adoption of the constitution is a political victory for Chiang Kai-shek. One of his chief objectives before the convocation of the Assembly seemed to be to isolate the Communists politically, to wean other parties from any alliance with them. In this he was partly successful; the Youth Party and Social Democrats broke with the Democratic League and most non-partisans followed suit.

Now that the constitution has been adopted by Kuomintang China and repudiated by the Communists, a section of Chiang Kai-shek's program for the near future seems fairly clear. Without making any real political concessions to the Communists, and sure of their refusal, he will probably invite them to join an interim reorganized government, as envisaged by the P. C. C., and to cooperate in the procedure of putting the constitution into effect. The State Council, an interim all-party governing body conceived by the P. C. C., in which the apportionment of seats was never settled, will be organized. Probably the Youth Party, the Social Democrats, and some non-partisans will participate. The Executive Yuan, the number of whose members has recently been increased, may also be reorganized, with some of the less important portfolios given to persons outside the Kuomintang. The Legislative Yuan, charged with making a large number of vital enabling laws, may be enlarged.

Inclusion of non-Kuomintang men in the government is certainly a sound move. But without the participation of either the Communists or the Democratic League, and with a Kuomintang majority in all these organs, the Kuomintang's policies in the interim period can hardly be challenged.

It was evident some months ago that the Communists had changed their mind about participating in a coalition government; they had, no doubt, made a new interpretation of the Chinese and international scene. A Yen-an New Year's editorial analyzed the present situation as follows: In the period since the end of the war, it said, "international conditions have greatly altered." On the one hand are the "American imperialists and their running dogs in all countries," who have replaced the fascists of Germany, Italy, and Japan. On the other is the "democratic worldwide united front," which will "certainly obtain the sympathy and support of the socialist Soviet Union." A severe economic crisis in the United States this year will "promote the formation of the worldwide democratic united front" and deal American imperialism a blow from which it will never recover. "The Chinese people must now carry on a struggle to the death with Chiang and American imperialism, their two natural enemies." Another phase of the struggle, the Communist leader, Mao Tse-tung, pointed out in a New Year's message, is "the daily swelling mass movement for democratic liberties on the part of all classes of people in areas under Kuomintang rule."

The Communists' strategy for the present seems to be to increase their political influence in their own and Kuomintang areas and to continue and intensify attrition warfare. By widespread guerrilla activity, by destruction of lines of communication, by sabotage, they will increase the economic dislocation of Kuomintang China. The Communists will utilize every available group—labor, the students, the Democratic League—to foster economic and political discontent.

Kuomintang China, the Communists believe, will be tremendously weakened by the people's dissatisfaction and the economic chaos. In this setting, and with possibly a more favorable international situation, the Communists will finally return to the conference table, their bargaining power enormously enhanced.

Letter from Paris

BY MICHAEL CLARK

Paris, January 18

LA FRANCE s'est donnée un chef!"—that phrase, betraying the relief felt everywhere in France that the provisional has at last given way to the full-fledged Fourth Republic, was the comment most often heard the day before yesterday when the news of Vincent Auriol's election as President was flashed over the air. France is just as beset with problems as it was before, but there can be no doubt that a new and welcome note of hope, rational or irrational, pervades the city today.

On Thursday evening the Presidential procession, returning from Versailles, swung down the Champs-Élysées in pomp between massed police and military pickets—Paris, with its incredible plethora of policemen, could easily afford that luxury—and headed toward the Elysée Palace, refurbished for the occasion. Some people in the crowd muttered enviously, "At least they [M. and Mme Auriol] have an apartment!" They have indeed, and a unique one. Built in 1718 for Henri de La Tour d'Auvergne, the Elysée has had a rather unusual succession of occupants, including Mme de Pompadour and the two Napoleons. For a time, under the Directory, a certain M. Howin rented it from its owner, Bathilde d'Orléans, Duchess of Bourbon, and turned it into a dance hall called the Bal de l'Elysée-Bourbon; he did a roaring business catering to the "merveilleuses" and "incroyables" of his day. The prosaic Third Republic used it as the residence of its Presidents, a precedent, among many others, faithfully followed by the Fourth.

In fact, the Fourth Republic's resemblance to its immediate predecessor seems to be its most striking characteristic. When one recalls that barely two years ago the slogan in vogue was, "Nous voulons du neuf," and when one sees what has actually happened, it is hard not to feel almost stupefied. The two republics, whether one takes their basic charters, the men at their head, or their methods, are almost as alike as two peas in a pod. In this connection the newspaper Le Monde, itself a worthy successor to that Third Republic institution Le Temps, MICHAEL CLARK is The Nation's representative in Paris. During the war he was attached to the Information Service of the French army in the Near East.

comments: "Where is the flowering, so long awaited and expected, of new men, the young men of the resistance, of the national renaissance and renovation? 'From resistance to revolution,' said some; 'the States General of French rebirth,' said others. . . . What a deflation of presumptuous proclamations!" And, indeed, it is hard not to agree with Le Monde that in view of the abdication of the young men of the resistance France could do worse than rely on the wisdom and political experience of some of its elder statesmen, men like Léon Blum, Vincent Auriol, and, perhaps, Paul Ramadier, the new Premier.

The newly elected President of the Republic is, beyond a doubt, a pure product of the former regime. He was elected a Socialist deputy in 1914 by the citizens of his own bailiwick, the Haute-Garonne. In the period between the two wars he played a prominent role: he was Minister of Finances in 1936, Minister of Justice under Chautemps, Minister again in the second Blum Cabinet, and, finally, Minister of State under De Gaulle in 1945. An old Socialist faithful, M. Auriol often represented the French party at international Socialist congresses. The man he has chosen to head the government, Paul Ramadier, also a Socialist, is another veteran of the Third Republic; Under Secretary in the Blum Cabinet of 1936 and in the Chautemps Cabinet of 1937, he was Minister of Labor in Chautemps's second Cabinet and in Daladier's in 1938.

Léon Blum's interim government has now passed into history. Considering what had gone before, and especially the innumerable chestnuts left in the fire when Bidault retired, Blum did very creditably in the short time he had to work in. His was not a government of salut publique; it could not have been, for what it most lacked was continuity, the essential condition for real reform. But he did check, for a moment, the spiraling rise of prices and wages. He did, in London, manage to improve Anglo-French understanding. He did avoid coming to grief in Indo-China. His trick at the helm was short, but while it lasted he steered the ship of state skilfully enough to make its course steadier now than it was before. And that is tribute.

French men and women, in their daily bout with the material problem of existence, still acute, sometimes seem rather unconcerned about the larger problems of France's position in the world. Even the fighting in Indo-China, where the whole future of the French Union is at stake, has failed to give them a sense of urgency. Yet these problems remain and must be grappled with. One of them is the question of French participation in the exploitation of the Middle East's oil reserves. Last week the government, more aware than the public at large of the importance of this matter, protested in Washington and London against the proposed realignment of British and American oil interests in the Middle East. There can be no doubt that here in Paris this protest appeared justified. On a previous occasion, following the First World War, France was maneuvered into a back-seat position as regards Middle East oil; it thought it would get Mosul, but somehow Mosul fell to Britain.

Caricature by Berger

Vincent Auriol

In the end, the Compagnie Française des Pétroles obtained a 23.75 per cent interest in the Iraq Petroleum Company, an international cartel of American, British, and Dutch interests which holds the Mosul and Kirkuk concessions.

Now, however, the American participants in the Iraq Company—Standard Oil of New Jersey and the Socony-Vacuum Oil Company—have made a deal whereby they will acquire a 40 per cent share in the Saudi Arabian oil concessions held by Standard Oil of California and the Texas Company. The French protest is based on a secret agreement concluded in 1928 between France, Great Britain, and the United States; this agreement provides that none of the participants in the I. P. C. may acquire new concessions anywhere in the area covered by the former Ottoman Empire without bringing in the others. The present transactions are a clear violation of this agreement. And no one can expect the French to take much stock in the arguments put forward in London and in Washington to the effect that oil transactions in the Middle East between private companies are of purely commercial import or that the 1928 agreement was invalidated because of trading-with-the-enemy complications. The blunt fact is that the American interests, seriously worried by the diminution of domestic oil reserves, are going "all-out" for new sources of supply in the Middle East and are not hesitating to by-pass the rights of the French.

Another fly in the ointment has been the hue and cry that went up abroad when the French government announced that it had set up a customs barrier between the Saar and the rest of the French zone in Germany. The Washington Post, for instance, commented on this action in the following terms: "French Military Government officials insist that these operations are purely administrative. They say that no action will be taken which can really be called political without the consent of the Council of Foreign Ministers. But this assertion will convince nobody. The fact is that France has hammered another nail in the coffin of the Potsdam agreement. . . ."

In the meantime the Berliner Zeitung (Russian license) has remarked, "France is sending extra food into the Saar just as the Nazis, in 1938, dropped tracts on Alsace saying, 'We are hastening to your aid.' It is the policy of the coup de force, of the accomplished fact, that we are witnessing today."

It is, of course, nothing of the kind. What the French want, and desperately need, is not the Saar territory or the Saarlanders but the Saar coal. To get the maximum production in the Saar mines, as in the mines of the Pas-de-Calais, extra food allocations to the miners constitute an elementary precaution. And, indeed, the French authorities are making a serious effort to assure a fairly satisfactory food supply in an industrialized and densely populated area. There is clearly no point in allowing supplementary rations sent to the Saar to be diverted through channels black or white into the rest of the French zone. The French policy of special treatment for the Saar is already paying off. William Attwood reports in the New York Herald Tribune that "thanks to the efforts of the region's 55,000 miners working twenty-four hours a day, on eight-hour shifts, the French have boosted daily coal output to 33,000 tons from less than 11,000 tons when the mining missions arrived from Paris to take over the mines in 1945." At present, of course, only 18 per cent of the Saar coal production goes to France, the rest being distributed, mostly in Germany, according to the directives of the London coal conference. What the French actually want is the bulk of the Saar coal and the control of the mines; they want that to count as reparations. The measures they have already taken as well as the proposals which they are likely to advance next March are motivated by this desire and not by any urge for territorial aggrandizement. The French have had enough experience in European affairs to know that a population which from 1814 to 1920 and from 1935 to 1945 was subjected to intense Prussianization is not going to throw itself into their arms simply because the Saar was French in the time of Louis XIV. But they do believe that the Saarlanders will welcome an economic or customs union with France if it helps their material well-being.

Highballing with Kilowatts

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Portland, Ore., January 30

AFTER the big 4-8-4 locomotives have snorted by, billows of smoke hang lazily in the mountain air. The smoke is thickest when extra coaches and mail cars have made the drive wheels slip on the steep grades between tidewater and the Inland Empire. In ragged shreds the smoke clings to the 230,000-volt transmission lines from Bonneville and Grand Coulee which cross and recross the twisting railroad track.

But why should any smoke at all hang over a railroad train when power from the world's greatest source of electric energy hums overhead?

Dr. Paul J. Raver, administrator of the huge government dams on the Columbia River, is asking this question of the eight transcontinental roads which run from the Continental Divide to the Pacific seaboard. It is certain to be a major subject of controversy in American railroading for many years. It may become a national issue if the country ever suffers a shortage of oil. At present diesel engines threaten to replace steam locomotives on nearly all the mountain divisions of the West, but the diesels in turn are threatened by electricity.

Most Western railroads burn oil. And as far back as 1940, before the drain of war, the National Resources Committee announced that the "country's oil supply must be considered strictly limited." Dr. Raver contends that the electrification of Western railroads would save 200,000,000 gallons of oil a year. He has in mind no piecemeal program, but wants to put all the 8,850 miles of main-line track in the West under trolley wires.

The undertaking would affect the trunk lines crossing the eleven Western states—California, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Nevada, Montana, Utah, Colorado, Wyoming, Arizona, and New Mexico. It would begin at the eastern ramparts of the Rocky Mountains and extend to the seaport terminals on the Pacific. The operations of major railroads would be drastically revised—namely, of the Union Pacific, the Great Northern, the Southern Pacific, the Northern Pacific, the Santa Fe, the Milwaukee, the Western Pacific, and the Denver and Rio Grande.

When the late J. D. Ross, whom Raver succeeded, first called Grand Coulee Dam "an oil well that will never run dry, a coal mine that will never thin out," railroad executives were scornful. They said the cost alone made it ridiculous to talk of electrifying the sparsely traveled, single-track systems which thread the Rockies, RICHARD L. NEUBERGER is an Oregon journalist whose articles on interesting developments in the Northwest—politics, power, conservation—appear frequently in The Nation and other magazines.

Bitter Roots, Cascades, and Sierras. Boards of directors are no longer scornful. On the paneled walls of their meeting rooms are charts showing the steady rise in the price of oil.

"When Bunker C hits $2 a barrel, I'll electrify," the president of one of the West's biggest lines told Ross. Bunker C, standard fuel for oil-burning locomotives, was then $1.05 a barrel. Today it is $1.55. As the price goes up, the interest of rail executives in Coulee and Bonneville power mounts proportionately. The Rio Grande is studying electrification of its Moffat Tunnel route, the highest crossing of the Rockies, and the Great Northern, which already has electrified a seventy-two-mile stretch across the hump of the Cascades, may string the wires all the way to Seattle.

According to classical railroad economics, electrification is inadvisable except in areas of great traffic density. Expensive catenary wires and power substations can be justified between New York and Washington on the double-tracked Pennsylvania, where trains run only a few minutes apart, but the long hauls across the emptiness of Wyoming and Montana are a different matter. More than 1,500 miles separate cities on the Northern Pacific. Can the heavy initial cost of electrification be amortized when schedules call for only four passenger trains every twenty-four hours?

Dr. Raver and his engineers are attacking this long-standing objection to running railroads by electricity from two salients. One is the conservation issue; the other is a rival system of economics—a system based on the lowest power rates in the world. Raver says it is "paradoxical to move trains by oil or coal in a region as abundantly supplied with inexhaustible hydroelectricity as the Far West." America's oil may give out some day. The Columbia and the Colorado will flow downhill through their deep gorges as long as this geological epoch endures. Trains, moreover, are the only form of transportation which can be hooked to central-station power. Planes, ships, automobiles—none of these can take their energy from a wire; all must burn expendable fuels.

Federal dams on the swift mountain rivers of the West have an ultimate capacity of 4,604,000 kilowatts. Approximately one-fourth of this power—1,250,000 kilowatts—would move every train from the edge of the Great Plains to the Pacific. A few weeks ago the Columbia River Power Administration applied to the Federal Power Commission for permission to set up a special rate schedule for railroads. The basic charge would be 4 mills a kilowatt-hour, which may be compared, roughly, to the 7.5 mills paid by the Pennsylvania for power on the line that is the most successful example of railroad electrification in the United States. Juice bought from private power companies has cost the Milwaukee twice as much on its electrified mountain divisions in Washington state and Montana. Electricity at 4 mills a kilowatt-hour delivered to the trolley is the economic foundation of Dr. Raver's argument.

In 1937 J. D. Ross and Franklin Roosevelt rode down the lava chasm of the Columbia behind a Union Pacific oil-burning 4-8-2 and decided that it was wasteful to use this type of prime-mover a stone's throw from a river where 42 per cent of the water power of the nation was lurking. In the decade since then the diesel engine has largely replaced steam on Western railroads, and it is against the efficiency and cost of this kind of power that the advantages of electrification must be measured.

A diesel locomotive is a power plant on wheels. It generates its own electricity. An electric locomotive picks up energy from an overhead wire. Diesels, because they create their power, are considerably more expensive than electrics. But electrics require costly trolley systems. The cost of the two installations on the Great Northern's 180-mile Inland Empire division, just south of Grand Coulee Dam, is compared in the following table:

	Diesel	Electric
Trolley system		4,250,000
Power substations		1,750,000
Communication and signal changes		800,000
Diesel fuel stations	$ 100,000
Locomotives	4,900,000	3,200,000
	$5,000,000	$10,000,000

On the basis of these figures diesel power has all the best of it. Why string thousands of miles of trolley wire when one can use locomotives that generate their own electricity? But installation costs are not the alpha and omega of the problem. Diesel locomotives wear out quicker. Their maintenance is costly, and they must often be replaced, whereas the Milwaukee's original electrics still haul twenty-car passenger trains up the 2 per cent grade above Butte. Below are the estimates of Raver and his staff for the operation costs of the rival systems on the Inland Empire division:

	Diesel	Electric
Maintenance of trolley		$ 30,000
Maintenance of locomotives	$ 350,000	175,000
Engine crew expenses	600,000	450,000
Depreciation of trolley system		140,000
Depreciation of locomotives	300,000	130,000
	$1,250,000	$925,000

General Motors, principal manufacturer of diesel equipment, has challenged many of these figures. It contends that diesels are constantly being improved and that Raver's statistics on depreciation are weighted in favor of electric locomotives. Wenatchee, Washington, a division point on the Great Northern, is one of the few places in America where the rival claims can be tested. Diesels and oil-burning steam locomotives bring trains in from the East. Electrics take them on over the Cascade Range and down to the forests above Puget Sound.

J. F. N. Gaynor, Great Northern superintendent at Wenatchee, says it costs 22.8 cents a locomotive mile for maintenance under electric operation and 42 cents under diesel operation. One reason for the cheaper electric maintenance, he says, is that a smaller locomotive will attain the same horse-power as a larger diesel. Diesels on the Great Northern with 4,800 rail-horse-power are 196 feet long; electrics with 6,000 rail-horse-power are only 147 feet, 6 inches. The railroad paid $3,368,338 for eighteen electric-locomotive units totaling 42,300 rail-horse-power. Thus each single electric horse-power cost the company $80. It is paying $500,000 apiece for diesel locomotives of 4,800 rail-horse-power, which make each diesel horse-power cost $104.

Both diesels and electrics have their champions among the gauntleted engineers who wait at Wenatchee to take the control of trains bound east and west. But most of the engine crews agree that the electrics have "a little more soup" when 100 freight cars are strung out on a 2 per cent grade. A survey on the Rio Grande showed that a 196-foot diesel locomotive could haul 29 loaded freight cars from Denver to Moffat Tunnel at a speed of 22 miles an hour, but that an electric engine only 85 feet long could haul 47 loaded freight cars at the same speed.

Yet even with Dr. Raver's 4-mill power rate beckoning to them, railroad executives in the West are hesitant. They are naturally timid—their predecessors had to be browbeaten into adopting George Westinghouse's air brake—and they know they can convert to diesels one piece of equipment at a time. Diesel and steam operations can be synchronized. The purchase of one diesel locomotive is no Rubicon; the road can always return to mallets. The change-over to electrification, however, must be done at one fell swoop in Dr. Raver's plan. On the most conservative estimate, it would cost $440,000,000 to electrify all main lines west of Denver. This sum would be divided as follows:

Trolley system and poles	$160,000,000
Trackside substations	120,000,000
Electric locomotives	160,000,000

Western railroaders look at their skimpy schedules and ponder. Even during a peak war-time year the Southern Pacific carried less than half the tonnage of the Chesapeake and Ohio. The Milwaukee's electrified divisions have not been prosperous—although Bonneville engineers insist the railroad has been milked to pay exorbitant rates to power companies.

In the end the fate of Dr. Raver's program for railroad electrification will probably be determined by the price of oil. Diesel fuel now costs the lines approximately 7.2 cents a gallon at tidewater and is of course more expensive in the Inland Empire and Tonto Basin. With oil at 7.2 cents, the railroads probably will continue to buy diesel equipment. But not long ago oil was considerably less than 7.2 cents. If its price continues to mount, the railroads will be attracted by Dr. Raver's 4-mill electricity. Nor can the possibility be entirely dismissed that diesel oil will become unavailable. A spokesman for one oil company told the railroads to "start putting up poles and trolley wires because we won't be selling you diesel fuel much longer."

Another unknown factor is how long the Columbia River Power Administration can continue selling energy at the present low price. An industrial rate of only 2 mills a kilowatt-hour has proved that the Columbia can produce the cheapest power in the world. But Raver and his predecessor, Ross, have had to be constantly on guard to maintain this rate against the attacks of the private utilities and their spokesmen in Congress. As long as Roosevelt lived, the Columbia River program was safe. Even after his death, it got passive support from the Administration. Now Representative Jensen and his fellow-Republicans will "not vote one red cent for the Columbia Basin project unless there is a sensible increase in Pacific Northwest power rates." Eastern industrial interests, aware that the 2-mill rate in Oregon and Washington contains a threat to their dominance, have long insisted that Bonneville and Coulee charges be increased.

If the Columbia River Power Administration gets the ax in the new Congress, railroad electrification in the West will be only one of the casualties. Perhaps those 200,000,000 gallons of oil burned now along the banks of foaming mountain torrents may be lamented on some future day when "heaven is falling."

AMERICAN housewives have good reason to hope that they will be able to buy more sugar this year without paying a higher price for it provided that (a) rationing and price control are maintained, (b) the government resists the politicians and business men who are pressuring it to make a grab at the world's sugar bowl.

Unless there is new legislation, sugar rationing will end on April 1, and price ceilings will lapse on July 1. Most experts on the subject, including many in the food trades, believe that both controls should continue at least until the end of this year. At recent hearings by the food-investigation subcommittee of the House Agriculture Committee, several spokesmen for the sugar industry warned that a premature return to a free market would have disastrous effects. They recalled the wild scramble that occurred at the end of World War I when refined sugar shot from 9 to 26 cents a pound in five months. Since supplies are unlikely to catch up with demand until 1948, the abolition of controls would surely make sugar more costly and probably diminish stocks on the grocers' shelves, for in a free market industrial users would be able to secure a bigger share than at present.

In view of these facts, action by Congress to continue the authority for rationing and price ceilings is imperative. Unfortunately delay may be caused by the current agitation directed towards obtaining for the United States a larger share of world supplies. Some elements in the sugar trade have been putting out misleading propaganda about the way "our sugar" is being shipped abroad and egging on Congressmen to attack the government's arrangements with other countries.

Because there is still a universal shortage of sugar, we are adhering to a war-time agreement to insure an equitable distribution of supplies. Under this scheme the United States keeps its entire domestic production, including that of Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and Hawaii, and is allowed enough of the Cuban output to give it in all 20 per cent of the total world supply. This adds up to a very fair share, considering that before the war the United States accounted for 19 per cent of world consumption. Moreover, other sugar-importing countries have agreed not to bid for Cuban sugar but to allow the United States to contract for the whole crop as agent for the International Food Emergency Council, which allots shares to the various countries participating. It is not true, therefore, that any "American" sugar is being sent to Europe. The consignments leaving our ports represent Cuban sugar allocated to Europe but shipped here first for refining.

These facts are perfectly well known to those who have been telling housewives that they are being deprived of sugar for the benefit of Europe. The obvious aim of these propagandists is to upset the international distribution scheme, and as justification they argue that this country has some sort of prescriptive right to the Cuban crop. Thus a circular issued by Lamborn and Company, New York sugar brokers, declares: "Sugar has been dished out liberally by our government to foreign nations who normally do not secure their supplies in the West Indies. . . . The production of the United States and that which it buys belongs to the American people and not to a handful of bureaucrats."

The immediate concern of those who are urging that Americans should hog the sugar bowl is to obtain for this country the whole of the estimated 1,500,000-ton increase in the Cuban crop now being processed. Under present arrangements we shall get a considerable part of this additional sugar, enough to permit an appreciable increase in the ration, but Representative August A. Andresen of the House Agriculture Committee wants us to "take all." It is to the credit of Secretary of Agriculture Anderson that, while asking the international council for an allotment which will give us some twenty pounds more sugar per head, he has refused to agree to a policy of unilateral grab. In a statement on January 7 he said, "The countries that trusted us to act as sole buyers have a right to expect that the crop will be handled as a pool in which they can share as they did in the war years. Our integrity is at stake."

Apart from being a breach of faith, a "take-all" policy would be against the interests of American consumers, although it would no doubt afford a few speculators the chance to make a killing. The purchase contract made by the Department of Agriculture for the 1946 crop provided for a price pegged to the cost of living. It has meant a considerable advance over 1945 but has given Cuba a smaller return than it would have obtained in the open market with all the sugar-hungry countries bidding for supplies. Were the United States now to invalidate the world allocation agreement, both Cuba and the members of the International Food Emergency Council could legitimately claim that the contract had been voided. In the ensuing competitive struggle the weight of its purse might make America the winner, but the cost, in both economic and moral terms, would be heavy indeed. The price of sugar to consumers would be pushed right through the present ceiling, and it would be difficult to maintain either price control or rationing.

While on the subject of sugar I should like to call attention to some remarks of Senator Hugh Butler, who, commenting on the situation, said on Christmas Day, "Possibly what we need is just a plain, old-fashioned tariff to protect this important industry." Unless the sugar program of recent years was changed, he added, less sugar would be produced in the United States, and "we will become more and more dependent on imports." It appears that the Nebraska Republican does not know that American sugar producers have long had the benefit, not only of an old-fashioned tariff, but of quotas and subsidies as well. And that is one of the causes of our present troubles, for although the quota restriction on Cuban sugar has been suspended since 1942, the Cuban growers have had every reason to fear that it would be reinstated as soon as the situation was normal, leaving them with a heavy burden of surplus production. We can be thankful that, despite this discouragement, they have nearly doubled their pre-war output.

IN ONE EAR

BY LOU FRANKEL

A GROUP of Catholic laymen have approached one and possibly two of the major networks in an attempt to buy a network quarter-hour of prime time on which to present Monsignor Fulton J. Sheen in a weekly program giving "the Catholic viewpoint on world affairs." Sheen converted Clare Luce, Louis Budenz, and the late Heywood Broun. He would undoubtedly pack a powerful punch on the air. Networks have refused the business thus far, for the entire situation is loaded with dynamite. The riddle is why the request was made in the first place.

The television broadcasters—NBC, CBS, Du Mont, and Philco—joined together to cover the opening of Congress last month, and though it was the high-spot of "video," not a camera carried a name plate. It seems the telecasters fought so over which camera was to carry which name that the only possible solution was to have no names visible.

LaGuardia's program on Mutual is available for local sponsorship, and that includes trade unions, co-ops, and progressive groups. The ex-Mayor of New York has a clause in his contract providing for such sponsorship when available. Farm co-ops in the Middle West have already signed up. If you have been worried about the dearth of liberal commentators, here is your chance to do something about it.

The next time you hear someone panning the Federal Communications Commission, remind him that on a conservative estimate the FCC has saved consumers $125,000,000 in telephone-rate reductions alone. This year the FCC has asked for a budget of about $7,000,000; in other words, here is one department that costs the taxpayer nothing.

Du Mont recently demonstrated a device for transmitting television on a beam of light instead of the expensive coaxial cable. The technique has been used by radio hams for years, and is not unlike the familiar heliograph method of communication. Du Mont claims it can set up television transmitters and relay stations using the beam-of-light system for a fraction of what the cable system would cost. The only trouble would be fog, and Du Mont says it has this licked.

It sounds far-fetched, but don't laugh. Westinghouse demonstrated its "stratovision" transmitting facility—using airplanes circling overhead as a transmitting station—and proved it feasible.

One of the big headaches of radio is the annual shift to daylight-saving time and the later return to standard time. Not every community changes its time, and when programs come through an hour later or earlier local sponsors take away their business. Network stations nearly go crazy trying to reschedule their programs.

A bill now before Congress may ease the situation. Backed by radio stations and department stores and retailers in the District of Columbia, the bill would put Washington on daylight-saving time. The movie lobby is fighting the bill because a longer period of daylight cuts into the evening business at the film houses. If the bill is passed, Virginia and Maryland will be forced to go along since so many people who work in the capital live outside.

If commercial stations drive you nuts and you crave radio without recurrent advertising, then by all means save this column. If you live near any of the schools mentioned below, you may be able to tune into the Intercollegiate Broadcasting System. Programs are sponsored, but the commercial spots are brief and few. Technically you should not be able to hear these stations on your regular set since they have minute power and broadcast over the power lines between dormitories. But when the power load is high, the program seeps through and can be heard two miles away.

Right now there are Intercollegiate stations at the University of Alabama, at Tuscaloosa; Brigham Young University at Provo, Utah; Brown University at Providence, Rhode Island; Bucknell University at Lewisburg, Pennsylvania; Columbia in Manhattan; University of Connecticut at Storrs, Connecticut; Cornell at Ithaca, New York; Hamilton College at Clinton, New York; Harvard at Cambridge, Massachusetts; Haverford College at Haverford, Pennsylvania; MacMurray College at Jacksonville, Illinois; Mary Washington College at Fredericksburg, Virginia; Ohio University at Athens, Ohio; University of Pennsylvania at Philadelphia; Princeton in New Jersey; Radcliffe College at Cambridge, Massachusetts; Stanford at Palo Alto, California; Stevens College at Columbia, Missouri; Swarthmore College at Swarthmore, Pennsylvania; Union College at Schenectady, New York; Wellesley College at Wellesley, Massachusetts; Wesleyan University at Middletown, Connecticut; Williams College at Williamstown, Massachusetts; and Yale at New Haven.

Coming are stations at Antioch College, Yellow Springs, Ohio; Baylor University at Waco, Texas; Bryn Mawr at Bryn Mawr, Pennsylvania; Carnegie Tech at Pittsburgh; Colorado State College at Greeley, Colorado; Dickinson College at Carlisle, Pennsylvania; Georgetown University at Washington, D. C.; University of Idaho at Moscow; University of Illinois at Urbana; Knox College at Galesburg, Illinois; Lafayette at Easton, Pennsylvania; Lehigh University at Bethlehem, Pennsylvania; McGill University at Montreal; Miami at Oxford, Ohio; Mohawk College at Utica, New York; Montana State at Bozeman; North Carolina State at Raleigh; University of Oklahoma at Norman; Olivet Nazarene College at Kankakee, Illinois; College of the Pacific at Stockton, California; Rutgers at New Brunswick, New Jersey; St. Lawrence University at Canton, New York; University of South Carolina at Columbia; Texas State at Benton; and Trinity College at Hartford, Connecticut.

The best listening is at night when power use is high. Telephone the university and ask for the station wave length, then tune in, and pray you can get it.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Citizen and the Ideal

THE BLUE FLOWER: BEST STORIES OF THE ROMANTICS. Edited by Hermann Kesten. Roy Publishers. $5.

DOES some large or small prose "masterpiece" of the romantic period exist that has never received its due, shut up in the thorny language of some smaller European country—say, Poland or Hungary? This question often crosses the mind of the person interested in the literature of the romantic period. Hermann Kesten, by gathering together forty-five stories from thirteen countries, including the United States, has helped to answer it. He has arranged his material sensibly—chronologically according to country, so that we can see at a glance where the selection came from and when it was written.

The interplay of literary influence between country and country just before and after the Napoleonic wars was remarkably active. And it was one of the few times in history when prose fiction, or the chronicle of events, influenced poetry. The imaginations of Vigny and Pushkin were ignited by the works of Walter Scott in much the same way that Baudelaire was to be inflamed by the works of Poe. The poetry remains vivid; the prose on the whole does not. The total effect of these romantic tales, short stories, and excerpts from longer works that Kesten has gathered from all corners of Europe is thin and slight. The editor, it is true, has emphasized romantic idealism, as his title, drawn from Novalis, shows. He has almost entirely eliminated, moreover, romantic horror in favor of romantic ardor. The fear and terror, of a semi-religious intensity, which streaked through early romantic writing is only suggested here. This relative lack of romanticism's "night-side" results in an insipidity and minor-ness of tone, particularly noticeable in the English section of the anthology, which might easily have begun with a selection from Beckford's "Vathek" (1797) and finished with a scene from "Wuthering Heights" (1847). Instead, the editor starts out with a damp little graveyard piece by Mary Lamb and ends with a meek piece of sentiment by Robert Southey.

The selection is broader and better in the other national divisions. The level is generally that of "light reading"; but that level was usual, in the period of a new audience and the rise of the periodical and cheap reading matter in general.

It is rather pleasant to imagine the new bourgeois audience reading this fiction; the citizen or, more especially, the citizeness in the newly peaceful atmosphere of the thirties, the period to which about a third of the material belongs; in Louis Philippard or Biedermeyer interiors or, as the illustrator so charmingly depicts them, out in the fresh air, under trees. One superficial hindrance to our enjoyment of these stories—their lack of technical skill—did not trouble those early readers; the skilful conte had not been invented, and the only suspense they were familiar with was traditional fairy-tale suspense, several examples of which Kesten sensibly includes. Another, more significant difference between the early nineteenth-century reader and ourselves is the shift in moral and emotional values which, taking place later in the century, shut us off from these readers and writers as by a wall. Power was soon to become "the moral ideal of the bourgeois age." These tales were pre-power; and the code of their first readers was still medieval, in spite of civil and religious revolutions. In their fiction everything was exteriorized. The tragic scene had not yet shifted from without to within.

The trappings of early and middle romantic fiction have since been degraded to the childish or comic; they are still, however, full of interest if examined from a historical and psychological point of view. The full collision between romantic ferment and industrial vigor has not yet occurred. The naive imagination is still able to wander at will in its day-dream—unhampered by self-analysis or the need for scientific proofs. This is the last generation—we are still in the thirties—which, in the graphic arts, was to come down to us in its own version of itself, for the camera was about to arrive, along with the railroads and the gas-works. It is, as well, the last innocently to expose its simpler and cruder unconscious motives in fiction. In this period of reverie and comparative idealism, between two eras of power and moral earnestness, emotional absolutes could be openly stated and openly yearned for. Absolute love, absolute ideals of honor, absolute hatred of treason, absolute grief, and absolute revenge—personifications of these attributes flash through the pages. The play of mockery and humor comes in, it is true; but for the most part rather late.

It was reassuring as well as thrilling, then, to read of lovers' assignations in the church or in the shadow of the prison, since these two locales had only recently been drained of their power and menace. It was exciting to play with religious symbolism while shuddering at religious "superstition." Or one could give backward glances toward the customs and amorous pleasures of the old regime, reading, say, Gautier's "Omphale" or Pushkin's "Queen of Spades"; or remember, with Vigny, the military virtues of fortitude and self-abnegation; or glance, with Musset, at "Bohemia" and the kind-heartedness of grisettes; or hear, in many stories, "the tones of a piano" or of a violin: those instruments that were already becoming, in the hands of romantic virtuosi, "absolute" romantic symbols. Or one could imagine the secrets of some "insatiable" romantic hero, expressed by "sighs, groans, solitary walks, sudden paroxysms, incoherent speech, lethargic or feverish sleep." Madness, eccentricity, tuberculosis; abduction, rape, murder, poisoning: all these subjects appealed to the citizen reader. And throughout these stories the sound of tears is constant: "Tears streamed down his cheeks"; "Tears started to my eyes." Part of this weeping was fashion, but not all. The ability to describe and to enjoy the description of this open feeling points to hearts more vigorous and more malleable than our own. It is the freshness and exuberant youth of these tears that touch us, for we know ourselves to be incapable of them.

Naivete of this kind soon came up against its correctives.

Flaubert's ruthless insight into his own romantic youth produced the word "Bovaryism." And this citizen audience, even as it reads in its parlor and parks, is being observed—no longer with Balzac's type-casting eye, but with the insight of Turgenev and others. "Delicate pathos and subtle emotional nuance" are soon to replace the high colors and the cloak and dagger. The shift from the outer to the inner scene is about to take place. The search for some exterior symbol of mankind's yearning for justice and splendor, human if not divine, will still exist, but an inner set of symbols will be sought for, and found. Kesten's effort, therefore, in his introduction to draw a parallel between our own and early romantic times is a mistaken one. It is a different malaise which now afflicts us, and pure and naive idealism cannot be our cure. It is to Flaubert and Baudelaire that we instinctively turn—toward those later men who first succeeded in entering into the modern consciousness and the modern "scene," to plot out the complicated and terrible dimensions of both. And our questions, if we are sane, are no longer absolute ones.

LOUISE BOGAN

Typical Cartels

CARTELS IN ACTION. By George W. Stocking and Myron W. Watkins. The Twentieth Century Fund. $4.

TO THE extensive material now available on cartels this adds something that so far as I know is not substantially duplicated elsewhere. There have been attacks on cartels, defenses of them, and attempts to occupy a judicious middle ground. There have been analyses of the cartel problem to support a program. This volume contains a series of case studies of single representative cartels, showing the situation out of which each developed, its history, its methods, and the results achieved. Since the book attempts to offer no judgment or policy—that is to follow in a future publication of the Twentieth Century Fund—there is room for a reasonably full factual account of the cases chosen. The reader emerges with so much the better sense of the setting of cartel action, its place in economic evolution, the way its leaders think and act.

The cases chosen extend all the way from raw products to highly fabricated manufactures—sugar, rubber, nitrogen, steel, aluminum, magnesium, electric lights, and chemicals. They range from controls exercised for the benefit of small, numerous, and nearly helpless competitors to controls imposed to enhance monopoly profits by the practice of the higher stratagems of big business. Though I started to read it in the mood of one learning about economic processes, I found myself again and again fascinated by a record of diplomacy or intrigue. The ingenuity of the human mind in devising schemes for government—that is, for harmonizing the actions of individualists toward common ends—is in itself marvelous, no matter what we may think of the ends. Phoebus, for instance, the international electric-lamp cartel, is so much like a political state that it has not only an arbitration board but a general assembly.

I do not know what the Fund's committee will decide after reading this study, but at least two conclusions seem inevitable. One is that business men, by and large, simply will not compete if there is any way for them to act in their joint interest. The little ones who may be forced to the wall combine for sheer protection; the big ones do not want to risk their vast accumulations in warfare if they can pool their patents or work out spheres of influence. Cooperation, not competition, is the natural law of private enterprise. It is no wonder, according to the authors' estimate, that of 1939 sales in the United States, 87 per cent, by value, of mineral products, 60 per cent of agricultural products, and 42 per cent of manufactured products were cartelized.

The other conclusion is that the means of monopoly control are so highly varied, and are adapted so peculiarly to special industrial situations, that no general law could possibly be applied in such a way as to force businesses to compete, especially if they don't want to.

What happens to private enterprise in these circumstances? I hope the Twentieth Century Fund will be able to tell us.

GEORGE SOULE

Surrealism in Chile

RESIDENCE ON EARTH. By Pablo Neruda. Translated by Angel Flores. New Directions. $3.

EXCEPT for some slips, no doubt the result of occupational fatigue, the translations by Angel Flores of these pieces are exactly as good as the original Spanish. They are not extraordinary, in spite of what the publisher's dust jacket tells us, but rather what is known as "faithful." Spanish, unlike other Romance languages, is easily set over into English—unless one is dealing with exceptional writers like Quevedo or Lorca; and the confluence of style in Cervantes's Spain and Elizabethan England has not run dry even today. The Spanish language is beautiful; so far as pure sound is concerned the simplest phrase becomes a melopoeic marvel: "Favor de darme otro vaso de agua," or "Tenga usted la bondad de traerme otra toalla." The danger then, for a Spaniard with the gift of volubility and megalomania, is that he should lack one unscrupulously honest friend possessing a critical cast of mind.

In two hundred closely printed pages, representing fifty pieces Neruda wrote between 1925 and 1945, there are extremely few good poems. Neruda's verse is without form, usually rhetorical in the bad sense of the word. The same recurring surrealist props—"salt," "leather," "onions," "ashes," "sulphur"—make me feel that an elephant has swept his trunk around a grocery store rather than a storehouse of the collective unconscious. Ut pictura poesis; but one could wish that Neruda had seen less of Dali and more of Chirico.

The average of his output can only be indicated by quotation—I pick out the worst on purpose because even his best is inextricably mixed up with it:

It is feet and clocks and fingers and a locomotive of moribund soap, and a sour sky of damp metal,
and a yellow river of smiles.

or, from a romantic poem:

O Girl among the roses, O presence of doves,
O prison of fish and rosebushes . . .

Unfortunately I have nothing to give you but fingernails or eyelashes or melted pianos . . .

The ghost of Lorca's ghost constantly moves, uneasily and unwilling, between Neruda's lines. More overtly, the "Ode to Federico García Lorca" is a bathetic descant on the "Llanto por Ignacio Sánchez Mejías."

Its ending is egregiously condescending:

Thus is life, Federico—this is all the friendship of a melancholy virile man can offer.

Already you have learned many things by yourself and others you will be learning gradually, with time.

Neruda, a Chilean, was in Madrid during the civil war. The middle section of his book consists of political verse:

I have written about time and about water

I have described mourning and its purple metal

I have written about the sky and the apple, now I write about Stalingrad.

And I'm afraid this about sums it up. The men who did know how to write about the Spanish war—Ramón Sender, Antonio Machado, or André Malraux—are at the other pole of the ineptitude and presumptuous romanticism of:

. . . I have not forgotten your misfortunes, I know your sons . . .

O mothers transfixed by anguish and death, look into the heart of the noble day being born, and know that your dead ones smile beneath the earth lifting their clenched fists over the wheatfields.

His patriotic verse (General Song of Chile) is woven of the same texture.

Most of this book is a litter of the surrealism of 1924, by Dada out of the First World War. There was potential validity in the collages of Max Ernst, in automatic writing, in the rayogrammes of Man Ray, the papiers déchirés of Hans Arp. Also in the game of Exquisite Corpses played by the original surrealists in Paris, which Eluard called "collectively determined poetry." Five people would sit around a table. Each one wrote on a sheet of paper a substantive which was to be the subject of a sentence. After folding the sheet of paper so that the word written on it was hidden, he passed it along to his lefthand neighbor, who added an adjective. The next person added a verb, and so on. Results: "The exquisite corpse will drink the new wine"; "The dormitory of friable little girls rectifies the vile box"—the similarity of this to a great deal of Neruda's writing is obvious. These games, to be sure, were played by the most intellectual poets in Europe but only as a preparation for their real poetry. "Automatism," André Breton wrote, "is good because it is a sure method for the translation of one's interior irrationality, but it is valid only in proportion as it gives us communicable elements." He also said, "Modern man's reason sets as a goal for itself nothing so much as the continuous assimilation of the irrational."

Neruda seems to me to approach this only in the poetry written between 1925 and 1935, and here the ambience is symbolist rather than surrealist.

To the American reader, because these poems are only now available in translation, they have a historical rather than an intrinsic interest. In tone and spirit they belong to the Parisian 1920's; yet though they seem to strive after it, they lack the factitious paranoid fury of the early Aragon and the absolute, quiet, anagogic certainty of Eluard.

RENÉ BLANC-ROOS

BRIEFER COMMENT

. . . Unreal City !

WASHINGTON, that most puzzling, feverish, and unreal of cities, has never been properly set down in words. Such an undertaking requires the talents of a novelist, not of a reporter or historian; and American novelists, for some reason, have never been much interested in politics above the level of municipal corruption. We have nothing in our literature to compare with, say, the Gurau episodes in "Men of Good Will."

Jonathan Daniels has not written a novel, but he has something of the faculty he ascribes to one of his characters, a woman who saw the old Judge, as she saw all others, "not as a figure in history but as a character in the never-written novel about Washington." "Frontier on the Potomac" (Macmillan, $2.75) is meandering and often purposeless in form, and the style sometimes leans so far backward in the pursuit of casualness that it develops its own preciousities. But Daniels has an eye for character, an eye for significant detail, and a strong sense of atmosphere. Moreover, in an unpretentious way the book manages to pack in a good deal of information and of insight. The chapter on the Supreme Court, for example, is wiser than it seems and a good deal more to the point than most recent liberal comment on the court. Life, even among high officials and eminent politicians, is still basically human in its motivation. "Frontier on the Potomac" catches a good many private nuances in the government as it exists "between the human swarm and the constitutional abstraction."

ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, JR.

Changing Congress

CONGRESS IS LIKELY to receive more public attention during the next two years than it has had for a generation. Dr. George B. Galloway, who was staff director for the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress, is fortunate in his timing of the publication of "Congress at the Crossroads" (Crowell, $3.50). But there is still no evidence that the public has any real interest in modernizing the organization of the federal government.

Although most of the book was written before passage of the La Follette-Monroney Congressional Reorganization Act last summer, and part of it is an argument for reforms which are now law, Galloway's discussion of the way Congress works is not in the least dated. At best, the Reorganization Act is a small step toward bringing the machinery of the national legislature up to date, and it scarcely attempts to attack the fundamental problems of a representative democracy in the twentieth century.

Galloway raises fundamental questions, such as whether a representative should vote according to the will of his constituents or his own conscience, and it is no criticism of the book to say that every reader will disagree with some of his conclusions. It would be encouraging if any considerable number of Americans could be persuaded to think at all about such questions.

There is, however, some reason for the average citizen's lack of interest in the way his government works. Because the Republican and Democratic parties do not differ basically in political philosophy, both parties must try continually to anticipate, or at least to follow, public opinion. And they have succeeded well enough to make the United States almost the only country where practically all citizens are complacently satisfied with their form of government.

But the government machinery creaks more and more under the strains of an unstable world, and Congress in particular is poorly adapted to meet public demands for drastic change. In war or serious depression Congress tends to become a rubber stamp for the executive, and asserts its own authority almost exclusively by obstruction, practically never by initiating useful measures.

The framers of the United States Constitution undoubtedly intended to keep the government conservative by the separation and balance of powers among the Congress, the President, and the Supreme Court. Congress itself has accentuated this tendency by its own rules and traditions, almost all of which constitute additional barriers to change.

"Congress at the Crossroads" makes all of this very clear, with detailed explanations and case histories. But the author is not very optimistic about the possibilities of basic reform. Perhaps his book will help more people to realize that the mechanics of government are important, as well as the personalities,

CHARLES E. NOYES

Scientists at War

FOR THE NATION READER the value of "Scientists Against Time" by James Phinney Baxter, 3d (Little, Brown, $5), will probably lie in the direction it may give to his thoughts about the social utilization of scientific knowledge. It is a well-written and solidly documented history of the work of the Office of Scientific Research and Development. The first group of chapters contains an adequate prefatory account of the race for superiority in new weapons; the remaining five sections cover Development in Weapons, Chemistry and War, Military Medicine, Men and Machines, and the Atomic Bomb.

One cannot escape a certain melancholy in reading Mr. Baxter's description of the patient effort, the brilliance, and the remarkably sensible organizational methods that marked our scientific pursuit of the power to destroy. From time to time, as in the recent case of the synthesizing of penicillin at Cornell, one meets a ghost of the living community that was created but has now vanished. The effort has been virtually abandoned, and our national appropriations for research in peace time are almost nil. Indeed, it is an intolerably bitter thought that almost the only corporate effort being made by our atomic physicists is directed toward warning the nation that they have given us a weapon that may destroy our civilization.

"Scientists Against Time," however, provides a good deal of enlightenment on the problem of the rational exploitation of science. What emerges is the unmistakable necessity of free and independent research within any cooperative scheme of effort. It was not the controlled body of technicians employed by the great industries that provided the dynamism of the national research effort but the university staffs, the "pure research" men. There was friction, overlapping, and some waste, but, considering all things, vastly less than might have been expected. One concludes that neither an immediate utilitarianism nor a rigidly directed plan would be serviceable in a cooperative society, but that in some way the lesson of the war effort must be applied. The fruits of relatively free research must be readily available to the marvelous technological instruments produced by our industrial civilization.

RALPH BATES

Science and Sociology

ONCE AGAIN the desperate hope that there must be some means of applying the scientific method to social problems has led Dr. Kenneth Mees, a distinguished chemist from the Eastman Kodak Company, to publish a book entitled "The Path of Science" (John Wiley and Sons, $3). Dr. Mees's opening chapters deal with phases of the history of civilization, the growth of the latter being compared to a helix "in which the cyclic structure discernible in the arts is shown in the coils, and the cumulative growth of knowledge [largely scientific knowledge] is shown as the vertical component." Since the rapid growth of science is a matter of the last few hundred years, the helix model must be so constructed as to show coils close together during the earlier stages of history, and farther apart as we approach the present era.

Picturesquely speaking, so far so good. But now the problem: Since the methods of science applied to scientific problems have given us a large vertical component, why not apply such methods to the social sciences? This question has been asked many, many times, even without the help of the helix, and so far the results have been futile. What does Dr. Mees have to add? "Our efforts should be directed . . . so that we can adjust our social conditions continuously as the advance of science makes changes necessary." This is good advice provided Mees will tell us how to put it into practice.

Elsewhere he writes, somewhat sadly, that politics are "controlled by emotions," and political methods controlled by pure reason could only succeed if they involved a dictatorship; which is something Mees doesn't want; therefore, "we must improve the methods of thinking of the public." Again, how?

The chapters devoted to the historical development of the sciences are excellent. Like all good citizens who happen to be scientists, Dr. Mees would like to use his scientific knowledge for the betterment of the world. He is in good company: so far he is one of many first-class scientists who have not succeeded.

BENJAMIN HARROW

Diana Trilling's column, Fiction in Review, will be omitted for the next two or three months; Mrs. Trilling is taking a vacation.

STAGE PLAYS

RICHARD RODGERS & OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN, 2nd, present

"A NEW HIT."—Morehouse, Sun

HELEN HAYES

— in —

"HAPPY BIRTHDAY"

A New Comedy by ANITA LOOS • Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN

BROADHURST Theatre, Matinees: Wednesday and Saturday 2:40.

"A SURE-FIRE HIT."—Coleman, Mirror

ETHEL MERMAN

IN THE MUSICAL SMASH

"ANNIE GET YOUR GUN"

Music & Lyrics by IRVIN BERLIN • Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
with RAY MIDDLETON • Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN

IMPERIAL Theatre, 45th St., West of Broadway, Evenings 8:30, Matinees: Wednesday and Saturday 2:30.

"A smash hit of enormous proportions." — Ward Morehouse, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEATRE, 45th Street East of B'way, CH 4-4258
Evenings 8:40, Matinees Wednesday & Saturday 2:40.

"Must be seen. . . Warming, charming, chuckling."
—Morehouse, Sun

MAX GORDON Presents

FREDRIC MARCH FLORENCE ELDRIDGE in YEARS AGO

The New Smash Hit by RUTH GORDON

Directed by Garson Kanin
MANSFIELD THEATRE, 47th St. W. of B'way, CI 9-9056
Eves. 8:40, Mats. Wed. & Sat. at 2:40

"RATTLING GOOD THEATRE."—Atkinson, Times

JOSE FERRER

CYRANO de BERGERAC

FRANCES REID • RALPH CLANTON • HIRAM SHERMAN

PAULA LAURENCE • FRANCES COMPTON

ERNEST GRAVES • WILLIAM WOODSON

BARRYMORE THEATRE, 47th Street West of Broadway, CI 6-0390
Eves., incl. Sun., 8:30, Mats. Sat. & Sun., 2:30

MOTION PICTURES

MANHATTAN

ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
86th ST.
86th ST. & 3rd
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENCY
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

BROOKLYN

CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE
HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCK
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

BROOKLYN

BUSHWICK
DYKER GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT REPUBLIC
TILLYOU
Coney Island

QUEENS

ALDEN
Jamaica
MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Kelt's
FLUSHING
Kelt's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

MANHATTAN

COLONIAL
B'way & 62 St.

RKO NOW

"UNEXCELLED IN THE CARTOON FIELD."—N. Y. Post

WALT DISNEY'S
'SONG OF THE SOUTH'

IN TECHNICOLOR

Based on the Tales of UNCLE REMUS AND BRER RABBIT

— AND —

'CRACK-UP' PAT O'BRIEN
CLAUDE TREVOR

ERROL

ELEANOR

FLYNN • PARKER

'Never Say Goodbye'

— AND —

'THE BEAST with FIVE FINGERS'

Starring ROBERT ALDA

Andrea KING • Peter LORRE

BARRY FITZGERALD

DIANA LYNN • SONNY TUFTS

'Easy Come, Easy Go'

A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

In Person

PLUS

THE INK SPOTS ELLA FITZGERALD

EXTRA ADDED ATTRACTION

COTTIE WILLIAMS

And His Trumpet and Orchestra

NOW
TIMES SQUARE

PARAMOUNT

Midnight
Feature
Nightly

"★★★½ Breathtakingly beautiful"—News

ARTKINO PRESENTS

7th WEEK "STONE FLOWER"

LIFE "ONE OF THE BEST . . . IN EXCELLENT COLOR"

DOORS OPEN 2:45 A.M. Stanley 7th AVENUE bet. 42 & 41 STS.

Buy Your Books
through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price post-free if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D. No C. Q. D.'s outside of United States. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible. Make checks payable to The Nation.

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION

THE NATION

20 VESSEY STREET

NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

INSTRUCTORS!

Take Advantage of The Nation's
SPECIAL CLASS-ROOM RATE:

30¢ MONTHLY PER STUDENT

for orders of ten or more copies to be sent to one address — Desk copy is supplied free.

Address your order to THE NATION

20 VESSEY STREET

NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

Because

"In his book we have Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson brought up to date in terms of education, soil erosion, freight rates, the Tennessee Valley, and true democracy."

—HENRY A. WALLACE

People are buying

The Shore Dimly Seen

By ELLIS G.
ARNALL

● "You read this book not only with a sense of the excitement of the battles he has fought but with a sense of the exciting days ahead."

—Lewis Gannett

● "Ellis Arnall has written a book not merely about the South for Southerners but about America for Americans. If Claghorn can read, he won't read it. But its reading is imperative for the rest of us."

—Jonathan Daniels

● "The book is marked by the kind of drive and inspiration which Governor Arnall always exhibits in action . . . Inspiration and vision are found on every page."

—Thurman Arnold

3rd BIG PRINTING

At all Bookstores • $3.00

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY
Philadelphia New York

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

THE concurrent shows of the English sculptor Henry Moore (at the Museum of Modern Art) and of the late American sculptor Gaston Lachaise (at Knoedler's) present a difficult problem to criticism. Both demonstrate in opposite ways that style, finish, and historical relevance do not settle everything in art, and that no amount of facility or awareness can make good the shortcomings of what Croce calls personality.

Lachaise's is the more authentic talent; yet his achievement seems less complete and adventurous than Moore's. The terms he sets himself are narrow, but he fails, apparently, to satisfy even these—while Moore, setting his terms so much higher and wider, seems to fill them completely in an oeuvre already resonant with almost everything that twentieth-century sculpture, painting, and construction have had to say. And yet, still, Lachaise is the better artist.

Lachaise's bulbous distortions and his occasional fondness for the fragmentary should not conceal his relative orthodoxy: he was a sculptor in the old line, the one running from Egypt through Greece and finishing with Rodin, Lehmbruck, Despiau, Maillol, and himself. The new, "international" line, which departs from cubist painting under the influence of barbaric art, is an almost completely new kind of sculpture that incorporates and aims at pictorial effects and depends more on draftsmanship than on carving or modeling. Sharp profiles and plane surfaces are offered to a single point of view, in contradistinction to the old classical sculpture, which offers a monolith to be seen from many sides; flat variegated colors, lines and wires, open and sometimes geometric forms circumscribing empty air, in contradistinction to the classical play of light and shadow on unified, monochromatic surfaces; cast iron, sheet metal, and flexible alloys, in contradistinction to wood, stone, and bronze.

Henry Moore's sculpture represents a stage about halfway between the classical and the new—a stage, also, where modern sculpture becomes peculiarly obsessed with the archaic and the primitive. Moore's quintessential impulse is still sculptural rather than pictorial, but he avails himself of many of the stylistic means developed by Arp, Lipchitz, and the constructivists. His use of string forms and holes and, in his latest work, of flat perforated leaves of metal inclosing smaller and more detailed motifs is altogether in the new vein. At the same time he remains traditional in so far as he restricts his media largely to wood, fieldstone, bronze, and lead, and insists on "fidelity" to the respective natures of these materials. His large figures, invariably reclining and almost invariably derived from the female form, demonstrate his attachment to the past more obviously than do his smaller pieces, and the final effect, even in the latter, somehow discounts the actual presence of modernist calligraphic and detail, to leave one with the impression, hard to define but nevertheless definite, of something not too far from classical statuary.

Moore possesses no mean talent, and some of his later work, from the two reclining figures of 1938 (one in stone and one in lead) and "The Helmet" of 1940 (in lead) to the two bronze family groups of 1945 and 1946, will surely outlast the transient ardors of that informed contemporary taste upon which Moore's art is now making what I feel is an exaggerated impression. But even at best this work is not so original as it intends itself to be. It answers to perfectly the current notion of how modern sophisticated and inventive sculpture should look, without at the same time disappointing the popular demand for the heroic. (Truly original modern sculpture like Brancusi's makes the demand seem irrelevant.) Nor are the expected archaeological reminiscences lacking—Egypt, Central America, Africa, and even Graeco-Roman bronze figurines. The very fact that it meets our taste so ideally banishes all real difficulty or surprise from Moore's art. It is, alas, this subservience to taste that condemns him, along with Calder, Stuart Davis, Graham Sutherland, and sundry Anglo-Saxons, to the category—not as populous as might be thought but very popular just now—of the sincere academic modern.

The first number of a new London art magazine, The Arts, publishes photographs of Moore's large elmwood "Reclining Figure" of 1946 in three different stages of progress. Because a few of the possibilities exposed at each stage are taken advantage of in the completed work, with its curvilinear monotony and water-silk surfaces, one might conclude that Moore is a case of the inability to realize, of the failure of that nerve which is required to pursue the original sensation in the facof whatever warnings one's own taste may flash. But in the light of Moore's water-colors, which are obviously first-hand notations of feeling, one has to revise the diagnosis and conclude that, in spite of the photographic evidence, the original sensation itself is not very strong and that Moore needs his taste to expand it.

Lachaise's total work is very incomplete, and he never did quite affirm a style. But in his relatively short life he did affirm an artistic personality that has a potency and autonomy not yet approached by Moore's. The set of distortions to which he habitually subjected the female figure sometimes threatens to become a mannerism, and he could stylize along with the worst of modern sculptors—but feeling was always there, some current of emotion always penetrated to the spectator from these over-literal attempts to negate the visual sensations of mass and weight by means of form. We do not see the feeling give out—as only too often in Moore's case—halfway through a piece, so that from a certain point in space on the art becomes nothing but a fumble and a stammer, a helpless fingering of archaeological reminiscences or a supine surrender to the best taste (see Moore before 1935). Where Moore fails because his feeling is incomplete, or because he has not pressed himself to complete it, Lachaise fails only because he cannot organize his feeling to the very last jot and tittle. He hardly ever runs dry—not even in that series of stylized and repetitious women's heads in the first room at Knoedler's.

Moore will probably bulk larger in the history of contemporary sculpture, and for valid reasons, but I feel certain that in time to come there will always be a few people around to discover Lachaise in the corners of American museums and become worked up about him as no one will ever be about Moore.

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

THE difference between Bach's routine exercises of his prodigious craftsmanship and the occasional work in which that craftsmanship served great musical thought can be heard in the arias sung by Marian Anderson in the new Victor set (1087; $3.85)—in the several arias from church cantatas, and on the other hand the Erbarne dich from the St. Matthew Passion. Of the cantata arias only one, Jesus schläft, was soll ich hoffen from the Cantata No. 81, impresses me as having some real musical life in it. Miss Anderson is in good voice, and her singing of Erbarne dich and Jesus schläft is impressively eloquent; and there are good accompaniments by a little orchestra under Robert Shaw, with solos beautifully played on the oboe and oboe d'amore by Robert Bloom and on the violin by Joseph Fuchs. The performances are excellently reproduced; but surfaces in my copy are poor, and one side with the end of Erbarne dich wavers in pitch. And some of the space on the album cover devoted to glib background chatter should have been devoted to the German texts.

Neither the tones of iron that Richard Crooks produces with appearance of strain nor his crude inflection of these tones makes his singing of twelve songs from Schubert's "Schöne Müllerin" cycle an enjoyable experience (Set 1067; $3.85). Only English summaries of the German texts are provided—for lack of space on one album cover, we are told. But what about the second cover; and why not a separate leaflet instead of the covers?

Albanese's voice is lovely and her singing expressive in Ah! fors' è lui from "La Traviata" (11-9331; $1), and she doesn't pull the phrases out of shape as Sayao does on the Columbia record; but in Sempre libera she hasn't Sayao's brilliance; and her performance is not as well recorded.

Golschmann's performance of Mozart's Symphony K. 504 ("Prague") with the St. Louis Symphony (Set 1085; $3.85) is a good one. The sound from the first side of my copy is muffled; and this may be only a defective pressing, for the sound from the other sides is clear, bright, and lustrous, though not as brilliant as what I have heard from recent Victor orchestral recordings. In my set, also, the two sides with the slow movement waver in pitch; and surfaces are not good.

The brilliance I just mentioned is in the recorded sound of the performance of Copland's "Lincoln Portrait" by Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony (Set 1088; $2.85). Knowing the work only from a couple of performances I cannot tell whether this one is as good as it seems; but again I am bothered by the declamation—this time Melvyn Douglas's—of the passages from Lincoln's speeches. It is hard for me to believe that Lincoln himself declaimed them in that way; and even if it were established that he did I would contend that Mr. Douglas should not—in deference to our present idea of Lincoln

$3.75

SOVIET PHILOSOPHY

By JOHN SOMERVILLE

Columbia University
Cutting Traveling Fellow in the U.S.S.R.

"HERE is the book for which all who are worrying about how to get along with Russia have been looking. It gives us fundamental insight into the Russian way of thinking and does so with rare simplicity and clarity. The portrayal is a sympathetic one throughout, and true understanding in this difficult field requires sympathy. Criticism must come too, but it will not be relevant unless it is based on such understanding as Professor Somerville here makes available."

—Prof. E. A. Burt, Sage School of Philosophy, Cornell University.

At your Bookstore, or Use Order Coupon here
LIMITED EDITION ORDER NOW

PHILOSOPHICAL LIBRARY, Inc., Dept. N,
15 East 40th Street, New York 16, N. Y.
Please send me copies of SOVIET PHILOSOPHY.
at $3.75 per copy. Enclosed are $.....
Name.....
Address.....

rather than to mere historical fact. And despite Copland's portentous musical build-ups to the passages.

Less good is the recorded sound of the Boston Symphony's performance, under Koussevitzky's direction, of Khatchaturian's Piano Concerto with William Kapell as soloist (Set 1084; $4.85). There is excellent balance of orchestra and piano that allows both to be heard clearly in fortissimo passages; but there isn't enough bass to balance the treble, so that the sound is brilliant but shallow and thin. On the other hand the sound of the performance of the work on English Decca records (Set ED3; $9) by the London Symphony under Foulstouli with Moura Lympny has solidity and the depth in space that I spoke of recently; but the orchestra sounds too far back of the piano, which obscures it in fortissimo passages; and there isn't enough treble to give the piano its rich resonance and the orchestra its luster in the upper range. As for the performances, those who like the work—in which quiet interludes separate crescendos that are whipped up to climaxes—will probably prefer the sharper inflection and nervous tension and excitement of Kapell's playing. Surfaces in the Victor set are poor.

The piano is excellently recorded in Victor's set (1082; $3.85) of Chopin's Sonata Opus 35; but Arthur Rubinstein's performance of this beautiful work carries the traditional distortion of phrase to an extreme that is monstrous, and there is messy execution in some of the climaxes (e. g., in the development of the first movement). The same mannered style, but less extreme, is heard in Rubinstein's performance of Gershwin's Prelude No. 2, which is a more engaging piece than the dissonant "Saudades do Brasil"—Nos. 5, 9, and 11—by Milhaud that are brilliantly played on the reverse side (11-9420; $1). The surface of the Gershwin side is noisy.

Stravinsky has recorded for Columbia (Set 653; $4.85), with the New York Philharmonic, his new augmented version of the Suite from "L'Oiseau de feu." It adds the Adagio of the bird with the prince and the Scherzo of the princesses to the lovely music we are familiar with; but for no good reason I can think of it omits one of the most beautiful passages in the score: the transition from the Lullaby to the finale. It is an experience to hear Stravinsky's own accurate, clear, and powerful statement of the work, which is reproduced by the records with clarity but no warmth of sound. In my copy the side with the Khorovod wavers in pitch, and there are some poor surfaces.

Another Columbia set (651; $3.85) offers six passages from "Hamlet," spoken by Maurice Evans: O, that this too solid flesh would melt, the Ghost Scene, O, what a rogue and peasant slave am I, To be or not to be, the Advice to the Players, and How all occasions do inform against me. They are skilfully framed, so to speak, in music, and excellently recorded.

Letters to the Editors

Not the Same "Nation"

Dear Sirs: On the expiration of my present subscription stop sending me your magazine as I no longer can follow your brand of liberalism. It is no longer The Nation to which I first was introduced by the late Carl Schurz on September 11 or 12, 1898.

A. ROUSSELANGE

Hillwater, Minn., January 1

A Generous Offer

Dear Sirs: I have complete, unbound copies of The Nation going back ten years or more, which I would like to give to some school, library, or similar group which could make good use of them. I also have available several years of Harper's and some incomplete years (1929-31) of the American Mercury. Would any group interested in obtaining these magazines write to me at R. F. D. No. 3, Milford, Michigan? I will pay freight charges.

SIPHRA ROLLAND

Milford, Mich., January 4

A Question . . .

Dear Sirs: You have again exposed yourselves as the hypocrites of the day. You are thrown into a funk because a movie cannot show a Catholic priest as evil, money-hungry, etc. But who has brayed longer and louder than you against showing a Jew or Negro in an unfavorable light? So, you believe in tolerance and good-will for everyone but Catholics?

You have endless articles against Franco and Perón but rarely one word against the more oppressive "constructive" dictatorship of Stalin and his fifth column in every country. It must be degrading to have to operate under such a double standard of morals. Why not print this and let your readers judge your crypto-liberal lack of morals and ethics?

JOHN V. HOLMES

Augusta, Ga., January 8

. . . of Hypocrisy

Dear Sirs: In view of your editorial in your January 11 issue regarding the film "The Captain of Castile," I for one promise that I shall refuse to spend my money to see a picture that has been perverted from the original novel solely because of the opposition of the so-called "Legion of Decency."

OF INTEREST TO READERS OF "THE NATION"

THREE COURSES IN LITERATURE

Beginning February 5

ISAAC ROSENFELD

former Assistant-Editor of the "New Republic"—Author, "Passage from Home"

The Art of Criticism Wednesdays, 6-8 p.m.

EDGAR JOHNSON

Author, "A Treasury of Satire"

Satire: A Survey and Analysis Wednesdays, 8-10 p.m.

HENRY NEUMANN

Leader of Brooklyn Ethical Culture Society

Ideas and Ideals in Modern Literature Wednesdays, 8-10 p.m.

REGISTRATION OPEN TO FEB. 14—These and more than 200 other evening courses in literature, the arts, social studies, creative writing, radio, and technical fields are offered in the spring term of the DIVISION OF GENERAL EDUCATION, NEW YORK UNIVERSITY's school for adults. Veterans eligible. No academic prerequisites for admissions. For announcements of all courses, phone or write for Bulletin N, Address

Division of General Education
New York 3, N. Y.

NEW YORK UNIVERSITY

Spring 7-2000, Ext. 291

Further, until the company that made "The Captain of Castle" into a picture courageously issues its declaration of independence from this legion, and any other legion, and any other church, I shall view with considerable suspicion any pictures it issues from now on.

R. W. PENCE

Greencastle, Ind., January 15

How to Do It

Dear Sirs: You might be interested in the following practical symposium on housing, either G. I. or otherwise:

In the first place, housing for rental income must pay out on six years' rental occupation. The portion of the average person's income for housing rent, or whatever you want to call it, is one-quarter of the income, not one-sixth, as you stated in a recent issue.

I have converted large houses into duplexes for rental income during the last fifteen years, and I know what I talk about. You don't go to an architect, you don't get blueprints, you don't figure fireplaces and glass porches; you figure housing only—just plain sleeping and eating accommodations, and if you are especially flush you figure for a plain garage. You get down in the dirt yourself, you help dig the foundation, you chase material for the carpenter, you get dirty yourself. You don't go out for your morning coffee around the corner from the office at 9 a. m. and sit there until 10 a. m. on the boss's time. I worked for years, Saturdays and Sundays—lathing, cleaning up. You don't holler for the government to take care of you—the so-called building trades show up for work, cold or warm, rain or dry, and I wonder if any of the people talking glibly about housing have ever done a dime's worth of hard work. I know they haven't.

You know the way to save expenses is to get busy yourself: mix your own plaster, help the plasterer put it on, lay your own cement floor in the basement and garage. It is simple: you just buy the ready-mixed and take a two by four and flow it on just like the other guy has to do it.

The boloney about the mortgage lender is the bunk. If you are a good upstanding man and not afraid to help and work you can go to any bank and get a loan at 4 per cent per annum which is certainly cheap money. Too much golf, the ponies, and too much talk and bridge.

Hey what? FRANK HOLBORN

Oskosh, Wis., January 10

Building Codes vs. Progress

Dear Sirs: Charles Abrams's three articles in The Nation on Homeless America contain many constructive suggestions. My union particularly subscribes to his final conclusion: "The bottleneck in housing production is not the materials shortage but a misconception of the function of government." But we would substitute the word "perversion" for "misconception."

Mr. Abrams, while laying about him manfully, has nevertheless passed over lightly the greatest single obstacle to a rational solution of the problem. This is the mass of building-code laws and ordinances which blankets the nation. As is well known, local codes prevent the use of most of the standardized construction methods and other technical advances which engineers have worked out for improving the quality and lowering the cost of housing.

Nearly fifteen years ago, under the auspices of the Bureau of Standards, a model building code was drafted by experts and sent out to all state, county, and municipal agencies with recommendations that it be adopted. It was scuttled by the same lobbying interests that scuttled all other attempts to ameliorate the housing crises.

Hence it seems obvious to us shipyard workers, who see the dismantling of scores of great shipyards with their productive machinery and the turning off of thousands of skilled workmen who could be used in the production of standardized unit housing, that housing reform is fundamentally a question of political action. When the common people of America become politically conscious and organized it will be possible to do the job.

Until then the fiascos cited by Abrams and his plea for construction by public agencies will have no effect, except in those few instances when "war emergencies" or similar situations lower the guard of the vested interests in housing.

JOHN GREEN, President,
Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers

Camden, N. J., January 13

Is Good Prose a Crime?

Dear Sirs: I have just read Isaac Rosenfeld's review of "The Wild Flag." Since Mr. Rosenfeld draws upon Yiddish, I hope both he and you will forgive me if I drag another Yiddish word into your columns. The word is nudnik. Unlike the teakettle, the nudnik defies translation. But Mr. Rosenfeld will recognize the word and may serve as an admirable example of its meaning.

I am uninterested either in defending or attacking the New Yorker. Apparently, however, the trouble with "The Wild Flag" is that its contents first appeared in that magazine. That's a fine critical principle. Of course Rosenfeld is trying to establish a relationship between the publication where White's pieces appeared and the nature of the writing itself. But I have an uneasy feeling that our critic can't get the magazine out of his mind and "The Wild Flag" into it.

Since about 1940 I have nowhere found the argument for abandoning national sovereignty presented so eloquently, so lucidly, so persuasively as in the selections of "The Wild Flag." That the argument must still be carried on seems to me fairly obvious. That White uses rare talents to plead for world government, law, discipline is apparently obvious to Mr. Rosenfeld too. Well, then, is it a crime to use good prose for a desperately necessary message? Are only the ponderous sincere?

JUDAH GOLDIN

Iowa City, January 11

Planning and Paying for Full Employment

Edited by ABBA P. LERNER and FRANK D. GRAHAM

Can America enjoy both economic security and liberty? Some of our country's most thoughtful economists say yes.

In this book, they show how we can assure full employment without the "serfdom" of any much governmental control.
220 pages, $3.00

At all bookstores

PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS,
Princeton, N. J.

Crossword Puzzle No. 198

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Ghost with long teeth that haunts some Scottish castles
- 5 Soon wed, in the Victorian manner
- 10 Or rather the dunce
- 11 Affected with a teasing desire
- 12 Perhaps the greatest of Italian operatic composers
- 13 Pert, am I? (anag.)
- 14 Brilliant pianist—one of his daughters married Richard Wagner
- 16 Silent sea (anag.)
- 18 We shouldn't care to be struck by either part of this projectile
- 20 Go slow
- 22 Part of a closed car which could be thrown open
- 24 Not 14's instrument
- 26 "Though ----- to all things, for all things unfit; Too nice for a statesman, too proud for a wit"
- 27 Elits
- 28 It is cut to a pattern
- 29 Happiest part of the story—usually

DOWN

- 2 Brief tests
- 3 Feline intoxicant
- 4 To revile pig is a right some people have
- 5 You would be lucky to win him

- 6 "Stiff in -----s, always in the wrong, Was everything by starts, and nothing long"
- 7 The fruit that makes a heavenly drink?
- 8 Sort of battery that doesn't need topping-up (3 and 4)
- 9 All for flowers
- 15 The original amateur? (5 and 4)
- 17 Not a side-line of the pork butcher's for your money (4 and 5)
- 18 These are invariably English in Hollywood films
- 19 Did that woman call up for the stuff to make the varnish?
- 20 Split up into groups
- 21 Jobs, and where they are to be found
- 23 Pending
- 25 He was slain by Diana—or perhaps it was Jupiter

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 197

ACROSS:—1 FRONT DOOR; 11 UNCAP; 9 YAWNING; 10 DRAW OUT; 11 RUM; 12 MINING; 13 STUN; 15 MINE HOST; 16 AMPERE; 18 NATANT; 20 BLOOMERS; 23 HEIR; 24 EGGCUP; 25 ASS; 28 RETAKEN; 29 EPISTLE; 30 ANNAM; 31 SPECTACLE.

DOWN:—1 FOYER; 2 OF WOMEN; 3 TRIUMPHANT; 4 ORGANIST; 5 RED INK; 6 UNAU; 7 CHORTLE; 8 PATENTEES; 14 EMBONPOINT; 15 MANCHURIA; 17 BLACK EYE; 19 TRISTAN; 21 ELASTIC; 22 AGENTS; 26 STELE; 27 SKIM.

FOR SALE

"GOLDEN APPLES"

1st Indian River Citrus Fruit as Gifts or a Treat for the Family

ORANGES AND GRAPEFRUIT
Full Bushel (55 lbs.) $4.75
Half Bushel (30 lbs.) 3.00

Express Prepaid • No. C. O. D.

HONEY GROVES
Sebastian Florida

SITUATION WANTED

MEMBER OF COLLEGE FACULTY with extensive group work experience and specialization in psychology and education, seeks position on college faculty outside of N. Y. for summer session. Box 1681, c/o The Nation.

HELP WANTED

WANTED: Agents and Salesmen to sell the sensational leather coin purse—a quality item with instant sales appeal. It's a real quick-action, big-profit seller that sells on sight. For complete details write to I. DeKaiser, 1032 Oak St. N. E., St. Petersburg, Florida.

ROOM FOR RENT

PALM BEACH, Florida, beautiful room with private family, adjoining bath, one block from beach. Miller, 218 Peruvian Ave. Tel. 0526.

SLEEP AID

AMAZING SLEEP AID—$1. No drug. Stimulates deep breathing—relaxing—scientific. Deluxe Model Insulator—send $2. RELDAW, 1250 Broadway, N. Y. City.

LANGUAGES

LINGUAPHONE MAKES LANGUAGES EASY. At home learn to speak Spanish, French, German, Russian or any of 29 languages by quick, easy Linguaphone Conversational Method. You learn by listening. Save time, work, money. Available under GI Bill of Rights. Send for FREE book. Linguaphone Institute, 81 R C A Bldg., New York 20, N. Y.

CIGARETTES

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum 3 cartons. Price $1.45 per carton; postpaid. Send check or money order. ACE MAIL ORDER CO., East Orange 1, N. J.

MAGAZINE SUBSCRIPTIONS

SUBSCRIBE FOR PERIODICALS simply by asking me for them; any number in one order. Pay after I bill you at publishers' lowest prices. Catalog 'NA, Free. John Crehore, Walpole, N. H.

BOOKS

OUT-OF-PRINT and hard-to-find books located free of charge. Send list of wants to J. Thompson, 1 Hillside Avenue, Pelham, New York.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

SCIENTIFIC HANDWRITING analysis. Alfred Kanfer, 62 Leroy St., N. Y. C. Tel. WA 5-0956. Cooperating with doctors, psychologists, schools, firms, industries. Lessons. By appointment, evenings. Marital, educational, vocational, psychological problems. Fee $3.00.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 164

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 15, 1947

NUMBER 7

The Shape of Things

IN BRITAIN A WEEK OF EXCEPTIONALLY severe weather has added to the embarrassment of the Labor government, at present wrestling with the particularly difficult crisis in coal production, and set the Tory opposition to lighting votive candles for just one more week of meteorological proof that socialism won't work. In reality the British crisis is due to precisely those economic factors which the Labor Party has for years declared would overtake Britain. The British mines, ill-equipped with modern machinery, their plants worn out during the war and not yet replaced, have to supply an economy which differs from that of the pre-war period in an important respect. At present there is almost full employment, so that while coal production is up, it is unequal to the industrial demand. In addition, the arctic weather has frozen some pits and has blocked transport in the northern areas. As a result, even severe rationing will not stave off the closing down of a number of factories. The answer to critics, however, is not to return the mines to their owners of six or seven weeks ago but more and quicker socialism. At all costs the mines must be modernized, a task to which private capitalism is utterly unequal. Undoubtedly, the going is rough for the Labor Party. It may not have much faith in votive candles, but it might warm its hands by burning a few of the opposition's speeches and perhaps that of Sir Hartley Shawcross as well, for the histrionic Attorney General's cry that a failure to work miracles at this moment may mean the end of British socialism in our time was a first-class disservice to his party.

✱

WHEN THE RAMADIER CABINET TOOK OFFICE three weeks ago it seemed likely that Communist opposition to the Anglo-French treaty would at least cause postponement of the negotiations until after the Big Four conference in Moscow. Communist opposition has indeed developed, but despite the fact that a Cabinet crisis is brewing over this and other issues, M. Bidault has followed up M. Blum's lead with vigor. The principal obstacles to the making of the treaty have always been differences of opinion concerning the Ruhr and the nature of the future German state. It now appears possible that London and Paris will reach some agreement on the first point. Apparently the French are still firmly opposed to a strong central German government. However, British support for German unity, which in any case depends upon Soviet policy, may conceivably diminish in the future. At any rate, the Anglo-French treaty is now appreciably nearer realization. To judge by the manifesto of the French Communist Party, M. Bidault is heading for a crisis, for it is certain that Moscow will not willingly consent to the building of anything that resembles a Western bloc. In hinting that the treaty might be converted into a three-power pact by the inclusion of the Soviet Union, the French Foreign Minister may have been trying to sidestep this opposition. It is possible, in fact, that his remark, made in the French Foreign Affairs Committee, was a cautious invitation to Moscow. As such, it may appeal to Mr. Stalin as indicating a solution of the Soviet security problem. While a Russian step in this direction would probably embarrass many who now approve the Anglo-French alliance, there can be little doubt that a three-power pact would contribute to European stability and would lessen European fears of war between the Soviet and the United States.

✱

DR. LEONARDO ARGUELLO HAS BEEN reported an easy winner in Nicaragua's first Presidential election since 1936 as returns filtered in last week. This was foreordained, since Arguello was General Anastasio Somoza's vest-pocket candidate. Just prior to the election the Somoza-dominated congress passed a law which for ten days disarmed everybody in the country except members of the Guardia Nacional—the 7,500-man police force which has been Somoza's chief instrument of power in the tight little dictatorship he has maintained in Nicaragua for over a decade. In great measure it is an inheritance bequeathed to the Nicaraguan people by the United States, for in the twenties we used to shuttle the marines in and out of Nicaragua like Notre Dame backfields, and from them Somoza took inspiration for his Guardia. Under its guns, some colorful electoral procedures were introduced into the recent election: watchers from parties in opposition to Arguello were barred from the electoral tables, and orange cards stamped "I voted

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	169
G. O. P. Saboteurs	171
Palestine Ultimatum	172

ARTICLES

Georgians Have Had Enough by A. G. Mezerik	174
Landlords' Field Day by James A. Wechsler	175
Those Perverse Republicans by Seymour E. Harris	177
Death of Empire in the Pacific by Maxwell S. Stewart	178
Weizmann by R. H. S. Crossman	181
Journeys in South Russia by Alexander Werth	183
Catholics and Hollywood by R. K. R.	185
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	186
In One Ear by Lou Frankel	187

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Philosophy and the Police by Sidney Hook	188
I Have Seen It by David T. Bazelon	190
Perspective on Japan by Harry M. Johnson	190
Drang Nach Westen by Rustem Vambery	191
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch	191
Films by James Agee	193
Records by B. H. Haggin	194

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

195

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 199

by Jack Barrett	196
-----------------	-----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor

J. King Gordon

Literary Editor

Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 29 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

for Arguello" were handed to each person who did so. The value of these cards will become apparent when a bearer applies for a government job or favor. Thousands of Nicaraguans feel that the United States shares moral responsibility for their dictatorship: we have supported Somoza with military and economic aid, and in 1939 he was a White House guest of President Roosevelt. It is time he was disowned. Like many Nicaraguans, we feel that our State Department's condemnation of dictators and concern for free elections might be extended from Europe to our own back yard.

✱

DAVID LILIENTHAL'S DEMOCRATIC CREDO was a fine clean plant to emerge out of the noisome miasma of the McKellar-infested Senate hearings on the Atomic Control Board. And it is good to be able to point to David Lilienthal and say: "This is what we mean by American democracy; the other is a bizarre example of the witch-hunter and bigot that occasionally have plagued a society of free men." But it is not enough to write off McKellar as an obscene anachronism. The defamation to which David Lilienthal and his former associates on the TVA have been subjected is a warning that democracy can be debased and subverted when its privileges are divorced from its responsibilities. We do not believe that the Senate of the United States is to be judged by the character and actions of Senator McKellar. But we do believe its members, particularly the chairmen of its committees, must guard its reputation from the debasement to which McKellar has subjected it. Moreover, we feel that American citizens of the high standing of David Lilienthal should have protection against vilification which, outside of Senate walls, would bring its promulgators into the courts. Democracy must have its watch dogs not only against corruption and subversion but against those who by their acts bring into disrepute the very institutions which give it life and form.

✱

IN THE NAME OF DEMOCRACY, THE HOUSE of Representatives has voted to limit the President of the United States to two terms. The Senate, we believe, will serve democracy better if it rejects this ill-considered amendment to the Constitution. In the first place, if this country is ever ripe for dictatorship, it will not be saved by such technicalities. A Caesar in the White House would be a sorry specimen of his kind if he failed to rid himself of such legalisms in the first eight years of his power. The chances are that long before the third-term issue arose, the Constitution itself would have gone down the drain. On the other hand, the amendment would at some time or other almost certainly come in conflict with the popular will and work to the serious detriment of the country. Politics aside, there were few who seriously opposed Roosevelt's fourth candidacy at a crucial point in the war. And Jefferson, repeatedly cited last week as a champion of the two-term limit, opposed a rigid ban, even suggesting at one point that in the face of a dangerous monarchist movement he himself would feel justified in running a third time. In fact, the appeal to precedent and the Founding Fathers by proponents of the amendment seems to us peculiarly inappropriate. The obvious truth is that the framers of the Constitution, not to mention the seventy-nine Congresses that preceded this one, specifically refrained from freezing this sentiment in the mold of constitutional law. The sentiment itself, by and large, is healthy; but rigidity is not. Exceptions to the rule are in order in grave moments of crisis, and we prefer to leave it to the electorate to decide when such crises exist.

✱

IF SENATOR WHERRY'S REESTABLISHED Committee on Small Business means to get down to cases—doubtful in the light of the Senator's record—it will do a thoroughgoing job on the charges contained in the Federal Trade Commission's report on newsprint. Compiled back in 1939 at the request of Homer S. Cummings, then Attorney General, the report has been allowed to gather dust for eight years. Thanks to the insistence of Senator Murray of Montana and a few others, it has now been "cleared." "This report," Murray says, "is by all odds the most valuable collection of facts describing newsprint-industry practices of which we know." It reveals, among other serious aspects of the trade, that prices for paper are fixed at private meetings in Canada, where the collusion is beyond the reach of the FTC or the Anti-Trust Division of the Justice Department. It shows, too, that fully one-fourth of all the newsprint consumed in this country in the test year of 1929 went to three chains—Hearst, Scripps-Howard, and Patterson-McCormick. With the lifting of government controls, small papers, both daily and weekly, are fighting a losing battle against the exclusive arrangements between the big publishers and the big mills. Here is a grim threat, not only to small business, but to the very existence of a free press. It was Mr. Wherry who, more than any other individual in the Senate, did the OPA to death in the holy name of free enterprise. We will see now whether small enterprise is included, and whether it has been freed from sane government curbs only to be strangled by private monopoly.

✱

POPE PIUS XII HAS JUST "INDICATED HIS displeasure with Sartre's brand of Existentialism," and the Vatican's Academy of the Catholic Religion and of the Philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas "will conduct a public examination" of Existentialism, at Rome, during Easter week. What nostalgic memories of Bruno and of Canossa, of sanbenitos and of Grand Inquisitors, the wording of the announcement calls up! One is lost, in fancy, in those brighter days: one sees Jean-Paul Sartre and Albert Camus—the latter protesting feebly, "But I'm not an Existentialist!"—burning like toasted marshmallows outside St. Peter's. It is a shock to have to come back to the world of the Reverend Charles Boyer, the secretary of the Vatican's Philosophy Academy. Deprived of the natural weapons of the theologian, he has found nothing worse to do to Sartre than to say that he resembles Voltaire. This of the philosopher who wrote, "Le Néant n'existe pas"!—this of the logician whom the soberest of logical positivists compares to Humpty-Dumpty! The church's second team is getting nowhere—it had better put in Fulton J. Sheen. But it is hard not to feel, about this struggle between Existentialism and the Vatican Philosophy Academy, pretty much as Lincoln's old woman felt about the fight between her husband and a bear: "Go it, husband! Go it, bear!"

G.O.P. Saboteurs

PROSPECTS for the reestablishment of world trade on a comparatively free, multilateral, and non-discriminatory basis—a prime objective of American foreign economic policy—have never been more dismal. This is true even if Senator Vandenberg succeeds in his worthy effort to head off the raging, tearing campaign of the Knutsons and Butlers who want an immediate suspension of reciprocal-trade treaty-making and abandonment of the International Trade Organization conference scheduled for April. For to obtain a partial and temporary respite from the tariff-mongers, the State Department has been persuaded to make concessions to them which will seriously weaken its bargaining power when it begins negotiations with other countries.

For instance, it is understood that the State Department has agreed to include in all future trade agreements an "escape clause" which will permit either party to withdraw or modify any tariff cut which causes undue hardship to any industry. That is broad enough to render an agreement pretty worthless. Almost any industry which has grown up sheltered by a high tariff wall is apt to find the going hard when it is exposed to increased competition; its marginal units may even be forced to close. But if we raise tariffs every time such industries complain they are being undersold we must expect other nations to retaliate by making it more difficult for our most efficient industries to sell in foreign markets. We really cannot work out an escape clause which allows us to vary the terms of an agreement when convenient but holds the other fellow to his bargain.

Unless an escape clause is so circumscribed that appeal can only be made to it under most exceptional circumstances, it is bound to introduce an element of uncertainty which will rob trade treaties of much of their value. Suppose, for instance, we agree to reduce our tariff on British woollens in return for a British concession on office machinery. To take advantage of these changes, manufacturers in both countries will need to appoint agents, provide for stocks, and perhaps develop special designs for their new markets, but unless they can be sure that the lower tariff rates will remain fixed for some time, it will not be worth their while to take such steps. Even a permanently high trade barrier may prove less disruptive than one whose altitude is constantly changing.

By their successful insistence on escape clauses the Republicans have therefore already struck a heavy blow against freer trade. But far more damaging is the warning they have given to the world that in the event of a Republican victory in 1948 a drastic change in American foreign economic policy must be expected. They have made it clear that if the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act were renewed at all, it would be amended so as to permit the log-rolling which, up to 1933, always disgraced American tariff-making. Moreover, they have given the world good reason to believe that the nation responsible for the whole conception of an international trade organization might in the end refuse to ratify its charter.

In the forthcoming international negotiations, our representatives, therefore, are going to be badly handicapped. They will be attempting to sell the American idea of international trade to nations more than a little skeptical of its virtues, knowing that they may be repudiated by Congress. Under these circumstances it is not going to be easy for them to win concessions. The nations with which they will be bargaining are not likely to forswear their particular protective devices without a firm assurance that the American market will be a lot more accessible to their goods than it has been in the past.

The point which most Republicans, and some Democrats, have not grasped is that no country in the world today stands to benefit so much as the United States from a loosening of the chains that bind international trade. Within a few years American farmers may be in desperate need of markets for surplus cotton, wheat, tobacco, while American manufacturers of investment goods may well find that only a large export trade will enable them to keep their expanded plants operating near capacity.

More than that, no country in the world is so ill adapted to the alternative method of trading which involves barter agreements, long-term bulk-purchase contracts, bilateral deals of all kinds. Nations with planned economies can undertake such arrangements; those which cling to unrestricted private enterprise can hardly do so without seriously compromising their principles. Living in a past era, their eyes closed to the realities of today but their ears ever open to the bleating of protected constituents, Republican Congressmen are sabotaging an opportunity to promote world peace through expanding world trade. And by so acting they are doing more to destroy the free-enterprise system than all its avowed enemies put together.

Palestine Ultimatum

THE Jewish Agency has naturally and rightly rejected the British demand that it call upon the Jewish community for "cooperation against terrorists," and as a direct consequence of Mr. Bevin's appalling blunder Palestine is on the verge of disaster. It is not merely the "viable" state that is endangered but the whole fabric of Jewish society. The military measures already taken compel the belief that the British government is readying itself to suppress a resistance far more serious than that of the Irgun. Mr. Bevin evidently calculates that martial law will drive great numbers of moderate Zionists into active association with the Irgun. He is right. The ultimatum, which demanded of the Jews that they fight against a mistaken section of their own people without guarantees that British promises would be kept, will have brought many moderate Jews to the point of rebellion. And martial law usually leads to martial lawlessness, as last summer's campaign against Haganah proved. As a consequence of Irgun violence British troops are now in an ugly mood and have become strongly tainted with anti-Semitism. Alarmism and anti-Semitism have also been deliberately fostered by the press in Britain so that public support may be forthcoming for those "preventive measures" and "stern lessons" that are axioms of brass-hat logic. The propaganda of the Irgun shows that it regards its campaign as the beginning of a nationalistic struggle to drive out the occupying power. The macabre irony is that Mr. Bevin is about to justify the Irgun's revolutionary theory.

For what reason? Is it London's desire simply to suborn moderates and extremists alike? The question is a valid one. For surely no one could have been so naive as to suppose that the Jewish Agency would bow to the ultimatum. We cannot, therefore, rule out the suspicion that the whole intent was to rig the scene against the Agency and so to justify the use of military force. Hopes that the Jewish people would be offered an acceptable form of partition before the ultimatum expired have been dashed by the latest news from London. We write before details of Bevin's new plan are available but, according to the New York Times, it calls for two semi-autonomous states with a majority in each locality deciding which one it will adhere to. The result would be a fragmentation that would leave all real power to the British administration and make a mockery of self-government. Even though the plan includes provision for the entry of 100,000 immigrants within two years, the Zionist leaders reject it as worse than the Morrison scheme while the Arab delegation in London will have no part of it.

Procrastination has been the British vice in Palestine. The school of clear-headed betrayal has wanted Britain to surrender to Arab demands as the only way to defend its imperial interests in the Near East. For these people the Balfour Declaration was a mere maneuver, made in the mistaken belief that the now vanished Turkish empire would once again be a threat to the Suez Canal. An eventual showdown with the Jewish people has always been their aim. What may be ironically called the innocent school of betrayal has also dallied for strategic reasons. Since it was never certain that the Arab states would play the game according to the rules, it has tried to keep a foot in both camps by obtaining Arab consent to British promises to the Jews. The feat was clearly impossible, at all events after 1937.

The refusal to impose partition has encouraged the Arab opposition. And since the close of World War II British foreign policy in general has stiffened the Arab leaders' backs, for they have well understood that Mr. Bevin regards them as a barrier to Soviet intrusion into the Near East. The result of all the delays is that at the present time, when Mr. Bevin has swung to the side of the showdown school, not even cantonization stands the least chance of willing acceptance by the Arab League.

As the world is today, no ideal solution for the problem of Palestine can be reached. That would only be possible in a world of peacefully cooperative states. As things stand today, fulfilment of the British promise, or threat, to throw the whole problem into the lap of the United Nations would simply make Palestine the football of power politics. It would certainly invoke a new Anglo-Russian collision with both sides bidding for Arab support. Only if the question could be raised in such a way as to sidestep this rivalry would appeal to the United Nations offer a way out.

What, then, can be done? In the hope that wiser counsels may be made to prevail in the British Foreign Office Washington should at once declare that partition must be imposed. The United States is the only power that possesses sufficient influence in London. The two countries can well afford to grant economic aid to the Arab state that must also be set up in Palestine and so to win support. There will be costs to Britain. And if this means that the Arab leaders must be warned against resorting to war in Palestine, then let it be so. If this country is to put pressure on Britain, as it already has, then hard logic requires that responsibilities should also be taken. Blunt words might be sufficient to localize the struggle, for, after all, neither the Palestinian Arabs nor the Arab League itself are in any position to undertake a major campaign. That there are dangers in such a course cannot be denied, but unless there is an end to delay, the whole Near Eastern situation may become a peril to the world at large.

Georgians Have Had Enough

BY A. G. MEZERIK

Atlanta, Georgia, February 9

PEOPLE go to church every Sunday in Georgia. On this particular cold, clear Sunday the ministers used a text which came out of the state Capitol. They wanted to speak their minds on the great immoral thing represented by Herman Talmadge's usurpation of power and his insistence on the passage of the white-primary bill. Deeply troubled by the sin that spreads all across the state, ministers incisively declared their right to judge the moral issue involved in this theft of the people's rights, and the congregations were ready. In these last weeks democracy has increasingly shown its vitality until today, in one of Atlanta's biggest churches, a minister in a gesture of historic importance turned his pulpit over to a Negro, and the people understood the symbolism in terms of right versus wrong rather than in those of the old prejudiced contest of right versus left. In the town of McRae, the Reverend Joseph Rathbun, pastor of Eugene Talmadge's own Baptist church, stood up to denounce the white primary.

This Georgia rising, on the moral plane—quite another thing from legal or political argument—has been slowly gathering strength. It was seen when thousands of students marched on the state Capitol, and it was even more apparent when the Councils of Christian Ministers all over the state began to discuss the issues. It appeared in all its power when in towns like Valdosta, "wool-hat" stronghold in the center of southern Georgia, the councils condemned the Talmadge actions just as strongly as they did in Atlanta.

The organized ministers have suddenly emerged as the leaders of a new kind of aroused-citizens' movement. And the Talmadge forces are scared. True, they have the votes to win their victories in the Assembly, but they know they will be thrown out lock, stock, and barrel if the people think, as they most definitely do, that they are being robbed of their ancient rights.

The Talmadge forces have tried to stem the rising tide of indignation by marshaling ministers on their side. But so far they have succeeded in bringing forward only two who would say a favorable word for them. One of these was an aged, retired Methodist preacher without voice, pulpit, or influence, and the other was "Parson Jack" Johnson, who to the shame of many of the ministers of the state is the publisher of a hate sheet called Militant Truth. The two added another debit to Talmadge's moral ledger.

Talmadge may still have his wool-hats behind him, but the evidence piles up that by threatening basic rights he has aroused people in every walk of life against him. The kindled spirit was bright in the state Capitol on Thursday when those who were opposed to the white-primary bill had their day. Sixty-eight witnesses from the hills, the swamps, and the cities demanded to be heard. A veteran said, "We fought this war on the beaches and in the foxholes. We were fighting against this same thing you would now do—and I tell you now, we will fight that battle here and forever if you do this." (No post of any established veterans' group has come out in favor of Talmadge. Many have openly declared against him. John R. Williams, commander of the Georgia department of the American Legion, made a public speech condemning the methods by which Herman took power.)

A young woman spoke as a mother and for other mothers. "You are wise old men," she said to the legislative committee, "but you need to remember that we are not rearing our children just to be big or to be healthy. We are rearing them so that they will be able to vote also. Don't tamper with that right. You have told us that the people demand a white-primary bill. What would you think of a mother who gave her baby a bottle full of poison because the child kept asking for it? This white-primary bill is a bottle of poison, and if you are wise old men, you will know that you must safeguard the vote as mothers do their children." Other women from church councils, from leagues of women voters, and from clubs brought or sent their resolutions.

The old South was there, too. Mrs. Longstreet, widow of the famous Confederate officer, in a small voice charged with emotion condemned the forces of blackness which by disfranchising Georgia's colored citizens would shackle the white people and disgrace a proud state. The grandson of a former governor spoke his mind. Old South and new, men and women from the crossroads and the creeks, from schools, from big city offices, left chores, desks, and kitchens to denounce the violation of personal integrity which Herman Talmadge had inflicted. They came because they wanted to. They were not, in the main, prodded to appear by organized groups. And Georgia's liberals, who had felt so alone since January 15, when "Humman" captured the governorship, suddenly were uplifted and once more knew the pride that had been theirs in the years when Ellis Arnall was bringing progress to Georgia.

"Humman's" tricks were fooling few. They were evoking a resolute determination in the hearts of many.

The hysteria, the panicky feeling of the last three weeks, was giving way to a quiet confidence in the capacity of the people to quash "Humman's" presumption in a firm, orderly way.

On Friday, at McDonough, a village twenty-eight miles from Atlanta, a packed county courthouse listened intently as Talmadge's lawyers began their defense of his actions. The onlookers were the "wool-hats" who have been the backbone of the Talmadge movement and the town and city people who fought him. Neither group was tense; there was not the remotest danger of a fight. Everybody was listening, trying to make sense of the Talmadge attorneys' argument that the court had no power to review the action of the Assembly when it made a man who had received 675 votes governor of a state with 3,000,000 inhabitants. There was an implicit but perceptible recognition of the real issue. After all the talk was over, they would face the question: Could the court protect the right of citizens to choose their governor against a suddenly berserk legislative branch dominated by Herman Talmadge?

When the news came that a judge in Rome, Georgia, had, in a minor case, ruled that M. E. Thompson and not Talmadge was governor, the confidence in the court at McDonough was heightened. By Saturday people were beginning to use "Humman" as a subject for jokes.

"Humman," they said, had gone to a seance and had there communicated with old Gene. "Daddy," Humman said, "how am I doing?"

"All right, son," said old Gene. "But, son, go easy on that white-primary bill. They got a nigger fireman down here."

The humor was a sign that the sky was brightening and indicated no lessening of moral indignation. "Humman" had said he would not respect the decision of the courts, and people did not believe his recantation, made when he realized what a hornets' nest he had got into. The Cedartown Standard, a newspaper in the back country of Georgia, expressed the depth of feeling: "My fellow-citizens, if we as Georgians do not rise up and demand a return to a government wherein the people themselves express a choice, then we will have no recourse other than to submit our future to the whims and dictates of a clique that, drunk with power, will stop at nothing to perpetuate themselves in power to the eternal detriment of Georgia and the impairment of the solidarity of a democratic nation."

The editor of the Cedartown Standard can be proud of the standard he has raised and of his fellow-citizens. They are rising to a level of moral comprehension of this Georgia steal that promises much for democracy everywhere.

Landlords' Field Day

BY JAMES A. WECHSLER

Washington, February 9

BACK in November the National Apartment Owners' Association set up a $250,000 fund for a propaganda campaign against rent control. Shortly afterward George M. Engler, association president, wrote his constituents that the purpose of the drive was to obtain an immediate 15 per cent rent increase. "When this mission has been accomplished, we will be in a position to concentrate our efforts on complete decontrol—to be effective not later than June 30, 1947," he reported. The landlord lobby's program has now been embodied in legislation proposed by top-ranking Republicans, and only a major upheaval can avert its passage.

The Apartment Owners' Association is one wing of the well-organized real-estate lobby. The National Association of Real Estate Boards probably operates the most expensive Washington show; the National Home and Property Foundation, of which Senators Hawkes of New Jersey and Bricker of Ohio are members, and the Home Builders' outfit have similarly thrown men and money into the great 1947 push to blast the roof off rents. If they succeed, their local representatives may claim credit for a very neatly executed enterprise, though in this class-conscious Republican Congress a landlord lobbyist does not need unusual genius or charm to make headway.

The truth is that the most aggressive and fiery mouthpieces of the real-estate interests are men holding Senate seats. Watching the hearings of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, one frequently finds it hard to identify the players without a score card; whenever a lobbyist falters he is assured of rescue by Cain of Washington, Buck of Delaware, or some other Republican dignitary. Bricker, whose political career has been openly promoted by real-estate interests, nods so often as he listens to the rent-increase clamor that one almost expects him to burst into applause. Except for Senator Tobey, the erudite and earnest chairman, the Republican bloc in the committee has made an indecent exposure of its bias. The C. O. B. R. A. V. Senators seem to be sitting for a leftist caricature of men of property. Tobey opened the hearings with a gentle plea to the committee to heed the inarticulate voice of the people who live in slums as well as the high-paid representatives of the slum owners. This admonition has obviously failed to sway his associates.

JAMES A. WECHSLER is in the Washington bureau of the New York Post.

Yet the ineptitude and timidity of the Democrats have been as painful as the crude tactics of the Republicans. Apart from its tragic import for millions of people who cannot afford higher rents and face eviction if the landlords prevail, the rent battle has afforded a dramatic case history of the Administration's inability to exploit its minority role in Congress. The Harry Truman who jauntily engaged John L. Lewis in mortal combat shows much less belligerence in grappling with conservative business interests. After the Fleming fiasco the President again declared his own opposition to a general rent rise, but he has signally failed to assume a fighting posture. Not until last Friday, long after the Senate battle had got under way, was a bill introduced calling for the preservation of rent ceilings. The sponsors were two old progressive reliables—Wagner of New York and Murray of Montana. Neither of them can be considered White House representatives. On Capitol Hill Senators who might be disposed to hit back hard at the landlord lobby and its Republican allies are cautiously silent. They confess privately that they don't know whether the President wants to wage a real fight or whether he is just going through the motions.

None of them, of course, took seriously General Fleming's public explanation of the premature order for a 10 per cent increase. Some high White House figures were deeply involved in the deal. The suggestion that the President never heard the rumor until the mimeograph machines were running is utterly implausible. Dr. John R. Steelman—who achieved some renown during the last phase of the stabilization era as the boy who couldn't say no to any economic pressure group—was primarily responsible for raising the landlords' hopes; General Fleming deserved some but not all of the blame, and the President owes him a medal for chivalrously protecting everybody else. The identity of the villain is of less moment than the confusion that the White House has again displayed when confronting a respectable vested interest.

On rent—as on taxes—the Republicans have stepped forth publicly and pugnaciously as legislative agents of wealth and property. There is little camouflage. It is true that the real-estate lobby put on half a dozen middle-aged matrons to testify that the life of the poor property-owner is a difficult one, and six frenetic ladies impersonating the public have shown up faithfully at the hearings each day, to scowl at pro-OPA witnesses and smile benignly at landlord spokesmen. Beyond these rather faded props there is nothing in the scenery that can be described as popular support for the G. O. P. position. But opponents of the rent rise have been demoralized by the total lack of Presidential inspiration. The counter-attack did not really get under way until the hearings were almost over. The President has not indicated whether or not he will veto the Republican bills. He has not spelled out the issues. And his chief advisers seem deeply engrossed in other subjects.

If the President feels strongly about holding the rent line, his enthusiasm has been neither apparent nor infectious.

On the surface the most persuasive contention advanced by the landlords is that they have been the victims of "discrimination": everybody else, they protest, is now free to boost prices and profits; they alone are "frozen." The implication of the argument is curious. It suggests that a man who has been held up five times owes a moral obligation to submit without dispute to the sixth highwayman. Actually most landlords have done very well. The net income of property-owners has reached record heights as a result of maximum occupancy, curtailed services to tenants, and liberal individual adjustments granted by the OPA. Informed officials agree that the OPA has increasingly tended to act on "hardship" pleas, and it has just made further concessions. Moreover, the only compelling defense for ending control of other products—the theory that supply-and-demand forces would prevent runaway prices—is admittedly non-existent in the rent dispute. Everybody concedes that the housing shortage is no temporary emergency.

One item in the landlords' testimony throws a harsh light on the prevailing political morality of the Senate. Nearly every lobbyist has testified that "thousands" of apartments are being withheld in protest against OPA controls. The assertion is probably exaggerated, but the way the argument is boldly advanced—and treated with sober respect—as justification for eliminating controls provides a pretty grim spectacle. Thousands of veterans have no homes of their own; thousands are living in crowded, inadequate quarters. Now come the landlords frankly proclaiming that a silent "strike" is taking place to force Congress to boost rents—and nobody on the Banking and Currency Committee expresses any anger, nobody points an accusing finger at the strikers. The Senators seem overwhelmed by the unassailable logic of the case: give the landlords what they want and they will put a roof over our head.

There is still a fighting chance to stop the rent grab. Much depends on the swiftness with which protests reach Washington; and much depends on whether Mr. Truman is finally aroused. The Fleming muddle almost gave the landlords their bonus at the Democrats' expense and at no cost to the Republicans. If the Administration makes it plain that the G. O. P. will have to pay the political bill, second thoughts may stir in some cool Republican heads. But at the moment the landlord lobby is having a field day.

Those Perverse Republicans

BY SEYMOUR E. HARRIS

MESSRS. TAFT, Martin, Knutson, and their friends and followers are determined to cut income taxes by 20 per cent. In pushing these proposals they are running true to form. When the economy has too much money, the Republican practice is to give it more—as we shall see—and when the country is starved for money and short of demand, our Republican friends would take money away. It is as if a mountain climber, as he climbs and generates heat, were to put on more and more wraps, and as if when he descends and the pace becomes easier, he were to shed his clothes. He is bound to be killed by exhaustion or exposure.

Republicans are, indeed, about to commit a grievous error. Economists are virtually unanimous that the chief problem of the next three years is going to be one of excess demand. Public policy should therefore be directed to reducing demand—and the way to reduce demand is to take money away from the people through taxation and use it to pay off the public debt. The tax-reduction bill of 1945 was unfortunate, but it had some justification in fears that the economic machine would sputter for a year or two after the war and need tax reductions to stimulate demand. The new Republican proposals will find no such support from economic diagnosticians.

Republicans are always assumed to be sound-money men, and Democrats the supporters of fiat money, greenbackism, inflation, deficit financing, and the like. But the Republicans' record will not bear scrutiny. True, in the years 1921-30 they paid off about $8 billion of the public debt, and managed to reduce taxes as well. In the first five years of this decade national income averaged $65 billion and tax receipts about $5 billion. In the next five years, however, national income averaged no less than $78 billion, and average tax receipts declined to $4.5 billion. Was it sound fiscal policy to allow taxes to be reduced by a half-billion dollars, or 10 per cent, while incomes were rising by 20 per cent, while inflation was threatening; and the public debt was still around $20 billion? The Republicans could easily have raised an average of $1 billion more in taxes over these years, and thus have paid off $18 billion of debt and made it easier in the thirties to contend with depression.

Instead of reducing the flood of excess dollars which was swamping security, real-estate, and commodity markets, the Republican Administration, through its policy of tax reduction, further stimulated demand, thus helping to make the boom bigger and the following depression more serious. The final folly came in 1930, when under the sinking-fund principle in vogue—that is, the principle of paying off debt irrespective of the effect on the economy—President Hoover's Administration paid off a large amount just when it should have been incurring debt to keep the country out of a tailspin.

In the last quarter of the nineteenth century the case for greenbackism, bimetallism, and monetary expansion was much stronger than the historian or economist of today is prepared to acknowledge. Republicans then were ill advised, and Democrats on the whole were pressing for correct money policies. Bryan was more nearly right than McKinley. For twenty-five years the country had been starved for currency under a monetary system which was unwisely tethered to government securities, and which was proving to be inversely responsive to business needs, as government bonds were being redeemed. When the economic throttle was thrown wide open by the opening up of new lands, unprecedented technological improvements, and the rise in population, advance was substantially slowed by a sacrificial program of relative monetary contraction and debt reduction.

It is clear that we should not expect too much from the Republicans. They still refuse to acknowledge that public receipts and public expenditures are to be meshed with receipts and expenditures of the private economy. They still support debt reduction on abstract grounds; but when a policy can be supported for being consistent with the principles both of purist finance and of compensatory finance, the Republicans remain impervious to logic. They do not propose to pay off as much debt as possible in periods of excess demand or to incur as much debt as is necessary to support demand in a depression.

As a great Republican, Alexander Hamilton, said, "They declaim against a public debt and for the reduction of it as an abstract thesis; yet are vehement against every plan of taxation which is proposed to discharge old debts, or to avoid new." Even late in the thirties the Republicans gave evidence of their insincerity. Leading the fight to cut pay-roll taxes, abolish social-security reserves, and increase the public debt through a process of borrowing from the old-age and survivors' insurance fund were many prominent Republicans, including Vandenberg and Taft. Had they not succeeded, the public debt might be five to ten billion dollars less today.

The Republicans can also be expected to favor other policies tending to increase the debt. In the next ten years they will almost certainly try to raise interest rates. Their argument will be that with bonds paying high interest, the public will take them off the hands of the banks. Numerous groups are being organized in this country to get a more "satisfactory" rate of interest on government bonds, and a Republican Administration can hardly be expected to resist such pressure. Mr. Dalton has had to put up a vigorous fight to keep the long-term rate of interest in Great Britain at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Here the high-interest groups are better organized than in England, and they do not have to contend with a Socialist government. It is well for all of us to remember that a rise in the rate of interest of 1 per cent will increase the cost of the debt by about \$2½ billion per year—as much as a rise of debt of \$135 billion.

SEYMOUR E. HARRIS is professor of economics at Harvard University.

In short, we should fight all attempts to cut taxes now, to increase interest rates, or, in general, to set up a debt-reduction plan for the next fifty years to be carried out regardless of what the economy requires. The Republicans may talk also of reducing expenditures as a means of lowering debt, but unfortunately the area in which expenditures can be pared is very small. Savings on non-recurrent expenditures and some cutting of the military departments will bring the 1947-48 total below that of 1946-47; but to say that the budget can be reduced below $30 billion is nonsense. Of the proposed budget (1947-48) of $37.5 billion, $29.1 billion go to war and defense, veterans, interest on the debt, international affairs and finance, and tax refunds. How much can be cut from the remaining $8.4 billion? Very little in my opinion. And with their imperialistic leanings and their strong fears of Russia, are the Republicans likely to cut military expenditures to the extent suggested at one time by Senator Taft? A reduction of taxes by $3 billion to $4 billion will probably mean a corresponding failure to cut debt. The supposed gain from continuation of the excise taxes ($1.1 billion) is a gain in the sense that I can consider myself better off by $100 because I did not buy a suit which I never really intended to buy.

The Republican record is bad. They learn slowly. The ABC of fiscal policy which the Democratic Administration learned in the thirties has never been acquired by the Republican leaders. They are apparently not interested in the effects of government activity on the private sector of the economy. For a hundred years their fiscal policies have tended to be perverse—to accentuate both booms and depressions. Their plans for 1947 follow the same pattern.

Death of Empire in the Pacific

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

THE peoples of Southeast Asia are pushing irresistibly toward freedom from their colonial bonds. Indo-China has been aflame with strife between the French and the Viet Nam Republic. Negotiations at London have just settled the terms by which Burma is to gain its independence. Malaysians are vigorously protesting against the constitution offered to them by the British. In Indonesia there is controversy over the plan for autonomy which has already been ratified by the Netherlands government—amid a fresh outbreak of fighting between the nationalists and the Dutch.

Although each of the three great colonial powers is striving separately to salvage as much as it can of the advantages it formerly enjoyed, the struggle for freedom in Indo-China, Burma, Malaya, and Indonesia is essentially one struggle. Ethnically and culturally the peoples of all four lands are closely related. It is an accident of history that they have been parts of three different empires. Their common fate in falling under Japanese occupation stirred up the nationalist ferment that even before the war was present in each area in varying stages of development. Also common to all has been the presence of an aggressive Communist minority which has sought to turn the nationalist agitation into hostility to the West.

An interesting similarity of pattern exists, too, in the measures adopted by the colonial powers to keep as much as possible of the fruits of empire. The British have sought to apply, with the flexibility demanded by varying local conditions, the formula of autonomy within the framework of the empire which they have found so successful with the dominions. The French and the Dutch have quite obviously borrowed the British formula. Although both have shown qualms about using force to retain their imperial advantages, they have not failed to take advantage of any improvement in their bargaining position that has been achieved by their arms.

The broad issues of the colonial peoples' struggle for freedom are reasonably well understood in this country. But inadequate and incompetent day-to-day reporting of events in the press has led to much confusion regarding the immediate situation in each country. Reports of a "final" agreement settling all outstanding questions have too often been followed by stories of renewed fighting, without any explanation being given for the sudden change. It must be admitted that the facts have often been obscure and difficult to ascertain. Both in Indo-China and in Indonesia headquarters of the nationalist forces have been located in relatively inaccessible spots, and correspondents have been inclined to depend on French and Dutch handouts.

THE VIET NAM REPUBLIC

If we rely solely on dispatches screened through Hanoi or Paris, the current uprising in Indo-China appears capricious and unreasonable. On the surface there seemed to be no reason for the Viet Nam Republic to go back on the agreement of March 6, which recognized its independence within the French Union. Nor have official French statements clarified the picture. Jean Roger Sainteny, Acting French High Commissioner, termed the insurrection the work of an active minority in the Viet Minh (League for the Independence of Viet Nam) which has unscrupulously manipulated the "politically amorphous and ignorant majority." He declared that he did not know whether Ho Chi Minh, President of the Viet Nam Republic, was "an instigator, an accomplice, or a dupe in the conspiracy against France." More recently the French have sought to give the impression that the revolt was Moscow-inspired.

These sensational charges were designed to obscure the basic issues in the dispute between the French and the Viet Name. Although the March 6 agreement, signed under the guns of the French fleet, recognized the Viet Nam Republic as a free state with its own government, parliament, army, and finances, it left its composition indefinite. The wording of the agreement implied that the new state would include Tongking, Annam, and Cochinchina, provided these states indicated their acquiescence by referendum. Cambodia and Laos, which are sparsely populated and little developed, were to have a degree of local autonomy but remain linked to France in matters of foreign policy. The rich Moi plateau was to be placed under a special commissariat which would assure the dominance of French economic interests. At the time the French were apparently reconciled to this arrangement. A few weeks later, however, French policy suddenly shifted with respect to Cochinchina, the colony's richest agricultural area. Demonstrations staged in Saigon displayed the slogan "Cochinchine pour les Cochinchinois." On June 1, ostensibly because of their interest in protecting minorities, the French suddenly recognized an Autonomous Republic of Cochinchina, with a Cabinet of nine men responsible to Admiral d'Argenlieu, the High Commissioner. Of the nine, seven were French citizens. The purpose of this action, according to the Viet Name, was to prejudice the promised referendum against union with Viet Nam. The spurious nature of the autonomy movement seemed to be borne out by a statement made by its president, Dr. Thinh, on November 9 just before he hanged himself, in which he said that he was heartbroken at having led his adherents on such an adventure.

The French maneuver in Cochinchina appears even more significant if one examines the structure of the Indo-Chinese Federation as drafted by the second Dalat conference this fall. The draft called for an "Assembly of States" composed of ten representatives from each of the five native states and ten representatives of French interests. With Cochinchina separated from the Viet Nam Republic, the areas directly or indirectly under French control together with the "French interests" would outvote the Viet Nam forty to twenty. With Cochinchina included in the Viet Nam Republic, as the nationalists insist it should be, power in the assembly would be equally divided between France and the Viet Nam.

Like parallel movements in Indonesia, Burma, and the Philippines, the Viet Minh has social revolutionary as well as nationalist aims. Its program places great emphasis, for example, on the development of village committees elected by universal suffrage. These committees are specifically charged with the task of reducing illiteracy and promoting economic rehabilitation. The Viet Nam regime met the threat of famine in 1945 by a series of radical economic measures, among which were the temporary diversion of all fallow land and agricultural machinery to the use of any would-be cultivator and an unprecedented program of crop diversification. Local French opposition to the republic probably springs more from economic than political conditions. The Viet Name insist that the attitude of the plantation owners and the local French bureaucracy is primarily responsible for French intransigence with regard to Cochinchina.

BURMA INDEPENDENT, MALAYA STILL BOUND

Burma's political aspirations bid fair to be satisfied. Under the agreement reached at London it obtained the right to choose between dominion status within the British Empire and full independence. The decision is to be made after a new constitution has been drafted by a Constituent Assembly which will be elected in April. Serious disagreement has arisen, however, among the various Burmese factions, and there is danger that recent political disturbances within the country may develop into full-fledged civil war. U Aung San, leader of the powerful Anti-Fascist People's Freedom League, has come out whole-heartedly for the agreement, but he is opposed not only by the Communists but by Thakin Ba Sein, a member of the Governor's Executive Council, and U Saw, former Premier, whose pro-Japanese sympathies caused him to be arrested by the British in the early days of the war. As in Indo-China the situation is complicated by the presence of hill tribes whose minority interests, according to the British, would be jeopardized by their withdrawal. The chances of independence within a year, as demanded by a majority of the nationalists, appear to be very slim.

Scarcely any weakening in the ties of empire is discernible so far in Malaya. The new constitution which was made public on the day before Christmas contained no gift of independence for the Malayan people. While the British were forced to abandon the plan announced a year ago for placing the native states under direct British jurisdiction, the structure of the new Federation of Malaya, in which the rule of the native sultans and their British advisers is continued, and the retention of Singapore as a crown colony make it certain that there will be no loss of British influence or authority in the area. The new arrangement disfranchises Malaya's huge Chinese population. Though the existence of large numbers of Chinese and Indians has precluded the development of a nationalist movement comparable to that of Indo-China, Burma, or Indonesia, nationalist sentiment has mounted tremendously in recent years, and if the Chinese were not so fatally divided into left-wing and right-wing groups they would be a far more powerful political factor. It is generally agreed that outright independence is impracticable because of the deep-seated racial and national animosities in Malaya. But the rising demand for some measure of democracy and self-rule cannot be denied indefinitely.

THE DUTCH IN INDONESIA

In some respects the Dutch seem to have made the greatest progress of any of the colonial powers in reconciling their legitimate interests with the demands of nationalism. Perhaps this is because they are so weak militarily that they recognized from the start the impossibility of imposing a solution by force of arms. Although the British and Dutch occupation forces have repeatedly clashed with the Indonesians, they have never attempted to subjugate the interior and have limited their military activities to the areas in which there was a substantial European population.

The Cheribon agreement of November 18 providing for the creation of a United States of Indonesia linked with the Netherlands represented a striking triumph for Dutch diplomacy. The Indonesian Republic, consisting of Java, Madura, and Sumatra, gained complete independence in domestic matters, but the Dutch managed to salvage most of their pre-war economic privileges. The agreement gave them equal footing with the Indonesians in the matter of taxes and civil rights and provided for the restitution of foreign property and foreign rights. Thus the way is opened, legally at least, for a return of the great Dutch, British, and American cartels which dominated the economy of the East Indies before the war.

Borneo and the Eastern Islands have been made autonomous states within the United States of Indonesia, but as they are relatively backward politically, Dutch influence will probably continue to prevail. This influence, coupled with their direct representation in the proposed Indonesian-Netherlands Union, will give the Dutch a decisive voice in any dispute within the union.

Although the Dutch have on occasion denounced President Soekarno and other Indonesian leaders as "Communists" and "traitors," the Indonesian nationalist movement is somewhat more conservative than its counterpart in Indo-China or Burma. Communists played a fairly important role in building up the movement before the war, but they do not constitute its extremist wing. The extremists, who are strongly opposed to the republican government, are mostly the youthful leaders of local armed bands. A few, notably Soebardjo, who served as Soekarno's first Minister of Foreign Affairs, collaborated with the Japanese and were strongly influenced by their anti-white propaganda. The extremists are interested only in eliminating Dutch influence and have no common social program to advance. Nevertheless, an anti-Dutch policy carries anti-capitalist implications, since most of the plantations and oil reserves were in foreign hands before the war. The more moderate republican leaders have been careful not to advocate too radical economic reforms for fear of prejudicing their campaign for political freedom. In foreign relations they have turned toward the West rather than toward the Soviet Union. Russia seems to have espoused their cause in the United Nations without consulting or informing the Indonesian leaders.

President Soekarno has recently made sweeping changes in the composition of the provisional Indonesian Parliament in an effort to obtain increased support for the Cheribon agreement. Despite the opposition of many Dutch with heavy investments in the East Indies, the Netherlands Parliament approved the agreement by a comfortable margin. It is not at all certain, however, that Soekarno will gain the upper hand over the extremists and secure Indonesian ratification. Many Indonesians are reported to have been angered by the grudging spirit with which the Dutch accepted it, and the recent outbreak of fighting at Palembang has accentuated anti-Dutch feeling. Although both the Netherlands Commissioner General and the Indonesian Premier, Sjahrir, have announced their willingness to sign the pact, they have disagreed sharply over the conditions under which they will do so. If the agreement is not put into effect, the Dutch will find themselves in an even worse position than that of the French in Indo-China. Since the departure of the last of the British troops on November 29 the military situation in Java has seriously deteriorated. Neutral observers doubt whether the Dutch could hold their present positions if fighting again became widespread.

Inasmuch as the Indonesians have increased both their military and their political strength in the past year, the Dutch would probably have very little chance of regaining a dominant position in the East Indies if the Cheribon agreement were rejected. They might retain their control over Borneo and the Eastern Islands, but they would almost certainly lose their favored position in the fabulously rich islands of Java and Sumatra. If the Dutch were forced out altogether, the French and British would immediately feel the consequence in their territories. A sudden disintegration in the colonial system might occur which would create profound problems for our time. It would cast an immediate and heavy burden, for example, on the United Nations: a number of relatively small independent states would be tempting bait for future aggressors unless an effective security system could be worked out. And long-existing colonial economies, which have yielded great wealth to the Western powers and provided the basis of much of the world's trade, could not be violently disrupted without far-reaching consequences.

If, on the other hand, the moderates triumph and the Cheribon agreement is accepted, it will undoubtedly set the pattern for colonial settlements throughout Southeast Asia. Though the ties of empire will have been loosened, they will remain sufficiently binding to preserve the balance of power in the Southwest Pacific and to prevent an economic upheaval. Socialist governments in Britain, France, and the Netherlands may then take steps to improve economic conditions among the colonial populations, but the kind of basic economic transformation that is needed will have to await the development of effective self-government.

Weizmann

BY R. H. S. CROSSMAN

London, February 3

IN RETROSPECT the central issue of the Zionist Congress at Basel was not the problem of participation in the London conference but the leadership of Weizmann. Once before, in 1930, he was rejected by his fellow-Zionists, but he soon reasserted his authority. It is almost certain that if partition is imposed he will take the lead again, invigorated by his absence. Certainly he would be desperately needed in a Jewish commonwealth whose first job would be to fight a civil war.

American commentators tend to explain Weizmann too easily as the protagonist of "the British connection" who has been repudiated simply because Britain has broken its word and thereby destroyed the basis of his case. In fact Weizmann belongs, as did Thomas Masaryk, to the last great generation of nineteenth-century liberals. Both men were representatives of that national liberalism which provided the philosophy for the League of Nations. They envisaged a world order in which the rule of law, conforming to the interests of civilized great powers, would protect the rights of minorities and foster the independence of small peoples. Speaking each for an emergent nation, they claimed and achieved equality of status in the councils of the League. Because both of them were men worthy to represent a great power, by sheer force of personality they put the little peoples on the map of world politics. If 630,000 Jews living in a few hundred square miles of the Middle East can assert their natural rights today against a great power, it is due above all else to the leadership, the devotion, and the shrewdness of Weizmann.

Weizmann

As seen by Oscar Berger

It is noticeable that Weizmann, like Masaryk, is a scholar as well as a statesman. If he had never become a Zionist, his name would be remembered as a man of science, and what marks him out from his Zionist colleagues is his peculiar pugnacious detachment. Like Masaryk he will fight for the truth all the more if he sees it to be politically inexpedient to do so, and he will denounce romantic phrase-making even when by so doing he appears to jeopardize the cause. I first saw him in Jerusalem during the Anglo-American hearings. Nearly blind, with cataracts on both eyes, he sat before us like an aged but more magnificent Lenin. One of the Americans, Mr. Buxton, asked him how long it would take to bring in President Truman's 100,000 Jews. He thought for a moment and then replied, "Two or three years perhaps. . . . I do not know. . . ." I could see perturbation among the Jewish politicians behind him, who were afraid that he had given a point away. But Weizmann was not prepared to say how long it would take unless he knew precisely, and his answer, though it disturbed his followers, immensely impressed the committee, which had been sickened by irresponsible propaganda.

R. H. S. CROSSMAN is one of the Labor Members of Parliament who "rebelled" against the foreign policy of Ernest Bevin. He was a member of the Anglo-American Commission of Inquiry on Palestine.

Since then in many conversations I have noticed the same characteristic. He believes that it is the duty of a democratic leader not only to lead but to chastise his followers. At Basel, where he fought his greatest battle, he seemed determined that if he were elected President, it should be in defiance of every cherished illusion and easy compromise. All his life, despite the growing hostility of the British government since 1936, he has opposed every form of activism except illegal immigration, which he can justify because restriction of immigration by the authorities violates the fundamental law of the country. He has known that since 1939 he has been fighting a losing battle with his own people. But in his final speech at Basel he almost seemed to court defeat on this issue. Referring to the blowing up of the Jordan bridges last summer by the Haganah, he derisively asked whether the activists really expected the British authorities to take this lying down; and in another passage he jeered at Ben-Gurion, who has tried to steer a middle course, for asking, like the old Russian woman, "for a warm frost." Once again the superficial critic simply says that he is pro-British. But this is only a quarter-truth. Weizmann believes with all his being that for the Jews of Palestine violence is a crime against the Law, against themselves, and against the Jews of the Dispersal. And he continues to fight it with the intellectual fury of an old lion whose claws are still as sharp as ever.

It says much for the qualities of Jewry that for so long it has accepted the leadership of this intellectual titan who believes so sternly in the chastisement of those whom he loves. Even at the Basel congress, where he provoked the romantics almost insufferably, the delegates at one point in his final speech rose spontaneously and burst into the national song. The Jewish people, like the Russians, have a special admiration for intellectual courage, and that is Weizmann's special quality. For the sake of the truth he will destroy himself.

He first made his mark as a Zionist among the Russian students in Switzerland. At that time all the famous Menshevik and Bolshevik émigrés were there, dominating every electoral scene. Weizmann challenged them all—Lenin, Martov, Axelrod, and the rest—to debate, and for thirty-six hours on end they argued in Berne. "They had to call up Kautsky as a reinforcement from Berlin," he chuckles when he tells the story. After that his little Zionist group grew quickly.

This story is significant. Weizmann's political philosophy grew out of the conditions of pre-revolutionary Russia, and this fact has influenced the political development of the National Home. Even today it is dominated politically by Russian and Polish Jews. Money has come from America, money and technical skill from Germany and Austria; but leadership remains with the Slavs. The only great American Jew who ever challenged Weizmann's leadership seriously was Brandeis, who in the early twenties argued that Zionism need not concentrate on political endeavor. Weizmann fought him and defeated him. Today the real political protagonist of activism is not the American Silver but the Russian Ben-Gurion.

It may well be—I often think it is—that Weizmann's opposition to activism is out of date. If there had been no Haganah, it is arguable that the White Paper would have been successfully enforced by a British government obsessed by the Russian menace. But it is equally true that Ben-Gurion, without the steadying influence of Weizmann, would have led the Yishuv into utter disaster. For Weizmann is not a pacifist or mystic like Gandhi but a statesman who opposes violence on purely rational grounds. More than any other Jew he has a personal feeling for every man, and woman, and orange grove, and collective settlement in Palestine. The Palestinians are his children, and the death of one is a personal blow to him—the loss of one priceless cell in the embryo Jewish nation which he has nurtured with all the care of a scientist. Better than some others, he knows that the National Home cannot afford to waste the life of its children. If he is proud of its strength, his pride never blinds him to its desperate weakness. If he loves its democratic freedoms, he sees with merciless objectivity the corroding effect of secret conspiracy upon free institutions. If he fights for an independent commonwealth, he never forgets that a small nation will always require the protection of a great power and that the great power must be persuaded that its interests conform to the needs of the small nation. Weizmann knows that to cherish the National Home through infancy requires not merely devotion and money but the wisdom of the serpent.

But the National Home for him is not merely another small nation. He repudiates angrily analogies with Ireland and South Africa or with the American War of Independence. He knows that the National Home is unique because its citizens have left millions of hostages in other lands. Everything which happens in Palestine affects the Jews all over the world. He has no illusions about anti-Semitism. He knows the effects in England of the troubles of the past twelve months; and though he blames the British government, he realizes that this does not alter the fact that a murder committed by a Jew is more terrible in its consequences than a thousand Gentile crimes.

"Thank God," he once observed, "that there weren't twenty G. I.'s in the King David's Hotel explosion. That might have caused pogrom."

Often before going to visit him I have said to myself, "He is too old. History has overtaken him. Arthur Koestler is right. This is the political Ice Age, and the revolver is the new Esperanto."

For hours we argue it out, and then, walking home late at night, I realize that I have once again been defeated—intellectually. If this is indeed the political Ice Age, then all talk of a Jewish commonwealth is utopian. And I reflect that the future of the Jews depends upon whether Great Britain can prove that Weizmann is right.

Journeys in South Russia

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

1. Rostov and the Spas.

Moscow, January 15

THIS is an account of a tour I made in South Russia and the Caucasus last July and August. A Polish colleague accompanied me; otherwise I was unescorted. Of the main points of the journey I informed the Soviet authorities in Moscow in advance. But between these points I traveled unobserved, as far as I know, and wherever I liked. I traveled on local trains and buses, hitch-hiked, got lifts from army lorries. Only in Georgia, where ignorance of the Georgian language is a serious handicap, did an official conduct me through the rural regions.

Nalchik, in the foothills of the Caucasus Mountains, is the last large town which the Germans captured during their invasion of the area in 1942. They inflicted considerable destruction, though probably less—except for a few cities which were partly or wholly destroyed—than in other parts of the Soviet Union. This was because in January, 1943, they fled from the Caucasus even faster than they had invaded it.

The northern Caucasus is therefore relatively well off, and the southern Caucasus and Trans-Caucasia suffered practically no damage except for casualties. The line between the devastated and—relatively—non-devastated regions of Russia may be said to run somewhere south of Rostov, the gateway of the Caucasus.

Rostov stands high on the right, or northern, bank of the Don. On the other side of the mighty blue river are the immense and lush green fields of the Kuban, stretching two hundred miles to the south, as far as the mountains. All day long ferry steamers scuttle across the river to take hundreds of townspeople to their vegetable plots. Nearly everyone has his individual plot, where he "grew for victory" when the Germans were not there or grew to keep alive when they were. On the Rostov side is the dingy, half-destroyed dockland of the city, with its cranes, warehouses, and grain elevators.

Although there was little street fighting in any of the four battles for Rostov, the city is about 50 per cent destroyed. But it is a live city. Flying here from Moscow, you feel that you are in the South. The main streets are lined with acacias. There is much singing, laughter, and music in the town; the crowds are noisier, rowdier, gayer than in Moscow; the girls prettier. And though half the houses in the main streets are mere shells, bands play in all the numerous public parks at night, lots of people dance, and ice cream and lemonade stalls do a brisk trade.

The harvest prospects were unsatisfactory. Although south of Rostov in the rich Kuban plains the weather was favorable, in the Don country there was a fairly serious drought. Even so, apricots, peaches, cherries, and plums were plentiful in the market, and so were vegetables and milk. The market is a center of social life in Rostov, as is the badly destroyed railway station. Once a day the great luxury express from Moscow to Tiflis passes through this station—complete with barber's shop, shower baths, dining cars, and wireless. But transport is still at a low ebb in the Soviet Union, and only twelve long-distance passenger trains and fourteen locals leave Rostov each day. The shortage of rolling stock is still very serious and accounts for many economic difficulties.

Rostov had 550,000 inhabitants before the war; now, with only about half the pre-war dwelling space, it has 420,000. Most of the public buildings—among them the immense new theater built in 1935—were destroyed by the retreating Germans. The most important single industry in Rostov was the Rostselmash, the biggest agricultural-machinery plant in the Soviet Union, employing over 30,000 people. It was a very modern plant, producing tens of thousands of tractor plows and thousands of combine harvesters a year, and it prided itself on the social amenities it provided for its workers. I found it a scene of almost utter desolation. Only about one-tenth of the workshops had been restored. These were beginning to produce some new machinery, but the main work was still the clearing of rubble, mostly by German and Hungarian prisoners. The Hungarians, however, were about to be sent home as the Rumanians had been.

ALEXANDER WERTH is special correspondent in Moscow for The Nation, the Manchester Guardian, and the British Broadcasting Corporation.

The workshops that were in operation had either new Russian machinery or German reparations machinery. A number of conveyor belts were working. But the interesting point, as the director of the plant stressed, was that practically all the labor at the plant was new labor, and that the "old" people, who had been evacuated, with most of the machinery, to the east, would remain there, or at any rate many of the skilled workers would. It is hoped that Rostselmash in the course of time will be "doubled"—that is, a plant in the east will work with the old cadres and the old machinery, while a new Rostselmash will use new workers and new machinery. The expansion of other industries will be obtained in the same way under the present Five-Year Plan. But the shortage of skilled labor is still so severely felt, the director said, that he did not think production would be "back to pre-war" until 1949 or 1950.

For the restoration and rebuilding of Rostov there are vast and ambitious plans. Residential districts will be built between the main street, half a mile from the river, and the new embankment. Architecturally the city will be considerably changed. There will be much "neo-classic" architecture—a reaction against the "constructivist" and purely "functional" architecture of the thirties in the Soviet Union. Domes, spires, and cupolas will give Rostov a new sky line. "How long," I asked the city architect, "will it take to build the new Rostov?" It would be "patched up," he said, in five or six years; the completion of all the new "architectural ensembles," he thought, would take not less than fifteen years. He added that the Don would be deepened so that Rostov, with its potentially great export trade in grain, could become a port for large seagoing vessels. Also—and this is typical of all the planning in Russia today—Rostov was not to be allowed to grow larger than 650,000. The present tendency is against the "colossal"—in cities, buildings, and industries—and toward decentralization.

It was not easy at Rostov to get a seat on the "spas" train to the four celebrated health resorts in the northern Caucasus—Kislovodsk, Piatigorsk, Zheleznovodsk, and Essentuki. It was the middle of July, and the holiday rush had begun in real earnest—for the first time since 1940. "The crowds at the station in Moscow are incredible," said the woman guard in my carriage. "Permits are no longer needed for traveling, and there just aren't enough trains."

However, through the good offices of the Rostov City Council we managed to get two berths in a four-berth, second-class compartment. The other occupants were a very stout silent woman who was going to Kislovodsk for "a course of slimming" and a jovial little man, a party official from the Siberian town of Kurgan, who had been traveling for nearly a week and was also on his way to a twenty-six-day "cure."

Soviet Kislovodsk, the largest of the four spas, lies in a hollow between four mountains. Whereas Piatigorsk was badly damaged by the retreating Germans, Kislovodsk, with its sixty sanitariums, is almost intact. It is an enormous "health factory," where everything runs like clockwork. Lord Citrine's legendary "bath plug that wouldn't fit," which became for him a symbol of Russian inefficiency, is typical of many things in the Soviet Union, especially since the war—ordinary comforts are not something to which the Russians normally give much time and thought—but spick-and-span Kislovodsk is different. Its sanitariums prove that the Russians can do things as efficiently as any Swiss hotelkeeper if they want to, and have the time and the means. They are also very dull. Every meal, every hour of the day, follows a strict routine: the after-lunch siesta, the cinema show at eight, the glass of sour milk brought to your "ward" by an immaculate nurse at ten, the lights out at eleven. And in the once romantic park of Kislovodsk, round the celebrated Narzan spring where you take the waters, arrows show the paths that fat men are to follow if ordered a morning walk of twenty, forty, or sixty minutes.

These health resorts in the Caucasus are taken very seriously by the government. It considers them an important part of the industrial machine, designed to restore the full working capacity of the more valuable executives and workers. After four years of war many of these people are seriously worn down. They care little about excursions and sightseeing, but I have never known people who enjoyed the scientific boredom of sanitarium life more thoroughly than these patients at Kislovodsk, as they lounge in the sunny gardens under the poplar trees and the ubiquitous plaster statues of young athletes.

While all this affects only a relatively small number of people in the Soviet Union, it is part of the rational organization of holidays which the government includes in its industrial planning. If this year Kislovodsk was able to handle 100,000 patients, it will handle twice that number before long. And soon the holiday-makers here and at other health resorts—some needing "cures," others merely rest cures—will run into several million a year.

Kislovodsk

Catholics and Hollywood

Beverly Hills, Cal., February 6

THE thread that has held the sword of Catholic disapproval over the film industry appeared to have snapped yesterday when members of Our Lady's Sodality for Southern California announced they were going to boycott all movies for a month in an effort to "clean up indecent films." The boycotters have hopes of enlisting 6,000,000 Catholic students in a national drive to show Hollywood "we mean business."

There have been other signs that Catholic elements in the country have again decided to constitute themselves censors of communications. Several liberal news commentators are said to have been dropped from various radio networks because they dealt realistically with the Vatican in world politics; and the church hierarchy is making an outspoken attempt to impose its censorship on the motion-picture industry.

On January 17 Archbishop J. J. Cantwell, in Tidings, the official organ of the Los Angeles diocese, made public the following pronouncement on "Duel in the Sun": "Pending classification by the Legion of Decency, Catholics may not, with a free conscience, attend the motion picture 'Duel in the Sun.' This motion picture, to which the National Legion of Decency was not accorded the usual advance showing, appears to be morally offensive and spiritually depressing." An accompanying editorial by William H. Mooring asserted that the film indicates "the beginning of a new and dangerous Hollywood trend toward screen realism in which no regard is shown either for reticence or appeals to reason."

David O. Selznick, producer of the film, defended himself by saying: "I am particularly surprised at the Archbishop's statement in view of the fact that at all times we worked closely with the Production Code Administration of the Motion Picture Association. All suggestions made by the Production Code Administration were followed to the letter. The result was that we received the Production Code seal of approval without question." He further declared that the only reason the Legion of Decency was not given a print to view was the delay in receiving a color print of the film from the Technicolor plant, where the workers have been on strike for many weeks. No print, he said, was available for anyone's viewing until he was able to get one for the film's world première in Hollywood on December 28.

The important issue here is not whether Selznick has a moral picture or an offensive picture, but whether a small segment of the population is to impose its standards on all the rest—whether one group has the right to decide for everyone what is right or wrong. This brings up the question of the audience to whom pictures are to be directed. Must Hollywood continue to make pictures on a low intellectual level simply because some subjects are too complex, morally, for the immature who unquestionably form a large part of the audience? If the susceptibilities of children and clerics must be protected, can Hollywood ever make a mature picture, as the European films judged by most critics the best of the year's showing are mature—"The Open City," "The Well-Digger's Daughter," "Brief Encounter"?

Hollywood maintains a strong self-policing organization in the Production Code Authority of the Motion Picture Producers' Association, referred to in Selznick's statement. The authority was formed with the help of the Legion of Decency, the Parent-Teachers' Association, the Federation of Women's Clubs, and other community and religious groups, and well-paid members of these organizations keep a close watch to see that every rule is lived up to. Since the standards of the Legion of Decency were incorporated in the code, the Archbishop's pronouncement appears to be some sort of super-censorship imposed on an adequate existing body, a censorship which will base its decisions on its own whim rather than on defined standards.

The picture made from Samuel Shellabarger's "Captain from Castile" has aroused numerous protests by its distortion both of the novel and of history. The Legion of Decency could not permit people to see a cruel and corrupt priest on the screen or to learn about the evils of the Inquisition. The character of the priest in "The Fugitive" has also been whitewashed. Based on "The Labyrinthine Ways," by Graham Greene, "The Fugitive" is now being filmed in Mexico in both English and Spanish by the distinguished director John Ford. It stars Henry Fonda. RKO-Radio Pictures will release it. The novel presented the priest as a brandy-drinker with a mistress and an illegitimate child. He was none the less a sympathetic character, a meek man continuing to lead the meek to God. In the screen version the priest no longer drinks and the girl is the mistress of the pursuing lieutenant of police.

But as Sam Goldwyn said when he was asked about the Archbishop's pronouncement, "About this particular matter I can only say where do I get off to criticize the church?"

R. K. R.

R. K. R. is a Hollywood resident well acquainted with the motion-picture industry.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Chessie Chases the Fat Cats

CHESSIE, totem of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad, appears as a mild-looking tabby kitten in the advertisements, but in Wall Street she has a reputation as a general hell-raiser who delights in chivvying the sleepy fat cats of the railroad and banking world. For, to borrow from the language of witchcraft, she is the "familiar" of Robert R. Young, the Texas outsider who by brains, brass, pugnacity, and publicity has made himself a power to be reckoned with in the fields of finance and transportation.

It is now some ten years since Mr. Young and his associates picked up the Van Sweringen empire at a bargain-basement price and so acquired control of the profitable Chesapeake and Ohio and several other less flourishing lines. It was a very much encumbered empire at that time, and he came very near to losing it before the war-time boom in traffic made it possible for him to restore the solvency of the Alleghany Corporation, its top holding company, and of various operating companies. There were battles in board rooms and law courts and furious proxy-gathering campaigns before Young beat down the opposition of the Morgan crowd. Following the policy of if you can't join them, beat them, he carried the war into the enemy camp by successfully crusading for the principle of competitive bidding in railroad and public-utility financing. Now blessed by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Interstate Commerce Commission, competitive bidding has squeezed much of the gravy from the business of underwriting railroad securities, which used to be a practical monopoly of Kuhn, Loeb and the house of Morgan.

More recently Young has set out to reform the most depressed and threatened branch of railroading—passenger business. His advertising campaign to obtain "coast-to-coast" Pullman service attracted a lot of favorable publicity and won a speedy success. His bid to buy the Pullman sleeping-car service, however, has been stymied by the ICC, which, over the opposition of the Justice Department, is backing a plan for its joint operation by forty-six railroads. He is also facing heavy odds in opposing the Bulwinkle bill, which aims to exempt rate-making agreements by carriers from the anti-trust laws and which he sees as making possible "the elimination of competition in the railroad industry."

Currently Young's most spectacular activity is his bid for control of the vast New York Central system. In the past few months Alleghany Corporation has acquired 309,500 shares of Central's stock, or 4.8 per cent of that outstanding. This seems like a very small proportion, but it is nearly twice as large as the next biggest single holding in the company, the 160,000 shares owned by the Union Pacific. Commenting on this situation, Cyrus S. Eaton, the Cleveland financier who has frequently been associated with Young, said recently:

"From now on you can claim New York Central as Robert R. Young property." Young himself does not go so far at present. Testifying at a Senate hearing on February 4, his representative, Robert W. Purcell, was careful to point out that pending ICC approval of the transfer of the New York Central stock the Alleghany group has no right "to vote it." In fact, under ICC instructions, the stock has been deposited with the Chase National Bank as voting trustee, and Chase as it happens, has some rather close connections with the present Central board of directors.

To me, as an outside observer, this whole episode furnishes an illuminating illustration of the comparative ease with which vast enterprises owned by tens of thousands of shareholders can be brought under the control of one man by means of a relatively insignificant investment and so come to be regarded as "his property." Young and his associates actually own only a fraction of Alleghany's capital, but it is enough to give them a working control over that company. Alleghany in turn controls Chesapeake and Ohio through a 6.7 per cent holding of its common stock, and that railroad controls the New York, Chicago, and St. Louis (the Nickel Plate), the Père Marquette, and the Wheeling and Lake Erie. Thus thousands of miles of line and hundreds of millions of dollars of capital are tied together with shoestrings and manipulated by one man. And now another shoestring may link New York Central to his domain.

The question that I should like to raise is: Where do the real owners of these businesses, the ordinary, voiceless stockholders, come in? Are they consulted, or are they treated simply as cannon-fodder in a bankers' battle? For instance there is reason to believe that Alleghany is planning to transfer its New York Central holding to Chesapeake and Ohio. Are the people who own 92.3 per cent of the C. and O. stock being asked whether they want to risk their funds in so speculative an enterprise as New York Central? To the best of my knowledge they are not.

In making this point I am not singling Mr. Young out for criticism but merely using his case as an example of the way in which minority tails wag corporation dogs. There are, in fact, numerous major concerns in which the controlling group has a far smaller stake than Young has in his enterprises. American Telephone and Telegraph, for instance, is managed by a group with an infinitely small investment; its 700,000 shareholders do not have any real voice in its affairs.

Given a system which encourages the divorce of ownership and management, mavericks like Young are a useful antidote to corporate stagnation. Certainly his dictatorship over the Alleghany empire appears to have had beneficial results for the stockholders. He has cleaned up the messy financial structure of the holding company and reduced the debts of the operating companies. And he has introduced much-needed new blood into their management. On his record the small stockholders of New York Central, who have every reason to be dissatisfied with their present board of directors might well welcome Young's capture of their property. Should he achieve that, he has let it be known, he will first "throw the bankers out" and then concentrate on the problem of increasing passenger traffic. Next week I shall discuss his and other ideas on this problem, which is perhaps the most urgent facing the railroad industry today.

IN ONE EAR

BY LOU FRANKEL

THE new series by Norman Corwin, "One World Flight," presented by CBS on Tuesday evenings at 10 p.m., has now been heard three times, and a critical evaluation is warranted. In this series Corwin abandons the production methods he brought to so high a level and uses the technique of the "actuality" broadcast. To Corwin the step may seem a logical one, but to his audience, familiar with he Corwin use of sound and music and actors, and expecting him to strum their senses as he has done so often in the past, he change is at first disturbing. It is as if the late John Barrymore decided, without warning, to play "Hamlet" in antōmime. His audience would be caught off balance and spend its time wondering instead of appreciating.

That is how people respond to "One World Flight." Waiting to be moved emotionally by Corwin's words, by actors perfectly attuned to their parts, and by a musical background that intensifies the dramatic effect, Corwin's audience find themselves getting reality instead; and reality has many rough edges.

The program, as you probably know, is the result of Corwin's global flight last summer as the first winner of the Wendell Willkie One World Award. With him went a CBS technician and a wire-tape recorder. Everywhere Corwin went the recorder went too, except when it was in the repair shop. (Having lugged a wire recorder to the ETO as a correspondent, I know first hand some of the frustrations that harried Corwin.) Every voice, except the narration by the producer, all the sounds you hear were recorded on the spot. The noise of the Moscow subway, the cries of London flower vendors, the hammering of carpenters in Manila—all were real."

But in itself this actuality is not enough to provide top-notch dramatic entertainment. One misses such tricks as adding the sound of the plane motors into the singing of a group of Arabs, to give a sense of the swiftness of modern plane travel.* Corwin did this at the opening of the program but was never able to repeat it, for with tape recording there can be no rehearsals or rewrites, no "breathing life and feeling" into a scene. What you have on the cold tape is all you can get. So "One World Flight" is not Norman Corwin as we know him from previous performances. It is more like a radio newsreel full of bits and pieces, vignettes linked by the narration, with its recurring themes of peace and oneworldism.

Next Tuesday night listen to "One World Flight" with this in mind, and you will appreciate the ability of Corwin—and his courage too. Norman Corwin is no "tired liberal." He believes in Willkie's One World, and he jumped at the chance to rub elbows with people all round the globe. He resolved to let every working stiff, every white-collar man and housewife and fighting man in America hear just what their opposite number in other countries had to say. That is the strength of the program. From the lips of the people one learns of their passionate desire for peace and their conviction that peace can be attained only through acceptance of the one-world creed.

Unfortunately, the broadcasts lack the peaks and climaxes that tug at the heart and make the pulses beat. Perhaps Corwin is playing it that way on purpose. One of the best bits so far has been the Italian woman, on the first program, who had lost her father, husband, two children, and ten close relatives in the war. She spoke in Italian, but the pathos and hopelessness of her situation came through in her voice. Also good was the Australian stevedore who said bluntly, "I'm one of the aristocracy of labor," and explained without a trace of pompousness, "We lead in matters of progress." Then there was the man of the French resistance who, when he saw Corwin's pocket camera, said, "Many more of us would be alive if we had cameras like that."

Corwin's narration contains some striking phrases. As the plane was flying from England to France, he spoke of the fighting men, "lying beyond view with the English Channel across their chests . . . if those boys could talk they would go for the idea of a world made one."

If you are annoyed with CBS for putting Corwin on at the same time as Bob Hope remember this. In the first place, CBS does not have to go so far overboard on the investment as it would if it canceled sponsored time earlier in the evening. In the second place, it gets a "class" show for a spot that has had few listeners, owing to the competition. Thirdly, if Corwin gets a good rating with this show—which unfortunately he has not had as yet—CBS has a property that can be sold to a sponsor.

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE Nation

Money-Saving Magazine Combinations

with Harper's Magazine	$8.50
You Save $2.50
with Consumers Union	$9.25
You Save $1.25
with Harper's Magazine and Consumers Union	$11.75
You Save $3.75

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses. Canadian and foreign postage extra.

THE NATION by itself:

☐ 1 Year $6 ☐ 2 Years $10 ☐ 3 Years $14

☐ Servicemen's Rate $4 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage—$1 a year extra

BOOKS and the ARTS

Philosophy and the Police

SOVIET PHILOSOPHY: A STUDY OF THEORY AND PRACTICE. By John Somerville. Philosophical Library. $3.75.

AN OBJECTIVE exposition and analysis of Soviet philosophy and practice would meet a genuine educational need. Even a tendentious account would still be serviceable were it based on authentic fact. Unfortunately, in this book Mr. Somerville has written a crude piece of apologetics which would hardly warrant notice save that it treats of some subjects with which not many are familiar. The author pretends merely to report the facts and not to evaluate them, but at almost every point he justifies what he finds, answers in advance hypothetical criticisms, sometimes with derision, and, most culpable of all, suppresses relevant information.

According to Mr. Somerville, it is a mistake to say that freedom and democracy do not exist in the Soviet Union. The Soviet philosophers, scientists, and artists enjoy "freedom," but they define the term differently. Whereas our philosophers understand by freedom the right to follow the lead of intelligence and evidence to reach conclusions in independence of the state—Mr. Somerville calls this the principle of laissez faire in culture—the Soviet philosopher enjoys freedom from the individual responsibility of reaching critical conclusions about anything on which the state, that is, the Communist Party, has taken a position. The Soviet philosopher, he tells us, "does not want or need the freedom of laissez faire; he wants and needs freedom from laissez faire, from the consequences of what he considers philosophic irresponsibility." Similarly with respect to artistic, scientific, and political freedom. "The Soviet citizen would not wish to be free from the society in which he lives. . . . He does not want to be let alone by the state." In short, he simply loves his own freedom from intellectual freedom as we understand it.

The claim made by fascist dictatorships that their citizens are free in this sense, too, Mr. Somerville disallows on the ground that the two dictatorships are not identical. This is perfectly true, but neither were the dictatorships of Mussolini and Hitler identical. The author is guilty of the elementary logical error of assuming that because two things are not identical, none of their features or relations can be the same. Assuming the correctness of his assertion that this is the kind of freedom Soviet citizens want, what he does not explain is why a secret police is necessary, why the periodic purges, why the absence of free speech and press. After all, if the "vast majority" freely desire the rule of the Communist Party, as he claims, nothing could be easier than to give them an opportunity to accept or reject it.

Before going on to more important matters, I wish to give an illustration of how threadbare Mr. Somerville's apologetics are. He denies that the Soviet Union can properly be called "totalitarian," if we mean by that the rule of a one-party political system. For, he argues, this is to overlook the fact that the aims of Soviet one-party rule are different from the aims of fascist one-party rule. However, "if the totalitarian means, given to planning, then it could be properly applied to the Soviet Union." But this is false usage of his own principle since fascist dictatorships plan, too. If it is illegitimate to call the Soviet Union totalitarian in the first sense, it is illegitimate in the second. By the same principle could not be called either a dictatorship or a democracy. The principle would render us speechless.

No matter how we characterize the Soviet Union, the essential point is what occurs there. And on this Mr. Somerville is a very unreliable guide. His chapter on the Soviet arts summarizes some of the discussions on the nature of art but says not a word—and this in a book devoted to Soviet practice—about the ruthless suppression of any literary tendency considered unhealthy by Communist Party functionaries. The nearest he comes to intimating that the Soviet arts are in effect subject to police control is in this masterful understatement: "In newspapers and magazines, on stage and screen, in the popular and fine arts of the Soviet Union there is a strong sense of ideological direction." But he eloquently silent about what happens to those who stray from this direction, about the fate of a long line of literary men from Pilniak to Zoschenko. Here the official Communist Party press is much more honest than Mr. Somerville. Item from decree of August 14, 1946: "The Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union decrees. The editors of Zvezda are to correct the line of the magazine . . . while forbidding access to the magazine for the works of Zoschenko, Akhmatova, and others like them. . . . Comrade A. M. Egorin is appointed editor-in-chief of Zvezda while retaining his functions as acting chief of the Propaganda Administration of the Communist Party."

It is in the fields of philosophy and social science, about which Mr. Somerville professes to know most, that his distortions are the most flagrant—and this in both theory and practice. According to him, if a Soviet philosopher runs foul of the shifting party line he is sweetly reasoned with until he sees the error of his ways. "Soviet problems and conditions have not been such as to make dissent seem like a value in itself," he coyly observes. He then adds: "The principle acted on in the Soviet Union is not that the holding of incorrect philosophical views by a given individual must result in dangerous political activity. If such were the principle all the philosophers criticized in important controversies . . . would have come under political charges." This is disingenuous in the extreme because the point is, as Mr. Somerville very well knows, that unless they recant, like Deborin all who deviate in any field of culture do come under political charges and disappear—to mention just a few, Slutski, Riazanov, Sorin, Adoratsky. Mr. Somerville cannot point to a single philosopher or social scientist who has refused to recant who is not either dead or in a concentration camp.

The principle acted on in the Soviet Union is the precis-posite of the one stated by Somerville. Philosophical deviation, indeed all theoretical deviation, must lead to dangerous political activity according to official doctrine. This doctrine was introduced by Stalin himself and enunciated most clearly by Mitin, his leading spokesman, who wrote: "When one speaks of the new phase of development in dialectical materialism one must stress with special emphasis the Leninist principle of the party character of philosophy, natural science, and science in general. The principle is a further development of the Marxist proposition concerning the class character of science and philosophy." From the party character of philosophy and science, and the view that there is an indissoluble unity between theory and practice, it follows that any philosophical deviation, unless checked by the state, that is, the police power, must lead to anti-party activity. This is of course a political offense—sometimes a capital offense. If there is any doubt about this connection between philosophical deviation and dangerous political activity, the official resolution of the Bureau of the Moscow Institute of Red Professors made it clear years ago: "The smallest deviation from the true Marxist Leninist positions even in the most abstract questions of theory is acquiring today an important political significance, exhibiting a decided class orientation, which is ultimately directed against the dictatorship of the workers."

Needless to say, Mr. Somerville does not quote these passages. What is worse, he remains silent about the slogan for the bolshevization of philosophy," which is still official doctrine. This was launched at the time Stalin discovered that Deborin was guilty of "menshevizing idealism." The latter recanted in the classic manner of the defendants in the subsequent Moscow trials. "What is demanded of us is a complete and unconditional capitulation. This is also my point of view. We menshevizing idealists must completely disarm ourselves. We must be grateful to the Central Committee and above all to our leader Stalin for having exposed us in time and for having given us an opportunity to correct and get rid of our mistakes."

In fact, it is the party character of philosophy and science which logically explains why there is a party line in all fields of culture from art to astronomy. As late as December, 1938, the denial of the "infinity of the universe with respect to space as well as time" was castigated as "counter-revolutionary bourgeois ideology." And a few years earlier Colman wrote: "It is our party and our leader, Stalin, who directs from the position and in the spirit of Lenin all our sciences, including the physical sciences." The most reliable account of the period in Russian philosophy Mr. Somerville discusses will be found in a series of articles by Jerome Rosenthal, the outstanding American authority on the subject, in the Modern Monthly for 1936.

Even where philosophy is free from laissez faire, to use Mr. Somerville's language, great philosophical syntheses have been produced in the past—for example, the works of Aquinas and Scotus. And there is no a priori reason why the Soviet ideologists may not produce something impressive. But on the evidence assembled by Mr. Somerville that day is still far away.

SIDNEY HOOK

Three distinguished new volumes in The Viking PORTABLE LIBRARY

THE PORTABLE D. H. Lawrence

"A perfect introduction to Lawrence."—The New Yorker. Here are eight novelettes and stories; complete episodes from two novels; travel pieces, essays, reviews, and 23 personal letters.

Edited by Diana Trilling

THE PORTABLE James Joyce

Four of Joyce's six books are reprinted here complete: A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man, Collected Poems, Exiles, and Dubliners. In addition, there are generous selections from Ulysses and Finnegans Wake.

Edited by Harry Levin

THE PORTABLE Maupassant

In addition to a complete novel and 24 stories, this superb cross-section of his writings includes a group of little-known and revealing personal letters, translated here for the first time.

Edited by Lewis Galantière

Ask your bookseller for a complete list of these original one-volume editions of the best in modern and classic literature. They average 700 compact pages; each volume is $2.

THE VIKING PRESS

18 East 48th Street, New York 17, N. Y.

I Have Seen It

HOW IT HAPPENS. Talk About the German People, 1914-1933, with Erna von Pustau. By Pearl S. Buck. The John Day Company. $3.

IT IS not very often that a reviewer has the pleasure of offering a full recommendation of a book: it can be said simply that Erna von Pustau's personal, conversational account of the decaying of German society cannot be read too widely, especially in America. "How It Happens" is nowhere uninteresting, and in total it is both revealing and significant.

The informal and intimate method of simple conversation which Miss Buck has chosen is a surprisingly effective one. Its greatest virtue is its absolute lack of pretension. The book is not, and does not pretend to be, a complete story of anything—not even of Erna von Pustau's life in Germany. As a matter of fact, it is difficult to describe concisely just what is contained between the covers of "How It Happens." There is certainly the German woman's autobiography; and a history of the social and political decay of her middle-class family; an accurate description of the milestones along the course of a deathbound generation; a rather close account of the making of a radical in Weimar Germany; a presentation of the facts, personal and objective, of war, inflation, and the rise of fascism. (The failure of socialism is not chronicled with adequate detail or insight—in part, by mistaken choice of the authors, I am sure.) Primarily, perhaps, the book contains just the conversation—the monologue, really—of an earnest, sensitive, well-instructed woman who happens to have something terribly important to say.

(To avoid misunderstanding, it may be important to say that no question of art or literature exists here. "How It Happens" is not even much of a document for historians. Dozens, maybe hundreds, of German refugees could have told a similar story, and with an equal amount of honesty and perception.)

Miss Buck, who happily acts as prompter rather than participant, makes only one point of the German woman's story: this is how it happens, she says—in Germany, and maybe in the United States also. It is a very well-taken point.

Erna von Pustau's account is largely from a bourgeois point of view, and concerns the deterioration—the ripening for fascism—of a normal bourgeois family. In America there is so much prosperity that the process of decay goes on chiefly under the surface; but only the wilfully blind will fail to see the relevance of the German experience. As late as 1928 the official Social Democratic leaders were counting on a continuing period of prosperity in Germany. Hitler possessed no greater weapon than this monumental, criminal innocence of the progressive powers.

Fascism can take up its task of destroying a people only after the left has failed to seize power, or to use that power to introduce the socialist resolution of modern problems. This remains the deepest truth about fascism.

DAVID T. BAZELON

Perspective on Japan

THE CHRYSANTHEMUM AND THE SWORD. Patterns of Japanese Culture. By Ruth Benedict. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

IN HER latest book, a fruit of her researches in OWI during the war, Miss Benedict shows us once again, in a new field, that the well-founded theory of the essential biological similarity of all races does not mean that "human nature" is everywhere the same.

It would be difficult to imagine a society with a more elaborate code of conventional behavior than that of Japan; the necessity of satisfying countless exacting requirements, which sometimes leads to moral conflicts that can be resolved only by suicide, always imposes the burden of infinite circumspection. The famous Japanese politeness is a mechanism for obviating, as far as possible, the more drastic exactions of the code. Miss Benedict does not give us, however, the usual anthropological description of a society, with a separate chapter on kinship, one on government, and so forth. She seems to be interested in specific-role patterns mainly as data for something else—the exposition of underlying half-conscious premises and patterns of response, patterns connected, to be sure, with the expectations making up adult roles but dependent also on tradition and childhood training; patterns that, once explained, help us understand Japanese responses in new as well as in stereotyped, situations. Not only are the old and familiar contradictions between loyalty and "treachery" between tact and cruelty, resolved for us, but we come to understand better the unexpected cooperativeness with which the Japanese have reacted to occupation, despite their previous, equal genuine determination to fight us to the death.

The peculiar plan of the book, however, has certain limitations as well as great merits. It is not enough to describe the patterns of aggression that are psychologically possible for the Japanese. It is not enough to point out that Japan's war on China was an extension of the ingrained principle of hierarchy, or that aggression against the United States, given the extreme sensitivity of the Japanese to slights and their pattern of avenging insults, was an understandable response to the Exclusion Act. Doubtless these patterns were involved but there is some danger that the reader, if not the author, may commit the "fallacy of misplaced concreteness" and imagine that they were sufficient. By emphasizing common thought and behavior patterns Miss Benedict tends to obscure their unequal effect on different groups. In particular, she pays little attention to the changing structure of situations within which the pattern must "work out." In every country to which the Industrial Revolution has spread it has of course disrupted a traditional social order. The changes always tend to produce new sources and channels of aggression, of which some, such as the "class struggle," are general and others are peculiar to the interaction of industrialization with the particular characteristics of the traditional society in question. This interaction was considerably different in England, France, Germany, and Japan. Veblen remarked in "Imperial Germany and the Industrial Revolution" (1915) that the disruptive impact of rapid industrialization on the "dynastic," hierarchical social structure of Japan would probably lead to an explosive nationalism similar to what developed in Germany.

In order to understand this process, however, the reader of Miss Benedict's book would do well to consult in addition "Japan's Prospect," edited by Juglas G. Haring, especially the chapter on social structure. The two books, though they have different purposes and different merits, can be integrated with each other without too much difficulty. In any case, "The Chrysanthemum and the Sword," despite limitations perhaps inherent in the author's intention, deserves the most careful scrutiny of specialists and general readers both. It could be highly desirable to have works of like scope and method on other important nations, such as China and Russia. Not the least merit of such studies is that they give us new, much-needed perspectives on ourselves.

HARRY M. JOHNSON

Drang Nach Westen

THE SOVIET IMPACT ON THE WESTERN WORLD. By E. H. Carr. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

AMONG the select but small group of authors who are neither pro- nor anti-Soviet Professor Carr may claim a prominent position. His new book helps more than any other to lift the "iron curtain" of confused concepts and intentional misapprehensions. But Professor Carr seems to overlook the fact that Western democracy is willing to tolerate attacks against its very foundations, whereas the Soviet Union, at present, has not established any guaranties of civil liberty or of individual freedom. Whether economic planning in England and elsewhere resulted from the economic impact of the Soviet Union is rather questionable. Even the author admits that "capitalism itself paved the way for planning on a national scale" and that by opposing planning "capitalism becomes reactionary and seeks to arrest the natural process of its own development." Two world wars helped make a planned economy inevitable. Today, in order to compete with the Soviet Union's foreign-trade monopoly, forms of state trading will probably be set up in other countries.

Most important of all has been the Soviets' impact on international relations. Fascism and Nazism have imitated their methods, and capitalism has been shaken by them; but the advantage will remain on the Soviet side "if Western civilization fails to develop ideas which appear equally valid" in their appeal to the masses and in their international character. That Bolshevism "is no mere political program but a philosophy and a creed" is a familiar thesis; but Professor Carr has shown that the Soviets' ideological impact has its roots in their revival of the Christian "common man"—a doctrine which not only inflames the resentments of the underprivileged but saps the faith of the privileged "in the sincerity and efficacy of the principles on which their authority rested."

From the Teutonic knights until Hitler's campaign, there has been a permanent Drang nach Osten, the failure of which has opened the way for the Drang nach Westen. Professor Carr hopefully believes that some compromise and synthesis will be found between these extremes. Whether or not this optimism is justified, the merit of Professor Carr's book is beyond doubt. He has said more in fewer words than anyone else about the most vital problem of our age, and he has kept equally aloof from the fellow-travelers who praise Russia as the earthly paradise and the red-baiting "scholars" who call anyone a Communist if he fails to abuse the Soviet Union in his morning prayers.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

THIS has not been a very good year for "social significance" on Broadway. There is all the more reason, therefore, why "All My Sons" (Coronet Theater) is worth more than passing attention. Written by one Arthur Miller and produced for all it is worth by the new firm of Clurman and Kazan, it strikes with real dramatic force, and it reminds one of a fact that it has been all too easy to forget—namely, that this particular kind of serious play can be, on occasion, more than merely the clumsy statement of a few "important" platitudes.

Neither Mr. Miller's theme nor his central situation is particularly original. As a matter of fact, his story of a wartime manufacturer who passes defective parts and thus becomes indirectly responsible for the death of his own son must have been used scores of times, and it was not notably ingenious to begin with. But the reader will simply have to take my word for the fact that a really engrossing play has somehow been made out of this unpromising material.

This unexpected result became possible because Mr. Miller is unmistakably gifted with two of the most important talents a playwright can have—an eye for character and real skill in the telling of a story even when, as is almost always the case, that story has been told before. His play begins some time after the war was over, and more or less in Ibsen's manner it unfolds the past at the same time that the contemporaneous action moves forward. Almost from the beginning one knows in a general way what is going to happen. Obviously, the son who is missing but will not be given up for lost by his mystical mother, will sooner or later be proved to be dead; obviously, the father who has sent his partner to prison will be revealed as the really guilty party before the play is done. But this foreknowledge no more destroys the tension of expectancy than it does in the case of a familiar classic, and the spectator remains absorbed in the process by which the inevitable happens.

Even this would not be enough if Mr. Miller's characters did not possess that forever mysterious air of being people rather than puppets. Bernard Shaw once maintained that it was easier to be original than to be imitative, since it involved merely copying the life around one instead of hunting up old plays to see what other writers had done. But there is clearly a catch in this somewhere, and I cannot pretend to know why the father, the mother, the surviving son, and even the background of neighbors in this particular play seem to come from some real back yard like the one in which the action takes place rather than, as do most of the characters in most of the plays one sees, from that equivalent of Cain's storehouse to which dramatis personae are sent after a play closes. Some credit goes to the director, Elia Kazan, who brings back to a theater which needs it some of the skill he

CAN THE U.S. STOP THE WAR IN CHINA?

By JAMES BURKE

In the March Issue of
THIS MONTH MAGAZINE
On Sale at Newsstands or Send 25¢ to 247 Park Ave., New York 17, N. Y.

MOTION PICTURES

MANHATTAN

ALHAMBRA
COL SEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
86th ST.
near, Lev.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
RESENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

ROXY

CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE
HILL WELHAM
ROYAL

WESTCHESTER

WT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RIKO NOW

"HAS DRAMATIC DEPTH."—N. Y. Herald Tribune
W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM'S

'The Razor's Edge'

Tyrone POWER • Gene TIERNEY
John PAYNE • Anne BAILEY
Cliffen WEBB • Herbert MARSHALL

—AND—

'DANGEROUS MONEY'
SIDNEY TOLER as CHARLIE CHAN

BROOKLYN

BUSHWICK
DYKER GREENPOINT
KENMORE
RADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island

QUEENS

MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Keith's
PLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

MANHATTAN

COLONIAL
B'way & 62 St.

"UNEXCELLED IN THE CARTOON FIELD."—N. Y. Post

WALT DISNEY'S
'SONG OF THE SOUTH'

IN TECHNICOLOR

Based on the Tales of UNCLE REMIUS AND BRER RABBIT

—AND—

'CRACK-UP' PAT O'BRIEN
CLAIRE TREVOR

STAGE PLAYS

"A smash hit of enormous proportions." —
Ward More-
house, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way, CH 4-4256
Evenings 8:30. Matinee Wednesday & Saturday 2:40.

"RATTLING GOOD THEATRE."—Athlon, Times

JOSE FERRER IN
CYRANO de BERGERAC

FRANCES REID • RALPH CLANTON • HIRAN SHERMAN

PAULA LAURENCE • FRANCES COMPTON

ERNEST GRAVES • WILLIAM WOODSON

BARRYMORE THEA., 47th Street West of Broadway, CI 4-0390
Eves., Incl. Sun., 8:30. Mats. Sat. & Sun., 2:30

Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein, 2nd present

"A NEW HIT."—Morehouse, Sun

HELEN HAYES in
HAPPY BIRTHDAY

A New Comedy by ANITA LOOS

Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN

BROADHURST, 44th Street West of Broadway
Eves. 8:00, 1:20-4:00. Wed. & Sat. 2:40, 1:20-3:00

ETHEL MERMAN

In the Musical Smash

ANNIE GET YOUR GUN

Music and Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN

Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS

RAY MIDDLETON Directed by Joshua Logan
IMPERIAL Theatre, 45th St., West of B'way
Eves. 8:30 Sharp. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30 Sharp

TO PLACE AN AD CALL BA 7-1066

MOTION PICTURES

SONGS BY GERSHWIN

BETTY GRABLE ★ DICK HAYMES

'The Shocking
Miss Pilgrim'

IN TECHNICOLOR

A 20th CENTURY-FOX MUSICAL

—Plus Big Stage Show—

Peter Lorre Gil Lamb

Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th Street

BARRY FITZGERALD

DIANA LYNN • SONNY TUFTS

'Easy Come, Easy Go'

A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

In Person

FLOS

THE INK SPOTS ELLA FITZGERALD

EXTRA ADDED ATTRACTION

COOTIE WILLIAMS

And His Trumpet and Orchestra

NOW
TIMES SQUARE

PARAMOUNT

Midnight
Feature
Nightly

STAGE PLAYS

MELVYN DOUGLAS & HERMAN LEVIN present

'CALL ME MISTER'

THE NATION'S TOP MUSICAL REVUE

Songs by Harold Rome • Sketches by Arnold Auerbach • Staged by Robert Gort

New York—NATIONAL Thea.—with Jane KEAN
Boston—SHUBERT Thea.—with Betty KEAN

"BROADWAY'S BIGGEST REVUE HIT!"—Life Magazine

Buy Your Books Through THE NATION

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price post-free if payment is received with the order or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C.O.D. No C.O.D. outside the United States. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible. Make checks payable to The Nation.

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION

The NATION

20 VESEY STREET

NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

developed when he worked with The Group; some undoubtedly goes to an excellent cast, in which the long-experienced Beth Merrill gives a performance as the half-insane but desperately ruthless mother which is, rather surprisingly perhaps, equaled by that of the radio actor Ed Begley as the dishonest manufacturer. But there must be something unusually genuine in the writing, also.

All this is not to say that "All My Sons" is perfect. For one thing, the neat plot is almost too neat. The pieces fit together with the artificial, interlocking perfection of a jig-saw puzzle, and toward the end one begins to feel a little uncomfortable to find all the implicit ironies so patly illustrated and poetic justice working with such mechanical perfection. For another, Mr. Miller seems rather unnecessarily careful to express explicitly his warm respect for all the leftist pieties. Sometimes this leads him to work in sweeping but rather dubious generalizations, as it does, for instance, when he permits one of his characters to explain that anyone who made war profits is, in some manner not made quite clear, just as guilty as those who deliberately made defective equipment. Worse than this, he seems unaware of one fundamental incompatibility between the logic of his story and the logic of his doctrine. The play is a play about personal guilt and personal atonement; and it is difficult to see how either can have any meaning if, as the author seems anxious elsewhere to proclaim, men are not what they make themselves but what "the system" makes them. It is, one is bound to conclude, rather a pity that Mr. Miller's intellectual convictions are so much more stereotyped than his dramatic imagination, but it is also only fair to add that these blemishes are for the most part pretty much on the surface. In any event, those theatergoers who have got in the habit of assuming that leftist plays can be interesting only to those who have sternly disciplined themselves to a point where they are interested in whatever they think they ought to be interested in can get a pleasant surprise at "All My Sons."

Films

JAMES
AGEE

IT'S A Wonderful Life" is a movie about a local boy who stays local, doesn't make good, and becomes at length so unhappy that he wishes he had never been born. At this point an angel named Clarence shows him what his family, friends, and town would have been like if he hadn't been. As I mentioned several weeks ago, this story is somewhere near as effective, of its kind, as "A Christmas Carol." In particular, the hero is extravagantly well played by James Stewart. But as I also mentioned, I had my misgivings. These have increased with time.

One important function of good art or entertainment is to unite and illuminate the heart and the mind, to cause each to learn from, and to enhance, the experience of the other. Bad art and entertainment misinform and disunite them. Much too often this movie appeals to the heart at the expense of the mind; at other times it urgently demands of the heart that it treat with contempt the mind's efforts to keep its integrity; at still other times the heart is simply used, on the mind, as a truncheon. The movie does all this so proficiently, and with so much genuine warmth, that I wasn't able to get reasonably straight about it for quite a while. I still think it has a good deal of charm and quality, enough natural talent involved in it to make ten pictures ten times as good, and terrific vitality or, rather, vigor—for much of the vitality seems cooked-up and applied rather than innate. (The high-school dance floor coming apart over a swimming pool is a sample of cooking-up that no movie has beaten for a long time.) But I mistrust, for instance, any work which tries to persuade me—or rather, which assumes that I assume—that there is so much good in nearly all the worst of us that all it needs is a proper chance and example, to take complete control. I mistrust even more deeply the assumption, so comfortably stylish these days, that whether people turn out well or ill depends overwhelmingly on outside circumstances and scarcely if at all on their own moral intelligence and courage. Neither idea is explicit in this movie, but the whole story depends on the strong implication and assumption of both. Stewart, to be sure, is shown as an "exceptional" man—that is, as a man often faced with moral alternatives who makes choices, usually for the good and to his own material disadvantage; but it is also shown that the whole community depends on his example and on his defense of the helpless.

Yet at its best, which is usually inextricable with its worst, I feel that this movie is a very taking sermon about the feasibility of a kind of Christian semi-socialism, a society founded on affection, kindness, and trust, and that its chief mistake or sin—an enormous one—is its refusal to face the fact that evil is intrinsic in each individual, and that no man may deliver his brother, or make agreement unto God for him. It interests me, by the way, that in representing a twentieth-century American town Frank Capra uses so little of the twentieth and idealizes so much that seems essentially nineteenth-century, or prior anyhow to the First World War, which really ended that century. Many small towns are, to be sure, "backward" in that generally more likable way, but I have never seen one so Norman-Rockwellish as all that. Capra's villainous capitalist—excellently played, in harsh black and white, by Lionel Barrymore—is a hundred per cent Charles Dickens. His New Capitalist—equally well played by Frank Albertson, in fashionable grays—makes his fortune, appropriately, in plastics, is a blithe, tough, harmless fellow, and cables the hero a huge check, when it is most needed, purely out of the goodness of his heart. Like Stewart, he is obviously the salt of the earth. Some day I hope to meet him.

I am occasionally mystified why the Catholic church, which is so sensitive to the not very grave danger to anybody's soul of watching Jennifer Jones trying to be a sex actress—roughly the equivalent of the rich man worming around in the needle's eye, or Archbishop Spellman as Christ's Best Man—never raises an eyebrow, let alone hell, over the kinds of heresy and of deceit of the soul which are so abundant in

INFORM WITH FILMS

Educational programs are most effective when augmented with award films

Including the most important recent intercultural, social and entertaining releases. Consult us at no obligation for your next program.

"Easy on the budget" rates.

115 WEST 44th STREET

New York City

CH 4-0640

INSTRUCTORS!

Take Advantage of The Nation's

SPECIAL CLASS-ROOM RATE

30¢ Monthly Per Student for orders of 10 or more copies to be sent to one address—Desk copy supplied free

Address your order to

The NATION

20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

films of this sort—to say nothing of the ideas given, in such films, of the life after death. Fortunately, I don't have to wait for ecclesiastical permission to say that I am getting beyond further endurance sick and tired of angels named Clarence, Mike, et cetera; I am not even sure I want any further truck with Israfel. These John Q. Public, common-man insults against the very nature of the democratic spirit are bad enough, applied to the living. If the after-life is just a sort of St. Petersburg overrun by these retired Good Joes, taking steam baths in nebulae, scratching themselves with stars, and forever and ever assuring themselves and Almighty God that they are every bit as good as He is and a damn sight more homey and regular, then heaven, so far as I'm concerned, can wait indefinitely.

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

THE people all over the country who heard Marian Anderson on the Telephone Hour in January—who, that is, heard how fresh and big and beautiful her voice sounded at close microphone range—had no idea of how different it had sounded the night before in Carnegie Hall. If I had left her recital at the intermission I would have carried away an impression of great deterioration from her singing of Bach, Schubert, and a Tchaikovsky operatic aria, which had been lifeless successions of tones that had lacked their former lustrous beauty and power, had been afflicted with a strong vibrato, and occasionally had even sagged in pitch. Only with the French songs after the intermission did the singing begin to gain in animation, the voice in warmth and volume—until in the aria from Debussy's "L'Enfant prodigue" there was something like the exciting vocal sound and intensity of former occasions.

On the Telephone Hour Miss Anderson sang Brahms's "Sapphische Ode," a spiritual, and an aria from Massenet's "Herodiade"—which the producers of the program seem to have considered so staggering a burden to the radio audience that even after playing a dance from Delibes's "Coppelia" and a little piece by Tchaikovsky the orchestra had to show that "music also can relax" by playing Robert Russell Bennett's variations on "My Bonnie Lies Over the Ocean."

Columbia has issued a new recording of Strauss's "Tod und Verklärung" by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy (Set 613; $3.85). The performance is good, and is well-reproduced by the records, except for wooden-sounding kettledrum-beats and poor balances that obscure solo instruments on the first side, and a leveled-off climax on the last side. It is certainly to be preferred to the lurid Stokowski performances, especially the one that is atrociously recorded in the older Columbia set.

Brahms's Piano Concerto No. 1 has been recorded for Columbia by Serkin with the Pittsburgh Symphony under Reiner (Set 652; $6.85); and I have forced myself to listen to a few sides in order to report to those who love this dreadful work as I once did that the performance is good but is poorly recorded—with its sound dulled and confused by the poor balance of piano bass with treble and of piano with orchestra.

Victor has issued a volume of folk songs and ballads sung by Susan Reed (Set 1086; $3), who is charming when she sings simply, but who often sings artily.

Vox has issued a pre-war Polydor recording of Busoni's arrangement of the D minor Concerto of Bach, played by Alexander Borovsky with the Lamoureux Orchestra under Bigot (Set 162; $4.05). I have learned to disapprove of Busoni's amplification of Bach's writing, and advise anyone who is interested in this concerto, one of Bach's greatest instrumental works, to acquire either the original clavier version recorded by Fischer or the violin version recorded by Szigeti. Borovsky's playing is straightforward; and the performance is clearly reproduced.

Another Vox set (617; $2.99) offers Debussy's "Pour le piano": Prelude, Sarabande, and Toccata, performed by Gaby Casadesus. I enjoy the effective writing "for the piano" in the Prelude and Toccata, but don't care for the Sarabande; I also like Mme. Casadesus's more spirited playing better than her husband's; and the sound of her piano is well reproduced, but there is leveling off and limiting of volume at some of the climaxes, and loss of volume also at the ends of sides, and the surfaces are poor.

Still another Vox set (614; $4.05) offers a number of pieces by Paganini which are occasions for violin-playing by Ruggiero Ricci that is breath-taking in its technical brilliance and its vitality. When Ricci records some better music we will know whether he has developed into as superb a musician as he is violinist.

Jacques Abram's performances of Chopin waltzes he has recorded in Musicraft (Set 76; $3.85) haven't a drop of the relaxed grace and plasticity which the pieces call for, but are, instead, hectic and tense, with extravagances and violences that impress me as utterly precious, wilful, and perverse. The sound of his piano is excellently reproduced, but with distortion in some of the fortissimos; and there are also some sides with noisy surfaces and some with wavering pitch.

Twelve of the songs of Fauré that were sung by Isabel French and Olympia di Napoli in the Fauré Festival at Harvard University in 1945 have been recorded for Technichord by the same singers with piano accompaniments by Paul Doguerneau (Set T-7; 3 vinyl records; $7.93). Rehearing the songs find them no more interesting than did then; and their sameness of style unrelied by the unvarying—though agreeable—color of the voices that are used with musical intelligence at taste. The performances are well-reproduced; the vinylite records have occasional noisy defects which are more noticeable because of their quiet at other times. The French texts and English translations are provided; and there are again instructions for the care of the records that still permit a pickup weight up to two ounces when they should forbid anything over one ounce, and that warn against dust without mentioning that it has to be cleaned out of the grooves of red vinylite records with a soft brush before each playing.

CONTRIBUTORS

SIDNEY HOOK, head of the department of philosophy at New York University, is the author of "The Heroic History" and "Education for Modern Man."

DAVID T. BAZELON is a frequent contributor to The Nation.

HARRY M. JOHNSON is assistant professor of sociology at Simmons College.

RUSTEM VAMBERY, former professor of criminal law and criminology at the University of Budapest, has written extensively on the problems of the Balkans.

Letters to the Editors

Compromise on Method

Dear Sirs: I read with great interest Curtis Farrar's article on the Chicago student conference in your issue of January 11. As one of the college delegates to that conference I feel he has given a very mistaken impression of the results of the conference and the activities and motives of the national organizations and the various college delegates. I refer in particular to what he considers an over-emphasis of the differences between the "leftist" groups and the Catholic youth organizations. At no time during the conference was there any evidence that either the American Youth for Democracy or the Catholic groups sought to build up their strength or power in the new organization. The leadership came from the individual colleges, as Mr. Farrar said, and the national organizations accepted his leadership.

It would be foolish flatly to deny that these students who came as representatives of national student groups had the interests of their organizations in mind. However, they also realized that as single organizations they had been unable to solve the many problems of the American student community. They had been unable to cement the student bodies of the United States into an organization which would contribute materially to the enhancement of our present system of education.

This realization was translated into acceptable compromises on specific issues, such as the one on racial discrimination. This was not a compromise of "lip service" or "loopholes," as the author maintains. We must recognize that although it is quite possible in the North to make racial discrimination a criminal offense, it cannot easily be done in the South. Therefore we compromised on method, while not yielding on principle. We, as students, have to adjust our program to suit the conditions under which we must work in various parts of the country. . . .

Out of the conference came agreement on many aims and purposes on which students of all religious faiths and political groups could cooperate and work together. This is a result which will not only make a valuable contribution to America's political life, as Mr. Farrar points out, but one which will add immeasurably to our national understanding, and greatly raise the level and standard of education in the United States.

EUGENE G. SCHWARTZ,

C. C. N. Y. delegate to the Chicago Student Conference

New York, February 3

A Distorted Picture

Dear Sirs: In your issue of January 4 you published an article by Carey McWilliams entitled The Cross and the Circle dealing with the Social Credit movement in Canada. This article contains a number of serious errors which give a distorted picture of the political situation in Quebec.

First of all, Mr. McWilliams appears to be under the impression that in the past the Bloc Populaire has followed a policy of cooperation with the Social Credit forces, and that it was partly instrumental in the formation of the Union des Electeurs, the latter party being the Quebec version of the Canadian Social Credit movement. This view is quite incorrect. The Bloc Populaire has no more cooperated with the Social Credit movement than it has with the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. So far from the Bloc being in any way responsible for the formation of the Union des Electeurs, the facts are that while the Bloc was only formed in 1942, the Union des Electeurs was first organized around the beginning of the war, that is, several years earlier. The Union des Electeurs, in other words, is an entirely different party from the Bloc Populaire, with different leaders, different program, and different background. Moreover, although this movement has always been an advocate of Social Credit theories, it was originally a purely Quebec party, and not until 1944 did it become associated with other sections of the Social Credit movement in the Social Credit Association of Canada.

The article also states that the Social Credit Party and the Bloc Populaire feed upon the discontents of the lower middle class. This might be partly true of the Bloc Populaire, but it is not of the Union des Electeurs, whose support up to now has come largely from the farming communities and from mining areas such as those in the federal constituency of Pontiac, which the party captured from the Liberals in a recent by-election.

Finally, the writer says that the Catholic church has expressed no opposition to its members joining the Social Credit movement. Actually, in 1941 Cardinal Villeneuve strongly attacked the movement, declaring that its principles did not constitute a true expression of the social doctrines of the church.

In one respect, however, Mr. McWilliams was correct, and that was in his statement that the Social Credit movement, including the Union des Electeurs in Quebec, is strongly anti-Semitic.

HERBERT F. QUINN

Montreal, Quebec, January 31

Next Week in The Nation's

Mid-Winter Book Number

"Faustina, or Rock Roses," A Long Poem by ELIZABETH BISHOP

WILLIAM EMPSON's review of "The Selected Writings of Dylan Thomas"

POEMS BY ROBERT LOWELL and WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS

WYLIE SYPHER's review of Curt Sachs's "The Commonwealth of Art"

DELMORE SCHWARTZ's review of Kenneth Patchen's "Selected Poems"

NATHAN GLAZER's review of Wulf Sachs's "Black Anger"

CHARLES MORRIS's review of Herbert W. Schneider's

"A History of American Philosophy"

ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, JR.'s review of David Martin's "Ally Betrayed"

ALBERT GUÉRARD's review of Charles A. Madison's

"Critics and Crusaders"

B. H. HAGGIN

CLEMENT GREENBERG

SCHOOL

COOPER SQUARE SCHOOL

34 Irving Place (near E. 17th St.) N. Y. C.
LITERATURE OF FREEDOM

MacAllister Coleman
Aaron Levenstein

REVIEW OF THE WEEK AND OTHER TIMELY COURSES

Starting Tues. Eve., FEBRUARY 4

Write or phone:
303 4th Ave. Room 516, N. Y. 10. GR 5-4582

BOOKS

ANCIENT and MODERN TRUTHS

IN A NEW DRESSING

Yours for $1.50, sent to
E. F. LEE

Box 261, EVANSTON, ILLINOIS

COLLECTIVISM CHALLENGES CHRISTIANITY

By Verno Paul Kaub

Challenges every American, Christian or not, who believes human liberties can be preserved by entrust-ing them to the state. Dare YOU read it? $2 from Authorized Distributor

K & K ENTERPRISES, Dept. N
P. O. Box 7 Madison 1, Wis.

FOR SALE

"GOLDEN APPLES"

Send Indian River Citrus Fruit as Gifts or a Treat for the Family

ORANGES AND GRAPEFRUIT

Full Bushel (55 lbs.) $4.75

Half Bushel (30 lbs.) 3.00

Express Prepaid No C. O. D.

HONEY GROVES
Sebastian Florida

TRANSLATOR WANTED

FROM YIDDISH INTO ENGLISH of political, economic, psychological, historical essays. State qualifications (education), literary experiences, etc. Box 1683, c/o The Nation.

LANGUAGES

ALL LANGUAGES. Phonograph courses.
Lingaphone, other makes. Sold, bought, rented. A. Ahn, 475 Fifth Avenue, New York 17. MU 3-1093.

CIGARETTES

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum
3 cartons. Price $1.45 per carton; postpaid.
Send check or money order. ACE MAIL ORDER CO., East Orange 1, N. J.

CLASSIFIED
ADVERTISING RATES

74c a line (six words)

Minimum Three Lines

Classified Display $7.39 per Inch

Attractive discounts for multiple insertions.

THE NATION

20 Vesey St., N. Y. 7, N. Y.

BARclay 7-1066

Crossword Puzzle No. 199

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Often washed by tides, and tides recede in them
5 Shaking like a jelly
9 Removed cargo
10 A stage Englishman
11 Crops of a uniform nature
12 If you hope to drink from this cup you must take it up
14 Firearm with a powerful kick
15 Far-fetched
18 Usually engaged in revolutionary work
20 Abyssinian official
21 Listen—to little Kenneth
23 Of rural kin
26 Reads aloud a list (5 & 4)
28 Grub
29 Ada live here? She can be made use of 30 Giver of only one gift to charity?
31 Ordains (anag.)
32 Book bag
- 6 Sort of crossing landmen prefer
7 He won't feel at home by the seashore
8 One who looked for an honest man in a tub (an odd place to look) 13 "Who overcomes By force, hath overcome but half his ---"
16 After this it's too late (4 & 5)
17 Nature's sole mistake, W. S. Gilbe called him
18 One of the five civilized Nations
19 I drag all into an old dance 22 Being in the state he is, he'd have no use for gold diggers
23 Interments
24 Brings sex into everything
25 Receptacle for bread, biscuits or beer
27 System of which Boston is the hub

□-□-□-□

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 198

ACROSS:—1 REDCAP; 5 SWOONED;
LEASTWISE; 11 ITCHY; 12 ROSSINI;
PRIMATE; 14 LISZT; 16 ESSENTIAL;
BOMBSHELL; 20 CREEP; 22 TONNEA
24 PIANOLA; 26 EQUAL; 27 TURNSTILE
28 STENCIL; 30 ENDING.

DOWN:—2 EXAMS; 3 CATMINT; 4 PRIV
LEGE; 5 SWEEP; 6 OPINION; 7 NE
TARINE; 8 DRY CELL; 9 FLORAL;
SIMON PURE; 17 SILK PURSE; 18 BU
LERS; 19 SHELLAC; 20 CLASSED;
PLACES; 23 UNTIL; 25 ORION.

DOWN

- 1 A punch below the belt
2 Batty place
3 Floral dress—"all silver-white," said
Shakespeare
4 An indirect attack
5 Man-o'-war's boat

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 164

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 22, 1947

NUMBER 8

The Shape of Things

WE ARE ON THE POINT OF SQUANDERING our birthright of world leadership for a mess of partisan pottage. The rejection of David Lilienthal as head of the Atomic Energy Commission would mean a sell-out to the meanest forces in American life today—to the pork-barrel politician, the private-power lobbyist, the anti-Semite, the Hoover-era obscurantist, the we've-got-to-keep-the-bomb militarist. And out from under their protecting stones would come creeping the isolationists. Carl Levin on page 202 supplies the gloomy facts in the case. There is one man who could stop this sell-out—Robert Taft of Ohio, boss of the Republican majority in the Senate. So far he has publicly sat on the fence but privately he appears to have given comfort to that "little group of wilful men" who would once more lead this country stumbling blindfolded down the road to isolationism, abandoning the great role that history has cast for it in world affairs. For the fight on Lilienthal—as squalid as any that has disgraced our democratic record—is much more than a conspiracy against one of the few great men the United States has produced in the last decade. It is, in fact, a reckless gambling with destiny. Any American schoolboy today sees with greater clarity than most of our Senatorial simpletons that atomic energy will determine for better or worse the future of our world. He knows that the United States, of all nations, has the awful responsibility of saying how it shall be controlled and to what uses it shall be put. That schoolboy's chances of reaching manhood may have been appreciably lessened by the work last week of McKellar, Bridges, White, Wherry, Brooks, O'Daniel, and the rest. If this gang is allowed to say how American atomic policy is to be determined, then Senator Austin at the United Nations may as well fold up his papers and pack his briefcase. And Gromyko will have a right to smile when we insist that the United States is irrevocably committed to the world control of atomic energy through a United Nations Atomic Development Authority. For the United States Senate, the maker of treaties, will have thrown to the dogs the chief author of the Lilienthal-Acheson-Baruch report. Better think hard, Robert Taft. You've got a bigger destiny even than that of the Republican Party, pressing down on your shoulders.

RIGHT-WING COLUMNISTS AND CARTOONISTS have been fairly gloating over the British fuel crisis. It just goes to show, they maintain, what happens when a country turns its back on free enterprise. As David Lawrence puts it in the New York Sun, "The impact of the first socialistic government on the British people has developed a major crisis." The only thing wrong with this argument is the fact emphasized by Aylmer Vallance in a London dispatch on page 203 that the current trouble in Britain has been caused not by too much planning but by too little. Last fall, coal production was increasing, thanks to the improvement in miners' morale following the passage of the Coal Nationalization Act, but consumption was rising still faster. It was clear that the margin of safety needed in case of a really cold winter was very slim. Nevertheless, the government gambled on the weather and refused to institute any drastic rationing scheme. No doubt its decision was influenced by memories of the terrific uproar created by the Tories when John Strachey, declining to take chances on the harvest, decreed bread rationing last summer. That move turned out to be as farsighted as it was unpopular, and it is a pity that the Labor government did not deal as boldly with coal. As a result it is open to attack for forgetting the rugged individualism of British weather. But the moral, surely, is not that socialism has failed but that in so vital a matter socialists shouldn't depend on laissez-faire methods.

★

DURING ITS FIRST MONTH IN OFFICE, THE French government has weathered a number of sharp squalls without much damage, but now the barometer indicates that something like a political typhoon lies ahead. With Communist Party support, the C. G. T. (General Federation of Labor), pointing out that prices have risen 50 per cent since last June, is demanding wage increases that average 20 per cent. All other parties oppose general wage increases as certain to nullify the government's price-reduction campaign. Tempers are rising in what is really a three-cornered fight. The trade unions have fact on their side in declaring that the price-reduction program has had almost no effect on living standards. The government, able to show that January

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	197
China's Time Bomb	199
Why Teachers Rebel	200

ARTICLES

Gamblers with Destiny by Carl Levin	202
Britain's Emergency by Aylmer Vallance	203
A Faith to Live By. I. The Dilemma of Modern Man by Reinhold Niebuhr	204
"Let the People Eat Chops" by G. E. R. Gedy	209
The Spanish Republican Crisis by J. Alvarez del Vayo	211
In One Ear by Lou Frankel	212
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	213

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Faustina, or Rock Roses A Poem by Elizabeth Bishop	214
Death and Transfiguration by William Empson	214
The Cycles of Style by Wylie Sypher	216
The Red or the Black by Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr.	218
Her Dead Brother Two Poems by Robert Lowell	218
"I Feel Drunk All the Time" by Delmore Schwartz	220
The Slaves by Nathan Glazer	222
Labrador A Poem by William Carlos Williams	224
The Bear and the Eagle by Bernard Brodie	224
Our Own Philosophers by Charles Morris	225
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch	226
Art by Clement Greenberg	228
Music by B. H. Haggin	229

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

231

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 200

by Jack Barrett	232
------------------------	-----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor

J. King Gordon

Literary Editor

Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editors:

Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

was the first month since the war in which prices have not risen, argues that new measures to be applied in March will insure what amounts to a wage increase. The C. G. T. is obviously skeptical. The Employers' Federation has declared that a 10 per cent reduction in prices, unless matched by increased output, will abolish profits. Whether the Cabinet will be torn apart will depend upon the outcome of a conference between the ministries concerned and the C. G. T., to be opened on February 21. The calling out of the Paris police surely indicates that the Communist Party is little inclined to compromise, while M. Schumann, M. R. P. Minister of Finance, has threatened to resign if a general wage increase is granted. Evidently M. Ramadier will have the greatest difficulty in keeping both parties within his government, which would be brought down by the defection of either one of them.

★

WE ADVISE THOSE WHO ARE CALCULATING tax savings in the light of the $6 billion reduction in federal expenditure recommended by the House-Senate Legislative Budget Committee to restrain their excitement. This global cut, forced through the committee by its large Republican majority, may turn out to be little more than a global gesture. Even its most fervent proponents admit that it will not bind the Appropriations Committee when it gets down to its task of fixing expenditures for the various departments. Moreover, the recommendation has yet to be indorsed by Congress, and while the House is expected to approve it, a real fight is shaping up in the Senate, where some members realize that a big-stick foreign policy cannot be properly backed up with a swagger-cane. Economies on the scale advocated by the Budget Committee cannot be made solely at the expense of civilian governmental activities; they must mean deep cuts also in service appropriations. Senator Bridges, in fact, has admitted tentative plans to reduce navy expenditures by $750 million and to lop a cool billion off War Department appropriations. In addition, the army's civil activities—namely, administration and food supply in occupied areas—are threatened by a 50 per cent cut. Little wonder that the service chiefs are protesting vociferously. We shall be surprised if their cries are unheeded. And equally strong protests are to be expected from interests the Republicans are bound to placate, such as the farmers, if and when Congress gets down to the job of translating its $6 billion aspiration into actual savings. The G. O. P. is still a long way from reconciling its twin pledges to reduce taxes and balance the budget.

★

NOT IN A LONG WHILE HAS THE SUPREME Court come up with a ruling as vulnerable as its recent decision that public moneys may be used to provide free bus service for parochial schools. In presenting the majority opinion Justice Black appeared to be extremely sensitive to the prospective charge that the court was jeopardizing the integrity of the First Amendment, which rules out any law "respecting an establishment of religion." Repeatedly he went out of the way to uphold the principle of separation between church and state and even cited favorably another court's decision that "no tax . . . can be levied to support any religious activities or institutions." Yet in spite of these qualms, he and four of his colleagues decided that Ewing Township, New Jersey, was warranted in providing buses for the pupils of Catholic schools as a matter of "public welfare," just as it provided fire and police protection for such institutions. The First Amendment, they ruled, did not "prohibit New Jersey from extending its general state-law benefits to all its citizens without regard to their religious beliefs." The reasoning here appears to be shockingly loose. The free transportation is available to all who care to use the public-school system, regardless of religion. But if the state is to extend such service to the parochial schools on the ground that they are entitled to equal treatment, then why not provide them with free books too? Indeed, why not, as Justice Rutledge asked in a cogent dissent, support them entirely, as the public schools are supported? Nervously, haltingly, but surely, the court majority has breached the wall of separation so carefully built up by Jefferson and Madison. We will hear more of this matter as other communities take their lead from the Ewing Township case. We can only hope then, that the court will reverse itself, as it has on other occasions when its decisions have clearly misfired.

✱

MAYOR O'DWYER OF NEW YORK HAS BEEN bitterly attacked in the press for his conduct of hearings on the ten-cent subway fare. He staged the proceedings, it is charged, purely in order to create a propaganda background for a plea by the city authorities for additional aid from the state. Undoubtedly that was one of the motives inspiring the Mayor's action, but we believe that he was also anxious to counteract the rabid campaign for a ten-cent fare which local newspapers, apart from PM and the New York Post, had been carrying on for months. That campaign has been designed to prove by damnable reiteration that New Yorkers were really anxious to double their daily traveling costs, recognizing that this was the only way to dig the city out of the financial hole into which it had tumbled. Despite an impressive array of legal and financial talent mustered by the real-estate interests in support of this thesis, the three-day hearing in the City Hall proved fairly conclusively that a ten-cent fare would do little to solve New York's fiscal problems and that the New York press did not reflect its readers' opinions on the subject. The real point at issue is who shall provide the additional revenue which the city needs—the wage-earners for whom a ten-cent fare means the equivalent of a 10 per cent rise in rents, or the real-estate interests. Opponents of the ten-cent fare, says the New York Times, editorially, "want owners of property to subsidize the subways still further." We suggest that this complaint stands the situation on its head. The subways have brought an enormous unearned increment to the real-estate owners of the city. If that increment had been captured for the benefit of the community, as it should have been, New York could have had a debt-free transit system.

✱

WESTBROOK PEGLER SEEMS TO HAVE BEEN tripped by his own semantics. He and other publicists of the same kidney have long devoted themselves to giving the word "Communist" a thoroughly opprobrious connotation. How well they have succeeded is shown by a ruling of the United States Circuit Court that in Illinois "it is libelous per se to write of a man or a corporation that they are 'Communist' or 'Communist sympathizers.'" As the decision points out, "the label Communist today, in the minds of many average and respectable persons, places the accused beyond the pale of respectability and makes him a symbol of public hatred, contrary to the statute." The immediate effect of this ruling is to return to the District Court for trial a $6,000,000 libel suit brought by A. N. Spanel and the International Latex Corporation against Westbrook Pegler, the King Features Syndicate, and the publishers of the Chicago Herald-American. Whatever the outcome of the case, the Circuit Court has given a salutary warning to those who have formed the habit of denouncing as Communists anyone to the left of Harry Truman.

China's Time Bomb

THE immediate cause of the inflationary crisis that threatens China's economy with disaster was an American consul's statement that the United States government did not approve of T. V. Soong's export subsidy program. It was simple and undramatic advice, but following upon Secretary Marshall's withdrawal of military support it has apparently demolished an already dwindling faith in Nanking's reconstruction plans, which depend in great part upon the acquisition of dollar credits.

As usual the Communist Party has been blamed for the present crisis. The truth is that the guilty persons are Chiang Kai-shek and his associates. It may be admitted that the Chinese economy was in no shape to sustain an exhausting war effort, but that prices rose about 700 per cent during that period was due to the fact that a sincere effort to control them was never attempted. Such an effort would have involved sharp struggle with the military cliques, the great landlords, and the industrial monopolists who were themselves the government. The printing press has been the favorite financial weapon of the Kuomintang, with the result that since 1936 the volume of paper currency has been multiplied only a little less than a million times. An honest and competent civil service, the prerequisite of sound effort, does not exist in China, and cannot in present circumstances.

That is why Chiang's drastic new decrees aimed at currency and food hoarders, speculators, and black marketeers will almost certainly prove ineffective. The worst offenders are entrenched in the government itself, and Chiang cannot liquidate them without sacrificing his chief support. Once again Acton's aphorism—absolute power corrupts absolutely—is being illustrated. UNRRA aid, military support, the granting of dollar credits, everything that was done in pursuance of the common struggle against Japan, has served to tighten the grasp of an incompetent dictatorship. There lies the reason for the Kuomintang's embittered opposition to communism and liberal democracy alike. The fact is well known to the Chinese people, and that is why the most cautious reversals in American policy would have touched off a trigger mechanism at any time since the close of the war.

To counter the corrupt Chinese diehards a party with teeth must be included within a new government; in no other way will it be possible to resist the Kuomintang machine and compel fulfilment of reforms in the countless towns and villages of China. Today the only group that so qualifies is the Communist Party, but it will have no truck with the present sham coalition, and with reason, for the honest men who have consented to serve in the central government are impotent. Moreover, the economic crisis strengthens the position of the Yen-an leaders, to an extent, indeed, which might tempt them to overplay their hand were Chiang willing to reopen negotiations.

Unfortunately, it is hardly worth while to discuss the possibility of negotiations, for the crisis has not rendered the Generalissimo one whit less intransigent. Reports from Nanking state that he is bitter against President Truman and General Marshall for refusing to give unconditional and unlimited support to his war against Yen-an but still determined to smash the Communist armies, although publicly he talks merely of protecting communications. China, desperately in need of peace and reform, faces therefore the prospect of a prolonged civil war which is likely to end in stalemate and common ruin. Can the United States do anything to avert such a disaster? It can, we believe, only hold fast to its policy of non-intervention while making it plain to both sides that it will offer generous assistance for China's reconstruction when a stable and representative government capable of undertaking that task has been established.

Why Teachers Rebel

SIX thousand American schools have closed their doors in the past twelve months. This year 75,000 American children will have no schooling whatever. Five million others will go to school either to sit idle for the most part, without instruction, or to endure the attentions of sub-standard teachers, 60,000 of whom have no more than a high-school diploma by way of qualification and some of whom have gone no farther than the fifth grade. And this is only the beginning of a catastrophe that has befallen the public schools of the United States—that system of free and compulsory education which Americans rightly think of as the bedrock of their democracy but which they allot only 1.5 per cent of their income. (Britain allows 3 per cent, Russia 7.5.)

The appalling deterioration of the American public schools, which has been worrying only a handful of people for the past few years, is now apparent to anyone who takes the trouble to study the remarkable survey prepared for the New York Times by its education editor, Benjamin Fine. Six months' time, extensive travel from coast to coast, and hundreds of interviews have gone into Mr. Fine's excellent series of articles and into his conclusion that although our schools did not suffer a single air raid, "they are being wrecked just as surely as though they had been blasted by heavy bombers."

Lack of physical facilities—plant and equipment—is serious, with more than four billion dollars needed to provide the country with adequate buildings. But this is far less important than the devastating loss of personnel. Since 1940, teachers have been abandoning the schoolroom at the rate of 70,000 a year. In the state of Missouri only 2 per cent of the teachers who served in 1940-41 remain on the pay roll today, and for the country as a whole only half of the 1941 staff is still in action.

Among those who have been rushed into the breach, incompetence of the grossest sort is commonplace. Everywhere Fine heard the same story. "We need more teachers," said a Georgia school superintendent. "Some of the teachers we now employ just call the roll. They can't teach." In Colorado high schools fully a fourth of the instructors are teaching subjects for which they do not hold licenses, and in hundreds of schools major subjects like physics, chemistry, and biology have had to be dropped altogether. High-school girls have taken over classes in Chicago, and one state education commissioner remarked with little exaggeration, "We no longer ask whether an applicant can read or write. If she looks as if she is able to stand up we take her."

What makes the situation doubly desperate is the fact that as the demand increases, the number of prospective teachers continues to drop. In 1920 more than 22 per cent of all college students were enrolled in teachers' colleges. By 1930 the percentage had slumped to 17. Today not more than 7 per cent of college students are preparing to teach. Of the million veterans who have flocked to the campus, only 20,000—2 per cent—are in teachers' colleges. At this rate of production, it will take ten years for the schools to turn out the 500,000 new teachers who will be needed in three years if even adequate standards are to be restored.

A glance at the tabulated salary figures in the Fine report go far to explain the crisis. The average weekly pay of teachers in the United States is $37.02 or $3.37 above the average wage rate for garbage collectors in the city of Washington. Driving a taxi affords a man a better living than educating the young, and in most states requires somewhat less extensive training. So does tending bar, as many teachers have come to know from practicing that profession in their off-hours. Detroit starts its dog-catchers at $2,485 a year, its teachers at $2,094. Below the national average the figures drop to appalling lows. Some 200,000 American teachers draw $25 a week for their services, and 10,000 get as little as $12.

It is no accident that the state that sends Rankin and Bilbo to Congress is the state that pays its educators an average of $15.47, less than a self-respecting office boy will accept in New York. The correlation is obvious: democracy cannot be made to work with an illiterate population.

The extreme gravity of the problem is beginning to penetrate the public consciousness, with action promised in thirty-two states. But the measures proposed are picayune in proportion to the need. California is in the vanguard of enlightenment with a proposal to establish a minimum of $2,400 a year for its teachers.

Naturally enough, teachers have been flocking into their trade unions, and in many cities militant action is in the offing. Albany legislators have been threatening dire penalties against teachers who strike, but the teachers, we believe, have the last word. They can always abandon the children and try lions or bears. After all, a second-grade zoo-keeper in New York starts at $2,100. The work, they say, is less demanding—and it appears to be more highly regarded.

Gamblers with Destiny

BY CARL LEVIN

Washington, February 15

RARELY have thinking men and women been so depressed by any development in Washington as they have been this week by the sordid fight against David E. Lilienthal's confirmation as chairman of the United States Atomic Energy Commission.

Sinister and unfair as is the fight against a man who has won national acclaim as a servant of the people, the storm now raging in Washington has more important implications. It is seen here as an assault against the entire commission, against the nationally enacted policy of civilian control, and against the painstaking effort of the United States to turn its new killer into a force for world peace and the enrichment of humanity. Other members of the commission feel that they will not be able to function in their great task if the Senate fails to hold out against the types of pressure being brought to bear against the chairman-designate.

How far the rejection of Lilienthal would set the United States back in atomic development when other nations are forging ahead was pointed out this week by Dr. Harold C. Urey, the Nobel prize winner who played a major role in the creation of the atomic bomb. Not even considering the possibility that the nation might lose the entire commission, he warned that if the chairmanship of the commission were changed at this time, atomic-energy work in the United States would be crippled for several years.

Last week the opposition, centered in the embittered senior Senator from Tennessee, had been like an easily excisable cancer in the body politic. It was expected to spread to a small handful of McKellar's Southern friends but not much farther. This week, however, to the amazement of men who thought it was under control, it came to the surface in places where it could well be fatal. Its seriousness now cannot be exaggerated, for it has infected the bulk of the leadership of the new Republican majority in the Senate. The opposition now includes majority leader White, Republican whip Wherry, Appropriations Committee Chairman Bridges, and Republicans Brewster, Moore, Kem, and Brooks, as well as McKellar Democrats like Overton of Louisiana, Pappy O'Daniel of Texas, and Stewart of Tennessee.

As this is written, the two leading Republican Senators are still silent. Robert A. Taft, chairman of the party's Senate policy and steering committees, is apparently in the McKellar camp, though he has not openly taken a stand. Arthur H. Vandenberg, president pro tempore of the Senate and chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, has shown repugnance for the bigotry with which his colleagues have aligned themselves. By the position these two men take the nation and the world will know whether the Republican Party intends to use its new power to wreck efficient, strong-handed control and development of atomic energy, which can make or break the world, or whether under Republican control, Congress is to remain responsive to the will of the people and serve the people's interests. Already the Republican leadership has rendered the nation a supreme disservice by dragging

Caricature by Sellgson
Senator McKellar

a matter of such transcending importance as atomic energy through the mire of partisan politics. It is doubtful whether any commission now confirmed will ever get rid of the stains.

It was perhaps naive to suppose that the fight was over when last year's prolonged controversy over military versus civilian control ended with Congressional and Presidential approval of a strong civilian bill. Last October, when President Truman named the commission after a difficult three months' quest for the five best men to do the job, his selections received practically unanimous support from the people and the respectable press, but between then and now pressures have been brought to bear which have caused some queer flipflops. Consult, for example, the files of Cissy Patterson's Washington Times-Herald. This week the Times-Herald found editorially that "the reasons why Mr. Lilienthal is not the man to command the atom bomb are plain." But on October 29 the Times-Herald expressed strong approval of Mr. Lilienthal's appointment. In an editorial also printed in the New York Daily News it said:

The nomination looks good to us, on the strength of Lilienthal's record. He is the man who has been in charge of the Tennessee Valley Authority for the last thirteen years. In that job Lilienthal could have yielded to the ambitions of Senator Kenneth McKellar (D., Tenn.) to turn the TVA into a big patronage machine for the political welfare of McKellar. Or Lilienthal could have knuckled under to a horde of idealists, doctrinaires, Socialists, and Communists who have long wanted to use the TVA, primarily as a device for hurrying this country toward collectivism. Lilienthal did neither of these things. He has run TVA on business-like principles, thereby thwarting the radicals, and he has kept it from becoming a political football, to the great and continuing rage of Senator McKellar, who says he will fight this nomination. We need a man of Lilienthal's character to head the Atomic Commission. He is further recommended by the fact that he led the group which got out the atomic-energy report utilized by Bernard M. Baruch in formulating the Baruch plan for eventual international control of atomic energy and development. The Baruch plan is the one the Russians don't like. . . . With a Baruch plan sympathizer as chairman of the Atomic Commission, we should be much safer for the next few years than if the chairman was a Wallace-minded gent. . . . All in all, we don't know of anybody we'd rather have seen nominated to this enormously important post than Lilienthal.

When the joint Congressional Atomic Energy Committee opened its hearings on the fitness of Mr. Lilienthal and his associates, McKellar, of course, although not a member of the committee, was there to press his fight. Lilienthal, he insisted, was a Communist, notwithstanding the testimony of those arch-foes of communism, the Times-Herald and the News. The first surprise came when the committee began to press the chairman-designate on his interpretation of the relation between the commission and its military-liaison committee. Had he sought the help of Major General Leslie R. Groves, war-time commander of the War Department's Manhattan District, since the commission, under interim appointment, took over the Manhattan District's functions and facilities on January 1, pursuant to the law? Did he intend to allow members of the military-liaison committee to sit in on all meetings of the commission? One did not have to be a shrewd analyst of the Washington scene to see where the committee members obtained the information reflected in their questions. The military obviously was still at it, although, as it was later shown, without the approval or support of Secretary of War Patterson. It may have been more than a coincidence that at the same time General Groves, who had retired entirely from the atomic picture, was quietly being worked back, as an unheralded replacement for another army representative on the military-liaison committee, and also, with bigger things in view, as a member of a new army-navy atomic board now in the formative stage. Was he being prepared for a possible call to head the commission, which Congress had decided was to be civilian?

That was only the start. The hearings were but a few days old when the bigoted isolationist fringe started packing the hearing room and bombarding members of Congress with denunciations of members of the commission. They even managed to get one of their firebrands into the witness stand.

More subtle and self-effacing but working hard in the background are the power and oil interests. They are afraid Mr. Lilienthal will not turn over atomic power to them soon enough and that he might not be as free as some army officers or weaker administrators with atomic patents vested by Congress in the new commission.

Finally the Republican leadership in the Senate swung into action. Senator Bridges of New Hampshire got out the first statement. He would oppose Mr. Lilienthal because Senator McKellar's venom had exposed the Chairman-designate to suspicion; no man under suspicion should be confirmed to the high position. Moreover, the Senator said, Lilienthal was an "extreme New Dealer." Senator Taft told newspapermen he agreed with Senator Bridges.

The steady outpouring of Republican statements all during the week reached a climax when Senator Brooks of Illinois spoke. He set forth a new concept of American justice. "No man . . . accused of encouraging or condoning Communists and communism should be placed in this important position," he declared.

A worried Republican leadership, however, tried desperately to channel the party's opposition away from the Communist issue and to define it clearly as stemming primarily from dissatisfaction with Mr. Lilienthal's "dictatorial tactics," his lack of respect for Congress, and the belief that such important jobs should no longer go to New Dealers.

Is the Republican leadership expressing the will of the people? Secretary of War Patterson has said it is not; Bernard M. Baruch, President Conant of Harvard, Dr.

Compton, Dr. Vannevar Bush, Dr. John Sloan Dickey, president of Dartmouth, have all testified that it is not. The Catholic Committee of the South, which last year named Mr. Lilienthal its "man of the year," and which is not given to supporting Communists, has spoken in Lilienthal's favor for all Roman Catholics in the South. The American Farm Bureau Federation, representing more than 1,100,000 farm families, has taken the same stand. So have the Congress of Industrial Organizations, the Southern Regional Council, the Union Theological Seminary, and spokesmen for numberless institutions and organizations.

But McKellar says Lilienthal shall not be confirmed. He is joined by two or three disgruntled former TVA employees, by a Birmingham police detective, by the bigots and isolationists, and by the unseen power and oil lobbies.

The Republican Party, holding the power in the chamber which must confirm the nominees, will judge whether they or their opponents are the more representative Americans. On this judgment it must stand or fall.

Britain's Emergency

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

London, February 10

CANUTE, impotent, confronted by a rising tide of political and economic troubles, calling for aid not upon his own divided courtiers but on those of another king—such is the picture of Mr. Attlee which is being sedulously spread about by Conservative headquarters and the faithful columnists of the Tory press. Inspired as they are by the Opposition's desire to discredit the Labor government, to whose "indecisions and doctrinaire intransigence" everything from world food shortages to the arctic weather and the electricity shut-down is ascribed, current rumors of a coming National Coalition might be summarily dismissed as Tory wish-fulfilment or just plain nonsense. Indeed, at the moment there is no shadow of evidence that Mr. Attlee or any of his colleagues has yet given a moment's serious thought to such a political expedient. Nevertheless, tongues have been set wagging; and the coalition hypothesis has even become the subject of widespread speculative discussion within Labor. It seems worth while, therefore, to try to discover the basis of the conception. Under what conceivable circumstances could Mr. Attlee be persuaded to invite the history of 1931 to repeat itself —especially since he enjoys in Parliament the overwhelming majority denied to Ramsay MacDonald?

To this question one answer is the supposition that there might arise within the ranks of the parliamentary Labor Party a rebellion on foreign policy so serious that the government would be threatened with actual defeat in the House. As matters stand, there are no signs of such a situation. The critics of Ernest Bevin, who now number about 150 recalcitrants, are by no means appeased. They adhere as strongly as ever to their opinion that, at the cost of making Britain embarrassingly dependent on the military and material resources of the United States, the Foreign Secretary is pursuing a conventionally imperialist policy which Britain cannot afford. They blame Mr. Bevin bitterly for the part he has played in the latest discussions on Palestine with the Jewish and Arab delegations in London. It is an open secret that when the Colonial Secretary, Mr. Creech Jones, evolved, and actually sounded the Jewish representatives on, a plan whereby, under a continuing British mandate, a semi-autonomous Jewish province would have an unrestricted right to accept immigrants and would be entitled to vote itself out of a partitioned Palestine in five years' time, the proposal was brusquely and publicly disavowed by the Foreign Secretary. On his insistence the Cabinet, moved by his plea that military considerations forbade any action likely to alienate the Arab states, finally indorsed the quite unacceptable plea for a patchwork quilt of demi-semi-autonomous areas, with immigration limited to 96,000 in two years and no ultimate goal of independence in sight. But though the rebels constitute a guerrilla fringe ready to snipe at the Cabinet on all suitable occasions, they have not the power, much less the intention, to create a serious parliamentary crisis.

AYLMER VALLANCE is The Nation's London correspondent.

This being so, the only question which merits attention is whether the inevitable economic crisis is likely to be of a severity which might persuade Mr. Attlee that only a National Government on the lines of the war-time coalition, but with the internal balance of power shifted, naturally, in Labor's favor, could cope with it. How imminent is the crisis? Here the views of economists differ. Some hold that last year's rate of drawing on the dollar loan need not be exceeded and that, on this assumption, the loan can be relied on as an adequate cushion against the impact of crisis until the summer of 1949. Others, less sanguine, forecast increasing drafts on the loan from now on. Britain's exports, they argue—apart from the temporarily catastrophic effects of the electric shut-down—are likely to fall in 1947 and still more in 1948, partly through shortage of raw materials and partly through increasing American competition. Some portion, at least, of the sterling balances due to India, Egypt, and other British creditors will have to be unblocked in freely convertible currency. The dollar requirements of the British zone of Germany are another heavy commitment. And there is the further danger that if, as these economists expect, opinion abroad comes round to the view that sterling will have to be devalued as a stimulus to exports, purchasers abroad will hold off placing contracts for British goods until the price in foreign currency becomes cheaper. All these expectations add up to the conclusion that by the end of this year Britain's balance of payments will be so out of gear and its stock of dollars so diminished that even if all imports of non-essentials are cut to the bone, unemployment may loom as the result of failure to obtain raw materials.

The date of the crisis does not perhaps bear on Mr. Attlee's probable attitude toward inviting the Tories to form a coalition. This would obviously depend upon his weighing of a set of fairly obvious factors. On the one hand, it is suggested, he might be tempted toward a coalition not only by the electoral advantage of getting the Tory leadership to share the responsibility for a further dose of unpleasant austerity in the shape of curtailed supplies of American films, tobacco, and so forth,

Emanuel Shinwell, British Fuel Minister

As seen by Oscar Berger

but also by the knowledge that the government's task in calling for a really national effort to meet the emergency would be enormously facilitated if it had the entire press with it; and that would be possible only for a coalition government. On the other hand, he would have to face the fact that a coalition could be formed only on terms. As the price of their support the Tories would certainly insist that there should be no more instalments of nationalization; the present experiment of socialization by slow degrees would have to be put into cold storage. This would split the Labor movement from head to heel: the rank and file would be unable to understand how a government with a socialist mandate and an overwhelming majority could feel obliged to come to terms with the enemy. Mr. Attlee would deal his party a blow even more deadly than that delivered by Ramsay MacDonald in 1931.

This analysis of the coalition hypothesis leads most observers who are friendly to the government to the conclusion that Britain would have to face an economic crisis much more violent than anything yet foreseen before the desperate expedient of a National Government could be seriously considered. The real question today is whether the next White Paper, scheduled for publication shortly, will contain sufficiently concrete proposals. The goal, increased production, is clear enough; that was stated forthrightly, albeit in general terms, by the first White Paper, published last month. But it is widely known that the Cabinet is by no means of one mind on how production is to be increased. By cutting down the armed forces and other services so as to release more pairs of hands for civilian industry? This would involve a radical modification of British foreign policy, to which Ernest Bevin, who still dominates the Cabinet by his personality, and Mr. Alexander, Minister of Defense, are resolutely opposed. By importing foreign labor on a large scale? Against this solution Mr. Isaacs, Minister of Labor, adduces strong opposition from the Trades Union Congress; Mr. Chuter Ede, the Home Secretary, is believed to be arguing against a large infiltration of "aliens" on political grounds. The housing situation offers another difficulty, even if politically desirable entrants possessing trade skills could be found. Higher wages and greater mechanization in the unpopular and backward industries? Mechanization will take time—only a sadly small 5 per cent of the dollar loan has so far been spent on importing machinery; and higher wages, unless rates in other industries can be frozen, a difficult thing to put over, contain an inconvenient inflationary threat.

There remain two possible courses of action. One is that the government resolutely ignore popular objections to cutting down all non-essential imports and reduce the already meager British rationing scales. The other is that Britain give notice now that it is compelled by force majeure to admit its inability to honor the obligations of the dollar-loan agreement with regard to multilateral trading and methods of seeking a settlement with its sterling creditors. For the Cabinet neither of these courses is attractive. Already it is clear that the Tory press is succeeding to some extent in discrediting the government with its continuous references to it as the "architect of austerity," and it will be much more difficult now to call for further tightening of belts than it would have been when the American loan was being argued.

As for admitting British inability to carry out the terms of the loan, "repudiation" is an ugly word and quite a sizable section of the Cabinet still believes that Britain must continue indefinitely to rely on American aid. The belief is therefore growing that the White Paper will reflect the Cabinet's reluctance to make up its mind and that it will take refuge once again in somewhat nebulous appeals to the country to "do more." That the country is prepared to do, but it wants to have the lines of action—Socialist lines it hopes—clearly marked out. The dog must be shown the rabbit.

February 14

The effect of the present acute freeze-up, which has created chaos in transport and paralyzed industry, has been the complete disappearance of coalition rumors from the pages of the Tory press. The explanation is probably that the Tory leadership has realized that the immediate reaction to the crisis in the Labor movement has been a visible strengthening of the left-inclined elements in both the party and the unions. There has been some criticism of Attlee for undue delay in broadcasting the facts to the country, but the only serious complaint from Labor is that the Cabinet, which knew the coal-stock situation last summer, failed to face up to the unpopular but essential task of restricting non-essential trades. The consensus of Labor opinion is that the temporary emergency caused by the weather proves that the underlying crisis in production and balance of payments can be solved by nothing less than socialism. Significantly enough, the initial inclination of the Cabinet to yield to Tory newspaper pressure and sack Shinwell evoked violent protests from the miners and other militant unions. Hence, shrewdly inferring that a coalition move would be repudiated by a large section of the Labor Party, capable ultimately of capturing the party leadership and launching a definitively Socialist program of economic reconstruction, the Tories have pigeonholed the coalition idea. They are not inclined to upset a gradualist Cabinet at the cost of swinging Labor farther left.

A Faith to Live By

I. THE DILEMMA OF MODERN MAN

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

WE ARE living in an age in which our social and historical imperatives may be fairly simply defined but not easily achieved. Our task is to create and re-create community within the terms set by a technical civilization. The constant elaboration of man's technical skills has created a potential world community, but this community cannot be actualized as easily as modern men had hoped. The same technical skills have created abundance in modern industrial communities; yet these communities all suffer from great social insecurity because they find it difficult to distribute the new wealth equitably enough to guarantee harmony and stability.

In such a historical situation the average person still interprets the faith by which he lives primarily in socio-political terms. He has faith in this or that social objective. Usually in the United States and in the Western world generally the objective is defined as "the democratic way of life." I do not believe that such a purely political objective constitutes an adequate "faith." It may define our primary moral obligation, or at least the social dimension of that obligation, but it does not define the meaning of our existence. Any adequate sense of the meaning of life must be able to comprehend not only what we ought to do but what we are. It must explain why we are creatures who do not find it easy, or even possible, to fulfil our highest obligation.

At the present moment the popular definition of our political ideal as the "democratic way of life" hides a very great dilemma, which is also a part of the total

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, a staff contributor of The Nation, is professor of applied Christianity at Union Theological Seminary and author of "The Children of Light and the Children of Darkness."

REINHOLD NIEBUHR
Union Theological Seminary

human situation. For the world is divided between different types of "democrats," between those who would sacrifice freedom, or have already sacrificed it, for the sake of an equalitarian and collectivist democracy and those who would make no sacrifice of any freedom in the interest of justice. In the international community this cleavage may result in a world conflict between two cohorts of world-savers holding contradictory views of democracy. In national communities it may still lead to the most tragic internecine conflicts. The truth obviously lies somewhere between these two creeds; but it is difficult to find, precisely because political creeds have been invested with a religious aura by a supposedly irreligious age. This whole development rather refutes John Dewey's hope, expressed some years ago in his "Common Faith," that men of good-will would agree on social and moral objectives, once modern culture had dissolved the irrelevant loyalties of historical religions. We have, as Americans, a particularly embarrassing position in this debate or conflict between contradictory conceptions of democracy. For America in general, and the American plutocracy in particular, has a more uncritical confidence in the organic relation between "free enterprise" and democracy than any other nation; and this type of bigotry may do more damage to the world community and the cause of justice than any religious bigotry ever did.

PROGRESS NOT REDEPTIVE

Even if this contradiction in the definition of our democratic objectives did not exist, it would still be impossible to define the meaning of human existence purely in terms of some social and political objective—partly because no human life can be completely contained within the bounds of the social and historical dimension of life, and partly because we do not either individually or collectively move as easily or surely toward ideal goals as past generations have assumed. Our age is secular, either non-Christian or anti-Christian, in the main outlines of its basic creed. It has disavowed the historical religious faiths partly because their symbols seem outmoded in an age of science but chiefly because modern men find the tragic view of life implicit in religion unacceptable and the old theories of redemption irrelevant. A message of redemption which offered men and nations life only through death and declared that men could be saved only through repentance seemed completely irrelevant to an age which saw history moving forward to ever more impressive elaborations of human power and freedom. There was nothing the matter with human life which historical growth could not cure.

The implicit faith of the past two centuries has hardly prepared us for the kind of frustration through which we must live in the next century or two. For we have been given the task of creating community in larger dimensions than any one or two centuries can accomplish.

The frustrations of our age become pathetic rather than tragic when we have no means of either anticipating or comprehending the character of our present experiences. The one unifying element in all strands of modern culture was the idea of progress. We had faith in a redemptive history. This faith, which supposedly made all other interpretations of life completely incredible, is now progressively disclosing itself as the most incredible of all interpretations of life. This refutation of the culture of modern man by contemporary history may be regarded as the real spiritual crisis of our day.

When the atomic bomb fell upon Hiroshima it brought more than one chapter in both political and cultural history to a symbolic conclusion. It particularly concluded that chapter of Western spiritual history, beginning in the Renaissance, which regarded history as a kind of God and time as a kind of Christ. It was an age which assumed that technical progress, which continually increased man's power over nature and freedom from natural limitations, would inevitably contribute to human welfare and happiness. It was an age which assumed that man's increased mobility and the wider range of his eyes, ears, and voice, transfigured by microscope and telescope, telegraph and radio, would inevitably lead to the enlargement of the human community. Actually mechanical advances have only created a potential, and not an actual, world community, and have meanwhile destroyed many of the organic forms of community which gave life sanity and stability in older cultures.

We have had to learn that history is neither a God nor a redeemer. The real fact is that while history solves many problems, it aggravates rather than mitigates the basic incongruities of human existence. Man is a finite and contingent creature, with some sense of universal value transcending his own existence but unfortunately inclined to endow the contingent values of his life or culture, of his truth or loyalty, with an absolute significance which it does not deserve. He thereby finds community with his fellow-men as difficult as it is necessary; particularly since his fellow-men are engaged in the same idolatrous process. Man can neither live alone, not being self-sufficient, nor easily come to terms with his fellow-men. The same instruments which extend the range of possible community also extend the range of man's impulse to domination over his fellows. Thus history pitches the drama of life on continually higher levels, but the essentials of the drama remain the same.

THE ILLUSION OF "SCIENTIFIC" POLITICS

The fact that history is endlessly creative but not redemptive might have been more apparent to modern man had it not been for another illusion in modern culture. This other illusion is closely related to the idea of progress and is indeed frequently the basis for it. It is the illusion that the so-called "methods of science" or "impartial scientific inquiry" or "scientific objectivity" are actually the instruments by which mankind rises to higher and higher degrees of perfection. There are forms of the idea of progress which trust primarily in the extension of the evolutionary process of biology into the realm of history. But more frequently historical progress is assumed to depend upon the ability of man gradually to rise from his position as a creature of natural and historical forces to become their master. The instrument by which this is to be accomplished is science. By scientific impartiality man presumably rises from finite to universal perspectives, from interested to disinterested appraisal of problems of justice, from prejudice and passion to god-like serenity and impartiality. Science will not only unlock the mysteries of existence which have remained closed to the poetic and religious imagination and to the speculations of philosophy but will redeem man from the fragmentary and partial character of his life and actions and guarantee actions of universal validity.

Sometimes it is assumed that the methods of science will make men moral merely by making them rational. Sometimes it is believed that science should be used to control the dark and irrational forces in human nature, "that the same science which has altered the face of nature can change the habits of men." Sometimes the continued egotism and irrationality of individuals are assumed, but it is believed that a "scientific" politics will be able to manage social forces as readily as man now manages the forces of nature. The end product of these illusions is the type of rationalism which dreams of setting up a world government containing scientifically tested constitutional instruments for equilibrating all the vitalities of a community of nations and for arbitrating or, if necessary, suppressing every political conflict.

A simple fact has been obscured by this cult of redemption through science. Man is a creature whose rational and vital processes are in organic unity, and there is no "scientific method" by which he can escape from the hopes, fears, ambitions, and anxieties of his own individual existence or those of his nation, civilization, or ethnic group. In all problems pertaining to the security or the meaning of his own life or the justice of his conflict with some competing life or vitality, he is never the disinterested observer but an interested participant. In so far as impartiality is possible, it is a moral and religious as much as a scientific achievement. A contrite recognition of the interested character of our views and actions must always lie behind the achievement of relative disinterestedness. The achievement involves the whole of the personality and is therefore not purely intellectual or scientific.

Modern culture has wittingly or unwittingly followed the thought of Comte, who believed that the history of the world could be divided into three ages—the theological, the metaphysical, and the scientific—and who saw the possibility of solving all human problems in the third and final stage of human development by the application of the scientific method to man's social existence. Actually the ability of science to achieve impartial and universally valid judgments rests partly upon the sharply circumscribed fields of inquiry in which science looks for causal relations and partly upon the fact that a natural science, which investigates the determined sequences of nature, is under no temptation to weigh evidence or make hazardous judgments on such imponderables as human motives.

But the wider the field of inquiry becomes, the more plainly will even the natural sciences betray themselves to be under the guidance of presuppositions, implicit or explicit metaphysical assumptions, which are not the consequence but the basis of the inquiry. If it is historical rather than biological or geological sequence which is under inquiry, there is no strictly "scientific" method of judging the motives which prompt human actions or of comparing competing vitalities in history. Every judgment of fact is also a value judgment, presupposing a norm. The norm is itself historically conditioned, and the application of the norm to the stuff of history is twice conditioned.

Drawing by Golden

This fact does not invalidate the social and historical sciences or prove that they ought to be reduced to statistical proportions in order to become purer sciences. Both the logical and the analytical powers of reason remain instruments by which partial and particular points of view are corrected, and the whole stuff of historical reality is brought under examination. We must continue to seek to understand what things are and how they came to be what they are in history as well as in nature. But there is no magic in either logic or the scientific method which will coerce men or nations to subordinate the particular to the universal interest or to correct the partial by a more universal insight. Reason in history remains permanently ambiguous, being both the servant and the master of all of history's vitalities.

HISTORY A VITAL, NOT A RATIONAL, PROCESS

There is, for instance, no "scientific method" which could guarantee that statesmen who must deal with the social and political consequences of atomic energy could arrive at the kind of "universal mind" which operated in the discovery of atomic energy. Statesmen who deal with this problem will betray "British," "American," or "Russian" bias, not because they are less intelligent than the scientists but because they are forced to approach the issue in terms of their responsibility to their respective nations. Their formulation of a solution is intimately and organically related to the hopes, fears, and ambitions of nations. They must deal with history as a vital and not a rational process. As a vital process it is always something less and something more than reason. It is less than rational in so far as the power impulses of nations express themselves as inexorably as the force of a stampeding herd of cattle. It is something more than rational in so far as human beings have aspirations and loyalties transcending both impulse and prudence. Man is a heaven-storming creature whose highest ideals are curiously compounded with his immediate and mundane interests. The Marxist dream of a universal classless society, mixed with the power impulses of a Russian state and the anxieties of a precarious dictatorship, is a nice symbol of what historical reality is like. Our so-called democratic world is a little more rational; but the mixture of democratic idealism and the quest for profits of a vast American economic machine must be almost as bewildering to the outside observer as the Russian mixture.

The collective mixtures of ideals and interests are more vivid than individual expressions of human spirituality, but every individual life is governed less by prudence and rationality and more by what lies below the level of reason and rises above the level of rational calculation than a scientific culture understands. One may be grateful for the fact that poets and novelists continued to bear testimony to these dimensions of life even in a scientific age, if they dealt at all authentically with the human scene. Because man in his grandeur and in his misery, in his high aspirations and in their egoistic corruption, is and always will be a more complex creature than modern culture has understood, his history is more tragic and his redemption from self-seeking, whether individual or collective, more difficult and always less final than we have assumed.

Old cultures and civilizations, reigning oligarchies and traditional social systems and structures do not quietly yield to the logic of a new historical development. They refuse to die in bed. They take the field, ostensibly to defend their "ideals" against some new barbarism, but also to preserve established interests against new vitalities. That is why we must march through any number of world wars before we can achieve world community; and why the world community which is within the grasp of human powers will be less stable and secure than our calculating world planners can realize. History presents us with constantly enlarged responsibilities. We must meet these responsibilities if we would remain human. The Nazis have shown us the perverse consequences of any effort to turn the clock back and "return to the womb" of tribal primitivism. We must move on. But there are neither securities nor fulfillments in history in which the heart can rest.

FULFILMENT ONLY THROUGH FAITH

Since we are free spirits who transcend the historical process, as well as creatures who are involved in it, we crave for some ultimate security and fulfillment. But since history remains as fragmentary and as full of contradictions as our individual life-adventures, we can have such security and fulfillment only in an ultimate sense and only by faith. The kind of faith which adequately completes the temple of meaning will also reveal that our own egotism, and that of our nation, and not merely the egotism of competitor or foe is responsible for the tragic aspects of history. Thus contrition and faith go hand in hand.

In Christian piety the devout soul always beholds itself in a double relation to Christ. The perfect love, of which the Cross is the symbol, is regarded as the final norm of human goodness and defines what man ought to be. But man also knows himself to be the crucifier of the Christ. This expresses our understanding of the fact that life can only be brought to completion by a love in which the self is not concerned for itself but only for its fellows. But we also know that as individuals and as groups we seek our own. The justice we have achieved in history is a compromise between these two impulses; and the compromise is not achieved simply by calculation and prudence. Such pity and mercy as are insinuated into the cruelties and inhumanities of human life are the fruits of the contrition, which recognizes that the egotism we abhor in others is in us also. Fanaticism is always the product of self-righteousness. Religion has produced as much fanaticism as contrition, because religion is never a good force per se, but merely the final conflict between human self-esteem and divine mercy. And the one is as frequently victorious as the other.

A secular age imagined that it could exorcise fanaticism by disavowing religion. But an age which prides itself upon its scientific objectivity has actually sunk to new levels of cruelty, for the man who knows himself to be absolutely right through the benefit of science is as cruel as those who achieved this fanaticism by religious revelation. Not only Marxist fanatics are involved in the cruelties of our age, but democratic idealists also. The ancients were certainly not more merciless to their foes than we; no one has been so merciless to a vanquished foe as we since the Assyrians. We are pitiless because we do not know ourselves to be pitiable.

A secular age thought it would be sufficient to disavow the other-worldliness of religion in order to achieve a consistent and humane sense of responsibility for the commonweal. But the disavowal of an incredible heaven led to the avowal of incredible utopias; incredible because they defined an unconditioned good amid the conditions of nature history. This persistent utopianism has generated fanatical furies of our day, for if the heaven of a classless society could be established on earth, would it be worth the price which the Communists are ready to pay? It is also responsible for the alternate fits of illusion and disillusion which distract us from our historic responsibilities.

Life is never completed, either individually or collectively; and it is never completely freed from chaos or from contradictions to its essential meaning. An adequate faith must understand this quality of life; but that is impossible without an explicit or implicit belief that a divine mercy can complete what we cannot complete. Such a faith may of course be corrupted and may beguile men from their pressing responsibilities; but the alternative secular idealism also leads to deep corruptions. It tempts men to seek in others, and never in themselves, the root of human misery. And if they finally find it in themselves, their optimism gives way to despair. The mood of this century compared with the optimism of the nineteenth century looks very much like the despair which all false optimism generates. Perhaps it is significant for the spirituality of our day that one of the most brilliant journals in our nation runs utopian editorials championing world government on its editorial pages, and fills most of the other pages with little bits of fiction and descriptions of contemporary life, the unifying mood of which is a pitiless honesty in the dissection of human motives that hovers continually on the very brink of complete cynicism.

"Let the People Eat Chops"

BY G. E. R. GEDYE

Bucharest, Rumania

THE night after I arrived in Bucharest I was awakened at 2 a.m. by a knocking on the door of my room in the Athenaeum Palace, the leading and only clean hotel in the capital. The night porter came in full of apologies, carrying the shoes which I had put outside the door. "Ring in the morning for them to be cleaned," he said, "but don't leave them out overnight if you want to see them again."

For breakfast I was given almost uneatable dark bread made largely of maize flour, a pale fluid brewed apparently from blackberry leaves, and a glutinous cube of jam substitute—but also as many fresh eggs as I wanted and a plateful of cold ham. For lunch I was offered a choice of such delicacies as pâté de foie gras, grilled mushrooms, and woodcock, with huge pork chops or beefsteak to follow. But there were no vegetables or salads. When I asked for beer, the waiter was amused—Rumanian breweries had seen no barley for months. But drinkable wine was cheap and abundant.

It was not, of course, a new experience in liberated Europe to find luxuries available for people with foreign currency—and for the rich—while the masses were near starvation. Budapest, before the introduction of the new currency, was the classic example of a city in which such conditions obtained, despite the fact that the Communist Party controlled the government. The peculiar characteristic of Bucharest is the increasing scarcity—even for the rich—of some products combined with the temporary abundance of others. A hotel can serve Lucullan meals but no good bread, tea, or vegetables. And one must watch one's shoes. Rumania's economic set-up almost makes sense of Marie Antoinette's advice to the populace starving for bread—"Why don't they eat cake?" Lacking bread, cheese, and beer, the people of Bucharest today might well try pork chops and wine.

Food difficulties arose for the first time in the history of this fertile land when war reached its territory in August, 1944, and it was obliged to feed the Red Army and then, under the armistice convention, to send food to Russia. But the present crisis is primarily the result of the past two years of unexampled drought. Meat and poultry are abundant because the drought burned up the crops and left the country almost devoid of fodder. The soil was so parched that only a quarter of the autumn sowing was possible. Often the starving peasants used their scanty issues of seed to make bread. No sugar has been issued since April, and sugar on the black market costs nearly $4 a kilo. Many districts go without their ration of bread for two or three days and then get no back rations.

Bread on the black market costs about 40 cents a loaf, six times the price of rationed bread; this is a day's wages for a well-paid charwoman. Jassy was recently without any bread at all, rationed or black market, for ten days running. Similar conditions prevail in most towns and villages in Moldavia. Some of the peasants still have wheat and maize that they hoarded for their own use. Others crowd into Bucharest in search of food. An acquaintance told me of two young men who asked him for work but whom he found to be too weak from starvation even to lift a bed that he wanted shifted. In this country of forests there is a great shortage of wood for fuel owing to lack of transport. To heat a single stove throughout the winter with wood bought on the black market costs $26.

G. E. R. GEDYE is correspondent for Central Europe of The Nation and the London Daily Herald. His book, "Betrayal in Central Europe," was widely discussed a few years ago.

Estimating the real value of wages is complicated by a system of canteens—"Economat"—at which people in employment can buy essential foods at minimum prices. Without them the workers simply could not eat during the present wild inflation. The day I reached Rumania the pound sterling was valued at 165,000 lei; a fortnight later it stood at 208,000 lei. Averaging out the exchanges, an unskilled worker earns about $7 a month, a skilled worker $10 to $12; both get in addition one pair of boots and one suit of overalls a year. A commercial clerk earns about $16, a civil servant even less than an unskilled worker, a magistrate or a schoolteacher a little under $18 a month. All have access to their "Economat," where prices are very low. If his family is to be properly nourished, a married civil servant needs to spend practically his whole pay on food and has almost nothing left over for rent, fuel, and clothing. The way out for him is the classic Rumanian one—"baksheesh," corruption. Since the government came to power in March, 1945, it has done nothing toward accomplishing the first point on its program—reduction of the cost of living and abolition of profiteering and the black market.

Russian reparation claims are of course a heavy burden on the country's economy. The Rumanian army was responsible for much destruction, not all of which was "legitimate" war damage. Naturally there is a heavy bill to pay; $875,000,000 had been paid by April, 1946. But reparations obligations constitute only one of the ways in which the Rumanian economy is under tribute to Russia. The cost to the country of its subsequent participation in the last phases of the war against Nazi Germany is estimated at $302,000,000. Reserves of livestock have been reduced by 131,000 horses, 137,000 head of cattle, 528,000 sheep, and 122,000 pigs. Nearly 50 per cent of the motor vehicles in Rumania have been handed over to Russia.

From 80 to 85 per cent of the country's sea, inland-waterway, and overland transport is now working exclusively in Russian interests—commercially, on reparations deliveries, or for the Red Army. Rumania is practically cut off from any trade with the West; it is estimated that in 1945 over 90 per cent of its exports went to Russia, and the proportion today is still very high. According to Rumanian oil experts, 3,471,000 out of 3,525,000 tons of oil went to Russia in a single month, either as reparations or exports. The output of foreign oil companies is treated in the same way: part is taken as reparations, part as exports. The compensation paid by the Rumanian government in inflated lei is so low that representatives of foreign concerns say they will be bankrupt in two years. One would expect foreign oil men to be incensed by the export of their oil to the Soviets, but there seems to be considerable foundation for their complaint that their companies are being bankrupted so that they can be acquired later by Soviet-Rumanian concerns.

Soviet-Rumanian trusts already dominate the economic life of the country. "Sovrombank" is a vast financial concern to which Rumanian banks have contributed their share capital and Russia the formerly German shares which it obtained after the armistice. By last summer some 50 per cent of Rumanian banking was in the hands of "Sovrombank." Russian oil interests are handled by "Sovrompetrol," through which, it was expected, Russia could control one-third of the country's total oil reserves of 6,500,000 tons. If the Belgian and French companies, however, are given back the share they claim under the Teheran agreement, the Soviet Union will control only 12 per cent.

"Sovromtransport" owns all the installations in the principal ports—Constanza, Braila, Galatz, and Giurgiu—and has a thirty years' lease of nearly all quays and wharves. The four principal shipyards of Rumania are leased by "Sovromtransport." It controls all Rumania's Danube shipping which was not ceded to Russia as reparation. Rumania is thus dependent on "Sovromtransport" for economic relations with other Danubian states. Road transport is largely controlled by a subsidiary of "Sovromtransport." "Tars," the Soviet-Rumanian civil airlines monopoly—its chairman is a Russian citizen—will hold all Rumanian civil airfields for the next thirty years. No foreign airline may use Rumanian airports without the consent of "Tars." The Rumanian government is under an obligation to grant to "Tars" sites for any new airfields which may be demanded. As to rail transport, the rolling stock of the Rumanian state railways has been divided as follows: 535 engines and 4,800 trucks ceded to the Soviets; 1,855 engines and 27,258 trucks left with Rumania. From the armistice to April, 1946, 80 per cent of all railroad transportation served Russia's interests. "Sovromlemn" controls 25 per cent of Rumania's timber production; the Red Army absorbs another 30 per cent. On "Sovromlemn's" board of directors are seven Soviet citizens nominated by Russia, four Rumanian citizens nominated by Rumania, one Hungarian, and two representatives of private Rumanian concerns.

Rumanian business circles reckon that if things go on as at present, within six years the Rumanian economy will have been practically absorbed into the Soviet system.

The Spanish Republican Crisis

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Paris, February 13

THE Spanish Republican crisis precipitated by Prime Minister Giral's resignation has been brought to an unexpected and dangerous climax. The choice of Rodolfo Llopias as head of the new government can benefit only Franco. Llopias is secretary of the Toulouse Socialist group and until now has been known for his capitulationist leanings. The Cabinet he has announced is in every respect weaker than the Giral Cabinet, itself no model of strength. The main weakness of Giral's government was the presence in it of two ministers representing the Prieto position—in favor of the dissolution of Republican parliamentary institutions to clear the way for a plebiscite that at best would result in a reactionary Franquist regime only without Franco. It was illogical and confusing to bring diametrically opposed forces—the resistance and the capitulation—together in the same Cabinet; but at least in Giral's Cabinet the Prietist ministers, De Francisco and Trifon Gomez, were in the minority. Now the minority has become the majority and controls the government. This incredible situation could arise only in an "emigration" where the normal discipline exercised on parties and organizations by popular opinion is non-existent and a handful of unscrupulous politicians can settle a crisis according to their own selfish interests. These men work as they please in a kind of dark chamber hermetically sealed off from the Spanish masses, for whose feelings they have little regard.

The crisis began with the resignation of Prieto's two ministers. When discussions opened on a new Cabinet, all parties and groups except of course the Prietists expressed themselves in favor of at once forming a strong government on a broad foundation. Indeed, their position was stated in such unequivocal terms that the Right Socialists, who advocated outright dissolution, were compelled to change their tactics; now they too declared they wanted to continue the Republican institutions. Obviously they were hoping to obtain a victory on two fronts. Outside the government Prieto would continue his propaganda against the Republic; inside they would intensify their fifth-column activities, especially if they succeeded in capturing the premiership.

Confronted with these double-crossing tactics, the true Republicans to a man urged President Martínez Barrio to form a representative Republican Cabinet. At no point was it a question of imposing one leader as against another; of insisting, for example, on a Cabinet headed by Negrín that would give new life and impetus to the entire Republican movement. On the contrary. Since Negrín is unpopular with the old-line politicians because he represents the very antithesis of their cacique philosophy, the Republicans were ready even to throw their support to Barcia if he would agree to resolve the crisis by rallying around him the representatives of the resistance and not of capitulation. The President was informed that on this basis all groups, including those who had refused to participate in the Giral government, were willing to join the new Cabinet and share its responsibilities.

En route to Paris I had stopped in London to see Negrín. His attitude was that at all costs the formation of such a Cabinet must be facilitated. He asked his own group not to advance his name for the premiership.

Martínez Barrio had an opportunity to choose a regime that would have cleared the political air. Instead, by naming Llopias he has further complicated the situation. The new Prime Minister is an audacious man, capable of a volte-face whenever expediency dictates. Though relatively young in years, he is the prototype of the old provincial politico. Julio Just, to whom he has intrusted the key portfolios of Interior and War, is a nonentity who defies description; Franco's propaganda service will be quick to point up the humorous aspect of this appointment. Llopias has justifiably kept the Cabinet small. But, unfortunately, the smallness is also qualitative.

What impelled Martínez Barrio to select Llopias? He cannot argue lack of support from the other groups, for as I have indicated, they were ready to join a genuine Republican Cabinet. Nor can he pretend he had no inkling of the reaction to this choice in Republican circles. When news came that he had sent for Llopias, the leaders of the various parties and groups got together and drafted a respectful but strongly worded letter. They called the President's attention to the enormous responsibility he was taking and advised him that, were a Llopias government formed, they would be obliged to combat it openly and energetically. For two days he still had an opportunity to change his mind, since Llopias in his search for ministers was meeting expected difficulties. But he stuck to his guns. The explanation offered by one of his closest friends is that the President acted with Machiavellian statecraft in selecting an ambitious Prietist, who had never dreamed of such high honor, in order to play him against his master. Llopias may well have pulled a dirty trick on Prieto to become Premier. But he is capable of a similar trick in reverse to regain his favor. In any case, Trifon Gomez, who was Prieto's real choice for the premiership, is once more a minister.

In line with their general policy of participating in any Spanish government in exile, the Communists have entered the new Cabinet. It will certainly be difficult to explain this move to their followers. Until three weeks ago the Communist press was strongly attacking Llopi, and at a recent public meeting Communist leaders denounced him as an intriguer and an enemy of the Republic.

Unquestionably the Republican cause has suffered serious damage. But Spanish Republicans are not easily discouraged. Already first steps have been taken to form a new organization, España Combatiente, whose purpose will be to keep alive the indomitable spirit of resistance that made the Spanish war an unforgettable chapter in the fight against fascism. The creation of such an organization in no way implies a break with Republican institutions or withdrawal of recognition from them. It bears no resemblance to the old Junta Suprema, created two years ago and now defunct, which opposed the idea of forming a government in exile. Nor is it in any way similar to the committee now proposed by Prieto, which would dissociate itself from governmental responsibility and thus be free to negotiate any sort of compromise. España Combatiente is a movement aimed at rallying all Republicans regardless of party who are for a policy of resistance against any attempt at capitulation and against a plebiscite, which Prieto advocates. It is nothing more or less than a movement in defense of the Republic.

IN ONE EAR

BY LOU FRANKEL

GOOD satire has always been difficult to find in radio; only the keen-witted Fred Allen has provided it consistently. One obvious reason for the dearth is that radio requires fresh material each week, whereas the stage can offer one good satirical routine as a season's entertainment. That radio satire can nicely debunk modern pomp and circumstance is clear to anyone who has listened to Fred Allen needle the network vice-presidents.

Now Henry Morgan has brought his particular brand of satire to the American Broadcasting Company network on Wednesday evenings at 10:30 (E. S. T.), and adult listeners are delighted. Before the war Morgan's banter about Adler Elevator Shoes made his WOR spot a popular one on the dial. He is back with much more pungent comments which get very cleverly under the hide of various political and social figures. Recently he said, "Everything is O. K. K. K. in Georgia, where Herman is the champion of squatters' rights." And in a condensed version of what he called "The Mikado by Gil and Sull," which demolished the complacent concert annotator, he ribbed the flamboyant MacArthur by having the Mikado introduced as "MacArthur's best friend."

The secret of Morgan's success, I think, is the way he sinks his harpoons without any preparation. The insults begin flying at once; Morgan commits mayhem without hesitating. He has also a first-rate cast of stooge voices and a competent orchestra.

If his target is the oh-so-intimate radio commentator who knows everything that is going on anywhere, Morgan first states his theme: "You know, I've been thinking about radio, that's even harder than listening. I've heard a lot of programs, and I often wonder if radio is really true to life, or vice versa." Then he shows the honey-voiced announcer at work selling a hair lotion to the ladies, and being something quite different when he gets home from "a tough day's work over a hot microphone." Finally we hear Mr. Morgan H. Dreary, radio commentator, at work.

Good evening, everyone, how are you this evening? Watch Georgia! I have it from unofficial but usually reliable sources who tell me their most intimate secrets which I tell everyone . . . that Herman Talmadge, one of the latest governors of Georgia, was elected by a tremendous upsurge of more than 600 write-in votes, which proves conclusively that he has won the complete confidence of almost a fraction of the voters. The Governor spent a very busy day today, attending luncheons, addressing meetings, breaking into various offices.

Now comes the final ironic touch. Morgan looks at Morgan H. Dreary, radio commentator, at home:

Girl: What's the matter? You look depressed.

Dreary: I've been worried all day. . . .

Girl: About what?

Dreary: Did I or did I not feed the canary this morning?

Girl: Of course you did. By the way, you were very good tonight, dear. Tell me, who was your unofficial source?

Dreary: (Startled.) You ask me? Why your own kid sister!

Girl: Oh, you shouldn't, she's only twelve. And where did you get that other confidential item from?

Dreary: C'mere . . . shhh.

Girl: Yes?

Dreary: You won't tell anyone?

Girl: No.

Dreary: I heard it on Gabriel Heatter's program.

If you don't like commercials, then by all means listen to Morgan. He may say, "Here is Ted Husing, the world's best announcer and the world's worst commercial." Or, "Tonight the sponsor has kindly consented to reduce the length of the commercials by between one and two seconds." Or, "There's a pretty long-winded commercial coming up, so if you'd like to tune out, I'll wait a second. . . ."

Unquestionably network radio has a brash new talent in Henry Morgan. He has proved that he can do it every week; and he sells such huge quantities of his sponsor's Eversharp Shick Injector Razor that he will be left alone by the network, the advertising agency, and the sponsor's business office. Even if Morgan never gets any better, I'll be satisfied. But he will, and by the time Fred Allen retires to Dr. Rockwell's front porch down in Maine, Morgan will pick up where Allen left off.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Reform or Bankruptcy

THE railroads no longer have the monopoly of inland freight carriage which they once enjoyed. Trucks and pipe-lines have both diverted a large volume of traffic, and now the airplane is taking over most of their mail business and threatening to cut heavily into express revenues. Even so, the economies of locomotive haulage for bulk freight are such that the railroads seem likely to maintain their pre-eminence in the goods-transport field for many years to come.

When we turn to the passenger department, we find a much more clouded future. All through the twenties and thirties the number of train travelers steadily diminished. In 1923 the railroads chalked up 38.3 billion passenger-miles; in 1939 but 22.7 billion. Over the same period, it is estimated, the passenger mileage of private automobiles rose from 120 billion to 495 billion and that of buses from 4 billion to 20 billion. Domestic airline travel, not yet begun in 1923, accounted for 678 million passenger-miles in 1939, or about one-eighth of the Pullman car business.

With the war came an astounding increase in travel. Soldiers and warworkers, business executives and officials shuttled across the country, and in the peak year, 1944, railroad passenger travel piled up to 95 billion miles, more than twice that of the pre-war record reached in 1920. It was money for jam for the railroads, whose ancient coaches and Pullmans, packed sardine fashion, probably earned enough to make possible their retirement to the junk yard, where most of them properly belong.

The cost in good-will, however, while difficult to measure, was certainly very large. Some effort was made to cheer disgusted travelers by offering them wondrous pictures of a streamlined post-war era when they would be whizzed to their destinations in technicolored comfort. But after eighteen months of peace these draftsmen's dreams remain dreams for the most part. A few showy new trains have made their appearance, and some roads have placed substantial orders for coaches and sleepers. But as Robert R. Young, the unorthodox chairman of the Chesapeake and Ohio, has pointed out, at the present rate it will take twenty years to replace existing passenger rolling stock, and at the end of that period most of it will again be obsolescent. According to the same authority, 6,000 new sleeping-cars are urgently needed. As of June 1, 1946, only 764 had been ordered by 25 of the big roads; 30 other companies operating sleeper services had not ordered a single one.

The lackadaisical attitude of many railroad executives in regard to their passenger departments may be due in part to the fact that while they hope for improved freight business in the next few years, they are resigned to a sharp decline in passenger mileage. Their experts in the Association of American Railroads tell them to expect no more than 50 billion passenger miles this year and a fall to 35 billion by 1950. Even this last figure represents an enormous improvement over pre-war business, and personally I am inclined to question the possibility of its attainment unless the railroads heed the red lights ahead.

Mr. Young, who is reported to believe that New York Central's passenger business could be doubled or tripled by an aggressive and imaginative campaign, is now trying out some of his ideas on the Chesapeake and Ohio and its affiliated roads. He has ordered replacements for all main-line coaches and sleepers, taken steps to make diner service both more attractive and cheaper, introduced a credit-card system for travelers, and started showing movies on express trains. Possible results are illustrated by the experience of two Père Marquette streamliners which Young placed in service last summer between Detroit and Grand Rapids. Making three trips each way daily, these fast trains carried 102,031 revenue passengers in their first three months, or almost double the number on the same runs in the same period of 1945. And they have been earning a handsome return on the investment involved. This is the kind of thing railroads must do if they are to hold their own against the lower fares of the buses and the greater speed of the airlines.

Improved express service, however, is only the beginning of reform. Even more urgent, perhaps, is a complete overhaul of local services, which on many lines are so bad that nobody travels by train if any alternative mode of transport is available. I have no space here to discuss this and other passenger-department problems but would urge readers to study an article by Roger E. Tornell in the current Harper's Magazine—A Railroad Man Thinks Out Loud.

Mr. Tornell urges almost revolutionary changes in equipment, service regulations and attitudes, stations, and fare policies. He does so in the interest of the railroads themselves, for he believes that without drastic reforms the industry is heading rapidly toward trouble. Speaking of the handicaps suffered by railroad management in meeting "the new passenger competition," he stresses "acceptance, subconsciously if not consciously, of the idea that passenger service is something like a kept woman—useful in her best finery for giving an appearance of prosperity and dash, and as a means of dazzling important shippers and others, but useless for adding to net income. The conception and the attitude toward service which it breeds are bad. Whether passenger service can make money is debatable; but it is a certainty that if it is not well managed with the idea of making money, it can lose an appalling lot of money."

It is important to emphasize this last point because only when railroad management becomes fully alive to its implication are we likely to get action. As common carriers the railroads cannot expect to be allowed to cut losses by shutting down all but a few heavily traveled main routes. Nor can they hope, indefinitely, to subsidize unprofitable passenger departments by increasing freight charges. Even if the Interstate Commerce Commission proved complacent about that, competing forms of transport would enforce the law of diminishing returns. For many roads the real choice, in fact, is between the expenditure of money and thought on their passenger departments and another painful sojourn in the bankruptcy courts.

BOOKS and the ARTS

FAUSTINA, OR, ROCK ROSES

Tended by Faustina
yes in a crazy house upon a crazy bed, frail, of chipped enamel, blooming above her head into four vaguely rose-like flower-formations,

the white woman whispers to herself. The floor-boards sag this way and that. The crooked towel-covered table bears a can of talcum and five pasteboard boxes of little pills,

most half-crystallized.
The visitor sits and watches the dew glint on the screen and in it two glow-worms burning a drowned green.
Meanwhile the eighty watt bulb betrays us all,

discovering the concern
within our stupefaction;
lighting as well on heads of tacks in the wall paper, on a paper wall-pocket, violet-embossed, glistening with mica flakes.

It exposes the fine white hair, the gown with the undershirt showing at the neck, the pallid palm-leaf fan
she holds but cannot wield, her white disordered sheets like wilted roses.

Clutter of trophies, chamber of bleached flags!
—Rags or ragged garments hung on the chairs and hooks each contributing its shade of white, confusing as undazzling.

The visitor is embarrassed not by pain nor age
nor even nakedness,
though perhaps by its reverse.

By and by the whisper says "Faustina, Faustina . . ."
"¡Vengo, Señoral!"

On bare scraping feet
Faustina nears the bed.
She exhibits the talcum powder,
the pills, the cans of "cream,"
the white bowl of farina, requesting for herself
a little coñac;

complaining of, explaining,
the terms of her employment.
She bends above the other.
Her sinister kind face presents a cruel black coincident conundrum.

Oh, is it freedom at last, a lifelong dream of time and silence, dream of protection and rest?

Or is it the very worst,
the unimaginable nightmare that never before dared last more than a second?

The acuteness of the question forks instantly and starts a snake-tongue flickering;
blurs further, blunts, softens, separates, falls, our problems becoming helplessly proliferative.

There is no way of telling.
The eyes say only either.
At last the visitor rises, awkwardly proffers her bunch of rust-perforated roses and wonders oh, whence come all the petals.

ELIZABETH BISHOP

Death and Transfiguration

SELECTED WRITINGS OF DYLAN
THOMAS. New Directions. $3.50.

YOU always look captiously at a selection when you are fond of the original material. I think "Before I knocked and flesh let enter" and "Light breaks where no sun shines" ought to have been in from the first Dylan
Thomas volume, and more of the sonnet sequence from the second; the last sonnet is in, but there does not seem enough build-up for its magnificent ending:

... that Day
When the worm builds with the gold straws of venom
My nest of mercies in the rude, red tree.

As to the prose selections, the two from the "Portrait of the Artist as a Young Dog," though they are smashingly good numbers, leave an impression that it is horror and self-pity all through, which is not true of that jovial book. However,
I confess I think the selection well done otherwise. The smart title-page is very ugly, but the rest is decently printed.

Mr. J. L. Sweeney, in a well-informed introduction, says that "since 1940 and the air-raid poems Thomas has turned from the womb and the grave to the world of light; from the contemplation of the flesh and its declension to a metaphysical vision of resurrection." There is obviously some truth in this, but I am not sure that the change need be described so rosily. Anyone who starts bang off with a highly original and within its limits perfect technique is bound to have trouble in getting out of the limits; Dylan Thomas has been courageous in refusing to repeat his successes, and I expect this will pay in the end as it deserves to. But so far I like the earlier poems better. They have such concentration that they seem to be constructed of exploding bombs; and I think the secret of these brief passages is that Dylan Thomas has maneuvered himself for them into a strategic point, like a mountain range from which the rivers flow opposite ways. Thus in the lines quoted above (from the 1936 volume) the Christian ideas are taken seriously and not denied; one cannot call it merely a picture of "the flesh and its declension"; but they are crossed with something else. The worm (where you would expect birds) seems to stand for low-grade but undefeatable parts of the psyche which could make you a cosy home even in disaster and agony. It could build perhaps out of the poisons of hatred involuntarily let loose by the renunciation, not out of any noble aspect of the renunciation itself. Yet these materials are gold; Moses could make bricks with them; they are a witness to the strength and pleasure of your life as well as its indifference to your purposes. The twist is that the religious mind would not want to accept from God this appalling type of mercy, which yet he appears to use. In this kind of way Dylan Thomas has a large mind, and one working almost entirely within these echoes of metaphor, which are given a sort of incantatory power. A pantheistic assumption is kept up by which events inside his skin are magically correlated to larger events outside it, so that the themes are not as narrow as they look. It is very much poetry you can live with, because it opens on you gradually; I found it excellent stuff to have when wandering about China, where one was short of books. There is a certain nervous strain in it, because of the range of vision which has to be packed into each phrase; and a good deal of horror, which is after all required as one of the endpoints of the range. But it is a magnificent invention, and it does not seem to me all about "the declension of the flesh."

When in 1940 Dylan Thomas was presented with the actual theme of children burnt to death in air raids the horror did not need rubbing in, though it was expressed firmly. The surrealists in rather the same way, I think, had been partly prophesying the war, and when it came felt that there would be no point in work which might be mistaken for the realism of an official War Artist. The later religious poems pointed out by Mr. Sweeney, such as "Vision and Prayer," are I think as much within reach of horror (though perhaps not as much concerned about it) as the earlier sonnet sequence was: "I shall run lost in sudden/Terror and shining from/The once hooded room/Crying in vain/In the caldron/Of his Kiss." What one can say about other later poems is that the pressure, as if of hallucination, has been reduced; they are more reflective and perhaps more intelligible than the early ones, partly because the sentences add up to a more coherent poem. In the first volume (1934), and even more in the second (1936), the thought is so packed that

A frankness unusual even in unprofessional diplomats

COMPLACENT DICTATOR

by Sir Samuel Hoare

(Viscount Templewood)

Britain's wartime Ambassador to Spain here tells the extraordinary story of his struggle to keep Franco from becoming an active Axis belligerent—a story that will be of special interest to readers of our Ambassador Hayes's Wartime Mission in Spain.

"One must say of this book: first, it is essential reading for anyone pretending to real interest in current Spanish problems; second, it is an able . . . summation of a first-rate job of wartime diplomacy."—C. L. SULZBERGER, New York Times Book Review.

"It will prove both entertaining and rewarding for any American who is trying to get an intelligent grasp of what has been happening and is likely to happen on the European stage."—JOHN WILLIAM ROGERS, Chicago Sun Book Week.

This is a Borzoi Book, on sale at all bookshops at $3.50 and published in New York by

ALFRED · A · KNOPF

the mighty lines are very detachable; I do remember the context of "The two-a-vein, the foreskin and the cloud"—a line I was sorry not to meet here—but you do not need any context before reflecting on this impressive puzzle. It would have been tempting and fatal to get stuck in the mighty-line technique, and now that Dylan Thomas has gone beyond it he has the ball at his feet for further development. "Fern Hill" for example is a direct and enchanting description of the child Dylan on the home farm, the kind of thing that he had hitherto done only in prose; and the technical invention of an elaborate but unrhymed stanza form is just what it needed. But I am not sure about "turning towards the world of light"; it is a lament for lost youth, and it ends:

Oh as I was young and easy in the mercy of his means
Time held me green and dying
Though I sang in my chains like the sea.

The change is one of technique rather than of mood.

I hope very much that he will consolidate the new conquests, all the same. "The Winter's Tale" looks on the first page as if it is going to be a wonderful piece of story-telling, with the description of a farm working up to

He knelt, he wept, he prayed,
By the spit and the black pot in the log bright light
And the cup and the cut bread in the dancing shade,
In the muffled house, in the quick of night,
At the point of love, forsaken and afraid.

Only then instead the thing goes off into an ecstasy; turning to the world of light to be sure, as much as you could wish, but what I wanted was to hear one of the grinding Welsh anecdotes given this intensity of form. We may get it yet.

WILLIAM EMPSON

The Cycles of Style

THE COMMONWEALTH OF ART: Style in the Fine Arts, Music, and the Dance. By Curt Sachs, W. W. Norton and Company, $5.

TO find the rhythms within the arts, to disclose their affiliations and record the life of forms, is a venture that has engaged some of the most temperamental philosophic minds—Santayana, of course, not to mention Nietzsche, Spengler, Faure, Focillon, and the sensitive, painstaking Wölfflin. For his epigraph Mr. Sachs has chosen Friedrich Schiller's opinion that only pedants will seek to partition the arts into special learning; the philosopher will seek to interpret their unity. Sachs's own philosophic synthesis would demonstrate that styles in the visual arts and music move concurrently with great tidal impulses between ethos—"serenity, strictness, and moderation"—and pathos—"freedom, passion, and exaggeration." Even if this ethos-pathos vocabulary is hardly more advantageous than the classic-romantic vocabulary he discards, Sachs has worked out his basic dualism over very wide areas in separate arts and through many stylistic contrasts, particularly in music.

Reviewing what happened in the arts generation after generation, he first offers a synoptic history of changes in style from the primitives to 1946. This survey leads to the conclusion that the arts alternate between poles of the "eternal antithesis" of ethos and pathos, a dualism expressed in such oppositions as limitation and boundlessness, essence and appearance, close and open structure, density and size, plain and picturesque, line and color, addition and unification. Having found his language of ethos and pathos, Sachs distinguishes three gigantic cycles in which this dualism unfolds: the cycles of Antiquity, the Middle Ages, and the Later Ages. The phases within these cycles swing, in turn, from ethos to pathos by smaller and smaller vibrations. If, for example, the Later Ages are predominantly pathos, their minor phases of Renaissance and Romanticism move from ethos to pathos, and so on indeterminately. The visual arts dominate the opening of any cycle; the close of any cycle is music.

This sounds more schematic than Sachs might wish, since he, most of all, recognizes the danger of misinterpreting facts for the sake of theory. Yet to establish his case he need not have concerned himself with his impressive synopsis of the arts at thirty-year intervals. No "strictly methodical analysis," no accumulation of chronological evidence will interpret the spirit of the forms, the configurations of ethos and pathos. No matter how diligently we qualify or subtract counter-forces, no theory will easily accommodate Wagner and Brahms as contemporaries, or LeNain and Inigo Jones, Zola and Renoir. The philosophic synthesis may be only a pedantry unless one is bold enough to deal with ethos and pathos as a generalization no more likely to be historically true than Nietzsche's violent opposition of Apollonian and Dionysian impulses, Spengler's distinction between Apollinian and Faustian cultures, or Elie Faure's proposal, so feelingly and densely elaborated, that the artistic intelligence passes "everywhere through almost similar phases of organic integration, harmonic equilibrium, and critical dissolution which give to its appearances surprising analogies of structure, rhythm, and accent." Faure's interpretation is poetry, not history. Sachs's caution is, in this event, unwise. When he neglects chronology and speaks his language of ethos and pathos—contrasting the Doric temple with the Gothic cathedral, the rondo with the toccata, comparing Palestrina with Palladio, insisting that "Parsifal" is illusion, denying that the improvisations of the castrati are a negation of form—his oversimplifications are, critically, well worth the risk. It is easy to take exception to his chronological "evidence"; but his division of absolute from descriptive music is unquestionable.

If his cyclic view of the arts lacks the impartiality that in Spengler appears so inhuman, Sachs firmly repudiates the misconception that the history of styles is an organic "forward" evolution and that certain styles are "transitional" instead of being, what all styles are, a special momentary equilibrium with a validity of their own. Sachs is also aware that styles occur by discontinuities, atavisms, leaps. He correctly accepts any style as "the effigy of a certain will and emotion." His analyses of musical forms—fugal, orchestral, operatic—are always stylistic in this sense.

In defining ethos and pathos Sachs seems to have transposed the daring categories of Wölfflin into a dualism that is necessarily more general and therefore coarser and more superficial. His contraries of limitation and boundlessness, disjunction and conjunction, tectonics and atectonics, essence and appearance are really extensions of

Discovery of Europe

EDITED BY PHILIP RAHV

$5.00

"Some of the sharpest observation and writing about Europe has been done by U. S. visitors—diplomatic, literary or merely attentive to the ancestral scene. This big, intelligently edited book contains a selection of the best of it, from Benjamin Franklin to Gertrude Stein . . ."—TIME Magazine

"An anthology with an idea, for a change . . ."—New Yorker

The Third Way

BY STUART CLOETE

$3.00

We appear to be confronted with two alternatives—one of reaction, the other of revolution. Cloete tells us how to find and maintain the third way of moderation and democracy through understanding the way in which our routine decisions serve to push us politically right or left. This book is a study of the thought and actions of men in the light of their inner political significance.

At all bookstores

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY • PUBLISHERS

Wölfflin's distinctions between close and open composition, linear and painterly, multiplicity and unity, and absolute and relative clarity. Sachs evidently accepts picturesque as a phase of baroque; whereas picturesque is essentially a denial of the inherent baroque illusion of apparent immensity within strict limits. Nor, since Fiske Kimball's explanation, must we speak of rococo as a style of freedom and profusion.

Rococo, like all the styles, is a technique; and Sachs's balance of imagination against structure, symbol against craft, inspiration against rule, as well as the very alternation of pathos and ethos, the great cycles and tides of style, actually conceals a "law of technical primacy"—the operation of accepted forms and skills on the artist's will, the control of iconography over the artist's vision. For Sachs, the Renaissance is pathos; but long ago Emile Mâle showed that the iconography decreed by the Council of Trent determined this "pathos." Lately George Kernodle proved that under the same law of technical primacy the nature of the drama changed when the processional techniques of the medieval stage were modified by the pictorial, illusionistic theater of the Renaissance. Style is an effigy of a certain will and emotion. It is also ritual: the dance, the theater, the poetry, the music of the Greeks were originally techné, skill, craft, the ceremonial thing done. The very word ethos as used by Aristotle implies an external-mindedness—ethos is bearing, behavior, the thing one does. One might argue that pathos is a failure of ethos, ritual, iconography. Sachs considers that the Gothic developed toward pathos, as indeed it eventually did. Yet the façade of Chartres is not pathos; the formalism is iconographic. So also is the formalism of the walled and trimmed garden, the medieval cosmology, the illuminated manuscript, the rose window, the troubadour lyric, the cult of courtly love. It is a pity that Sachs has usually excluded literature from his evidence: the consummate formalism of Dante, of Aquinas, of the idyllic secularism in Chrétien de Troyes's romances is not pathos. It is, again, iconography. The instrument, as Sachs knows and shows better than anyone else, is the condition of music. And if one is not to consider the instrument, the ritual, the iconog-raphy, the law of technical primacy, then one had better not appeal to history at all but seek to intuit, with Elie Faure, the spirit of the forms.

WYLIE SYPHER

The Red or the Black

ALLY BETRAYED. The Uncensored Story of Tito and Mihailovich. By David Martin. Foreword by Rebecca West. Prentice-Hall. $3.50.

DAVID MARTIN'S passionate apologetics for General Mihailovich raises certain questions of general import in political interpretation. The book presents one of several recent arguments criticizing war-time military decisions on retrospective political grounds. The broad form of the indictment is the contention that Roosevelt, with the reluctant acquiescence of Churchill, sacrificed vital democratic interests at Teheran and Yalta by not insisting on quid pro quos in exchange for aid to the U. S. S. R. "Ally Betrayed" reduces this general bill to the specific item of the decision to back Tito instead of Mihailovich.

The question to which the historian must address himself is not whether in the fulness of time the decisions turned out right; it is whether in the light of the evidence available when the decisions were made they constituted allowable judgments. So far as one can reconstruct the picture, these decisions seem not only allowable but almost the only possible judgments—and in the case of Yugoslavia they were taken by persons, such as MacLean, Deakin, and Churchill, who had no discernible sym-

HER DEAD BROTHER

I

The Lion of St. Mark's upon the glass
Shield in my window reddens, as the night
Enchants the swinging dories to its terrors,
And dulls your distant wind-stung eyes; alas,
Your portrait, coiled in German-silver hawesers, mirrors
The sunset as a dragon. Enough light Remains to see you through your varnish. Giving
Your life has brought you closer to your friends;
Yes, it has brought you home. All's well that ends:
Achilles dead is greater than the living;

My mind holds you as I would have you live,
A wintering dragon. Summer was too short
When we went picnicking with telescopes
And creaking leather handbooks to that fort
Above the lank and heroned Sheepscot, where its slopes Are clutched by hemlocks—spotting birds. I give You back that idyll, Brother. Was it more?
Remember riding, scotching with your spur
The four-foot milk-snake in a juniper?
Father shellacked it to the ice-house door.

Then you were grown; I left you on your own.
We will forget that August twenty-third,
When Mother motored with the maids to Stowe,
And the pale summer shades were drawn—so low
No one could see us; no, nor catch your hissing word,
As false as Cressid! Let our deaths atone:
The fingers on your sword-knot are alive,
And Hope, that fouls my brightness with its grace,
Will anchor in the narrows of your face.
My husband's Packard crunches up the drive.

pathy with communism. One must never forget that it was a war against Germany which was being fought. Killing Nazis was the desideratum in those by-gone days, and it did not matter a great deal where they were killed or by whom. The proper aim of our leadership was to maximize the killing of Germans. The calculation as between Tito and Mihailovich in Yugoslavia was a simple one. No responsible statesman in 1943 could base his policy on the premise that Britain and America were fighting Russia.

Mr. Martin's book is detailed and, in considerable part, documented. It establishes beyond cavil that an immense amount of press agency and sleight-of-hand went into the propaganda build-up for both Partisans and Chetniks. No one need doubt his conviction that postwar Yugoslavia is an intolerable dictatorship or that Soviet Russia has betrayed the world revolution. Yet the bitterness of tone, the inaccuracies, and the internal inconsistencies do not make his grandstand quarterbacking any more convincing.

On the important question of resistance strategy Mr. Martin appears to argue that Mihailovich was correct in practicing a policy of waiting instead of fighting—though he weakens his case by also appearing to argue that Mihailovich was, in fact, doing most of the fighting and that the Partisans were getting unjustified credit. The first Martin thesis is of course correct; but the Mihailovich notion that he could maintain an organized army somewhere in the hills in preparation for future Allied landings was, as the British perceived, untenable. All the experience of underground warfare contradicted it; the sequel in Yugoslavia disproved it. If you wanted to resist, you joined a fighting organization; if you didn't want to resist, you stayed home. Tito's army grew while Mihailovich's disintegrated. Mihailovich had good reasons perhaps for objecting to an activist policy, but they were not calculated to appeal to an Allied command which wanted to kill Germans.

On the two major issues concerning Mihailovich—the nature of his collaboration and the nature of his political backing—Mr. Martin, in the mind of this reviewer, fails to establish his case. His discussion of Chetnik collaboration, while it admits all manner of local accommodation by subordinate commanders, denies Mihailovich's complicity. This denial does not answer the material available during the war in intercepts of German Foreign Office communication or uncovered since by American interrogations of Dr. Neubacher, the German Foreign Office representative in Yugoslavia, or of Major General Gottlieb Berger of the S. S.

Even more important is the failure to substantiate the repeated assertion that "the movement on which Mihailovich based himself . . . was essentially a democratic peasant movement embracing the vast majority of the most independent and uncompromising peasantry in Europe." Mihailovich himself appears to have been a decent and straightforward military man without clear political ideas. But he was surrounded in Yugoslavia and represented overseas by a clique of pan-Serb reactionaries who had no interest at all in setting up Mr. Martin's "peasant democracy." Mr. Martin, whose sympathies are evidently with the Serbs, gives a somewhat distorted picture of the Serb-Croat rivalry, and he is able to turn calmly to so notorious and violent a pan-Serb as Lieutenant Colonel Zivan Knezevich as a reliable source. The statement that Tito's movement, "even at its height, was a minority movement which had won for itself the active hostility of the mass of the Serb, Croat, and Slovene peoples" is unhappily extreme.

The recent liberal agitation over the execution of Mihailovich revealed an unfortunate tendency to advance boldly for the most generous reasons into prob-

II

The ice is out: the tidal current swims
Its blocks against the launches as they pitch
Under the cruisers of my Brother's fleet.
The gas, uncoiling from my oven burners, dims
The face above this bottled Water Witch,
The knock-about my Brother fouled and left to eat
Its heart out by the Boston Light. My Brother,
I've saved you in the ice-house of my mind—
The ice is out . . . Our fingers lock behind
The tiller . . . We are heeling in the smother . . .

Their sails, marconi, leg-o'-mutton, tell
The colors of the rainbow; but they flap,
As the wind fails, and cannot fetch the bell . . .
His stick is tapping on the millwheel-step,
He lights a match, another and another—
The Lord is dark, and holy is His name.
By my own hands, into His hands! My burners
Sing like a kettle. My decanter mirrors
The Stygian Landing—lights to starboard. Brother,
The harbor! . . . the torpedoed cruisers flame,

The motor-launches with their searchlights bristle
About the targets . . . You are black . . . You shout,
And cup your broken sword-hand . . . Yes, your whistle Across the crackling water: Quick, the ice is out.
A boy's face . . . always as it is . . . a part Of death. O Brother, a New England town is death
And incest—and I saw it whole. I said,
Life is a thing I own. I race my heart
Against your stop-watch—they are running dead.
Brother, I hurry. I am out of breath.

ROBERT LOWELL

ably untenable positions. The trial was certainly unfair, Tito is certainly a dictator, Mihailovich is certainly anti-Communist; but this equation does not make Mihailovich a peasant democrat. Nor does the pseudo-democratic façade which Mihailovich gave his movement in its declining days eradicate the Fotichs and Knezevichs in the background. Nor is Miss Rebecca West at her most persuasive when she concludes in her foreword: "That we were not wrong who upheld Mihailovich is proved by the last sentences of his speech: so honest, so wise, so mild." However honest, wise, or mild, speeches prove very little about facts.

Tito has turned out a despot, but that does not mean that Mihailovich would have turned out a great agrarian reformer. Liberals must guard against accepting the view that democratic professions combined with opposition to Soviet totalitarianism are ample proof of an honestly democratic purpose. It is discouraging to see people who should know better rushing today to an all-out defense of the Kuomintang because Chiang Kai-shek dislikes the Communists and has gone through the motions of adopting a pretty new constitution. (Even the U. S. S. R. has a pretty constitution.) In so doing, they play straight into the hands of the Communists. For the central Communist effort has been to impose a false definition of possibilities—to convince the world that there is no middle ground between communism and reaction. By indorsing the Pan-Serbs and the C. C. clique certain liberals are going dangerously far toward proving the Communists right and thus toward reducing the world to a choice between two equally vicious tyrannies.

ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, JR.

"I Feel Drunk All the Time"

THE SELECTED POEMS OF KENNETH PATCHEN. New Directions. $1.50.

ANYONE who does not like a book of poems—but likes poetry—has to ask himself a humble question about the book: what is it which made at least one person, the author, think that these poems were good? Kenneth Patchen has many admirers, not just one, and although most of them do not seem to be interested in much poetry very much, nevertheless when one does not share their enthusiasm, one owes it to oneself to find out what others enjoy. Otherwise one may be missing something, or one may be in error again, as often before.

The readers who enjoy Patchen's poetry and the poet himself possess a real sensitivity to language, and they delight in the thrilling eruption of excited emotions such as social indignation, sexual passion, and drunken laughter. Patchen and his admirers probably like most of all eloquent language which is profound in sound. And when they do not understand this language, they are probably impressed by their own mystification. This is not because they are really full of humility before the mystery and richness of existence, but because they enjoy being impressed, like tourists at Niagara Falls; and when they do not understand what impresses them, they do not want to try to find out whether a hoax, a mirage, a nightmare, or a genuine mystery has been in front of them. Look for instance at this beginning of a poem:

These of living emanate a formidable light
Which is equal to death and when used
Gives increase eternally
What fortifies in separate thought
Is not drawn by wind or by man defiled.
So whispers the parable of doubleness.

Risky guesswork in which one has no confidence whatever can impose some meaning on these lines, but there are far too many possible readings, and the most persuasive one is that the passage has no denotative meaning at all. Yet the poet evidently thought well of the passage, for it is the beginning of the title poem of his fifth volume, and it is reprinted in this volume of selected poems. Perhaps the author and his admirers thought that the first line was profound in connotation and liked such words as "living," "emanate," and "light" in combination. And perhaps these readers did not feel they had to know how the living emanate a light, how the light itself is formidable, how the emanation of light is equal to death, and how this extraordinary light gives increase eternally. Anyway, the reader who admires a different kind of poetry is left with only one choice—to invent a metaphysics or mystical system which will tell him what these lines mean, or to relax and enjoy a sonorous vagueness which seems to be optimistic, affirmative, and God knows what else. Toward the end of the poem the poet himself seems to be perplexed, and he asks unanswerable questions such as "What is necessary? What is inseparable to know?" queries which would tax the combined talents of Kant and Sherlock Holmes. As Marianne Moore says in one of the poems which one can admire only if one does not admire Patchen's abuse of language, "it is not that one is daft about the right meaning, but this familiarity with the wrong meaning puzzles one."

Patchen's gifts are various, however, and when he is not being profound, it is often possible to find out what his poems are about and what has motivated them. He frequently dons the mask of the tough guy who is full of tenderness and pity. This tough guy hates wars, loves children, admires naked girls, and does not care for death. Thus,

You're a bastard Mr. Death
And I wish you didn't have no look-in here he writes in a poem entitled I Feel Drunk All the Time, an excellent title. By examining this quotation one can see how literary and derivative a poet Patchen is precisely when he is trying his hardest to be one of the boys in the back room. For he is weakly echoing a famous poem by E. E. Cummings about Buffalo Bill ("Jesus/he was a handsome man/and what i want to know is/how do you like your blueeyed boy/Mister Death"). And he is literary and derivative in the further sense that his use of slang is false in tone. He says, "you didn't have no look-in," like an Englishman saying, "let's be full of 'Pep,' honey."

Patchen has a real poetic talent. It comes to nothing because he has no

"The resolution of conflict in self is like the making one of opposites in art"

Aesthetic Analysis Publications by Eli Siegel

1. THE AESTHETIC METHOD IN SELF-CONFLICT
2. PSYCHIATRY, ECONOMICS, AESTHETICS

Eli Siegel won the Nation Poetry Prize in 1925 with Hot Afternoons Have Been in Manana. This fiercely discussed (and misunderstood) poem foreshadowed the present Aesthetic Analysis.

For copies of Pamphlets, at 50¢ each, and for information as to the Aesthetic Analysis Poetry Group and lectures, write to Martha Baird, 67 June St., New York 14, New York.

MARQUIS JAMES writes the fascinating life-story of a world-famous institution...

"The story of the Metropolitan is as significant an American romance as the stories of Sam Houston and Andrew Jackson, biographies of whom won Mr. James two Pulitzer Prizes."—LEWIS GANNETT, N. Y. Herald Tribune. Illustrated. $5.00

The METROPOLITAN LIFE

A Study in Business Growth

Is America turning from its ideal of a separate church and state?

V. T. THAYER has written an invaluable and disturbing book for all who cherish freedom of religion, for he reveals the accelerated and insidious trend towards sectarian religious training in public schools, and the increasing pressures for state aid in private and parochial schools. $2.75

RELIGION in PUBLIC EDUCATION

The neglected story of Africa's important role in world history

W.E.B. DuBOIS, in a challenging and revealing book, gives us new perspective on Africa's major contribution to civilization. Here are little-known facts about a continent that helped make western culture possible, a continent and people that the world cannot afford to forget or exploit. $3.00

The WORLD and AFRICA

John Steinbeck's first full-length novel since 1939

A new facet of Steinbeck's genius is displayed in this story of a certain few people and what happened to them during their dramatic hours together. $2.75

THE VIKING PRESS
At all booksellers

EASY TO LEARN

- RUSSIAN ● SPANISH
● FRENCH ● PORTUGUESE
● ITALIAN ● GERMAN

480 BASIC WORDS IN EACH BOOK

See a Picture! Learn a Word!

LEARN A LINGO

only $1.00 ea.

Build a vocabulary through visual education. Express simple thoughts in a few hours. Endorsed by leading educators. Complete instructions for study.

Send me copies of LEARN-A-LINGO (as checked below) @ $1 each:

- ☐ RUSSIAN ☐ SPANISH ☐ ITALIAN
☐ FRENCH ☐ PORTUGUESE ☐ GERMAN
I enclose $..... ☐ check ☐ M.O.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

CITY.....ZONE.....STATE.....

ROGER STEPHENS - Publisher, Inc.
119 East 19th Street, New York 3, N. Y.

respect for poetic form, no concern about the meaning of words, and no way of judging the value of his emotions. You can get the real thing in Cummings:

it may not always be so; and i say that if your lips, which i have loved, should touch
another's and your dear fingers clutch his heart, as mine, in time not far away.

You can measure Patchen's version by comparison:

Do I not deal with angels
When her lips I touch
So gentle, so warm and sweet—falsity
Has no sight of her

You can wonder and try to be sure what Patchen means by falsity, or you can decide that it would be better to labor with the real but rewarding difficulty of "Finnegans Wake." In fact, the only justification for objecting at length to Patchen's writings is the likelihood that those who are repelled by this kind of writing because of its obscurity may confuse it with "Finnegans Wake" and other works by our poor dead king.

DELMORE SCHWARTZ

The Slaves

BLACK ANGER. By Wulf Sachs. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

THIS book appears at just the right time. The debate on South Africa in the General Assembly of the United Nations has reminded us of the conditions under which 8,000,000 South African Negroes live—conditions such that these Negroes can become lyrical about the "high place" achieved by Negroes in America. The biography of a Rhodesian medicine man written by a psychoanalyst of Russian-Jewish origin, "Black Anger" supplies what debate cannot—the concrete feeling of what it is like to be a Negro in South Africa. That is, not only to be treated as less than human—after all, so are American Negroes—but to be legally restrained and frustrated in any effort to better one's condition through education, business, or any of the other channels American Negroes have used with some success; and—perhaps cruellest—to feel one's deepest beliefs and most cherished institutions crumbling under contact with omnipotent and incomprehensible strangers.

John Chavafambira, scion of a family of distinguished medicine men, left his native village in Rhodesia as a young man to work in the Union of South Africa. Through his experiences there we are gradually made aware of the steel net of restrictions inside which South African Negroes live their lives. His first sight in the great city of Johannesburg was a gang of Negroes being herded through the streets on their way from the courthouse to forced labor. The crime of most of them was to have lacked passes—Negroes in South Africa must carry passes when on city streets after dark; these passes certify that one has permission to be away from one's native village and to reside in such-and-such a city, give one's place of work, certify payment of the poll tax, and so on. Chavafambira soon found out that Negroes cannot use most means of transportation, even though their "locations"—the ghettos in which they must live—are usually miles from the city. They can be forced out of their "homes" at any time to permit the white city to expand. They cannot vote; they cannot gather in groups of more than ten; of course they cannot carry weapons—even the possession of a bicycle chain given to him by Dr. Sachs was enough to send Chavafambira to jail for six months.

The Africans are often forced into reservations too small to provide subsistence, just as our American Indians were. For the whites must find ways of crowding Bantus out of the native villages and into the urban slums where they can furnish cheap labor for the mines. Since the threat of starvation on the land proves an insufficient goad, South African white men—as do other British "empire-builders"—impose a special poll tax on natives.

Professional studies have told us of the natives' meager diet—mostly meal and tea—their high tuberculosis rate, their miserable "housing," and so forth. Under similar conditions many New World Indian and other native groups have simply died out. Negroes, like Caucasians, have proved harder. They fight back where they can and wait where they must. Here, certainly, is a wide field for the kind of psychoanalytic speculation and investigation into cultural differences that has recently been initiated by American psychoanalysts and anthropologists.

But finding the political and social situation he did, Dr. Sachs does not make too much of psychoanalytic explanations. Since it is consciously man-made conditions that envelop South African Negroes and psychologically disable them, Dr. Sachs considers the classic psychoanalytic mechanisms relatively unimportant. Thus, writing of the peculiarly sharp Oedipus situation in the native African family (the child is breast-fed for three or four years, during which time the parents have no sexual relations; the father then suddenly appears on the scene), he says: "This dramatic childhood experience had a retarding effect on John, and on every African child in his fight for independence—though today this important psychological factor counts for little compared with the poverty and starvation, the economic exploitation, and the severe racial discrimination to which black people are subjected in South Africa." And later he says of the common failure of the natives to make plans for the future: "This attitude can be traced psychologically to the native method of child-rearing. But chiefly it develops because the African is too much at the mercy of the white man's caprice to make any kind of planning for the future of value."

This book is consequently less a psychoanalytic document than a political one, and is closer to such books as Kravchenko's "I Found Freedom" than to scientific life-histories of persons of non-Western cultures. Unfortunately, a peculiarly poignant aspect of John Chavafambira's tragedy, one unrelated to politics, is thereby slighted—that is, the effect of his falling between two cultures, the African and the European, neither of which he can fully accept or reject. Dr. Sachs concentrates less on the demarcation between two cultures than on that between two castes; less on the conflict in John Chavafambira's mind between two sets of values than on his passion to be treated as an equal, regardless of what values he chooses. Yet the cultural conflict is inevitably more tragic, for as a result of its rather easily predictable outcome a wonderful and irreplaceable human creation, a cultural ethos, must be destroyed.

Dr. Sachs seems to have more material on John and other South African natives than he has chosen to give us in

In a feature review in THE SATURDAY REVIEW OF LITERATURE

SUMNER WELLES

says:

"Rexford G. Tugwell

has written one of the most significant books which has been published in recent years . . . A report of five years' stewardship as governor of Puerto Rico . . . Invaluable sidelights upon the policies and manner of being of President Roosevelt's Administration . . . The record of the accomplishments and failures of a man who was given an opportunity to make democracy work."

ROBERT MORSS LOVETT writes in The New Republic:

"A case history and a source book of colonial administration by a democracy . . . A frank, honest record of an administration conducted under difficulties and misconceptions emphasized by war but inherent in an abnormal situation."

THE STRICKEN LAND:

The Story of Puerto Rico

At your bookseller's, $4.50

DOUBLEDAY

50th Anniversary

this admittedly popular account. (I am not sure, however, that he has the relativistic attitude toward cultures that is necessary for good "ethno-psychanalysis"; for example, when John falls in love with a slim girl, he considers it some sort of gain that his criterion of beauty is "no longer that of the primitive kraal-man, but that of an educated black man.") This reviewer looks forward eagerly to a fuller treatment of the South African Negro by Dr. Sachs.

NATHAN GLAZER

LABRADOR

How clean these shallows how firm these rocks stand about which wash
the waters of the world

It is ice to this body that unclothes its pallors to the very thoughts of this immeasurable sea that as it rises unmarred incloses this straining mind, these limbs in a single gesture.

WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS

MODERN REVIEW

A monthly on International Affairs edited from a new world point of view

OUT MARCH FIRST

with articles by

LOUIS FISCHER:

Mahatma Gandhi and Generalissimo Stalin

GIUSEPPE FARAVELLI:

The Crisis in Italian
Socialism

JOHN L. CHILDS

American Liberalism
Today

PAUL KECSKEMETI:

Existentialism: New Trend in Philosophy and others

Special Introductory Offer

$1 for first two issues

Regular Subscription: $5 a year

MODERN REVIEW

7 East 15th St., New York 3, N. Y.

The Bear and the Eagle

THE STRANGE ALLIANCE:

The Story of Our Efforts at War-Time Cooperation with Russia. By John R. Deane. The Viking Press. $3.75.

THIS book is a contribution of first importance to students of world politics. Lest this verdict unduly startle and dismay the author, let me add at once that it appeals also to a much wider audience, that it has wit, humor, and a shrewd wisdom not wholly un-mixed with subtlety. The writing too shows simplicity and grace. And yet, unlike most of the "now it can be told" genre with which it might otherwise be classed, it is unusually significant for the light it throws upon the most crucial of all current political problems—whether we can get along with Russia, and how to go about doing so.

Major General Deane was head of the United States Military Mission in Moscow from October, 1943, until after the surrender of Japan. In that capacity he had to deal with the topmost echelons of the Soviet government, both of the political and the military departments. His story is the now usual one of arriving with eagerness, hope, and confidence and of departing with a sense of deep frustration not far above despair. But the strength of the book is in the carefully detailed and objective reporting of the events and negotiations which pushed him along that well-trodden path.

The description of "objective" will no doubt be challenged. General Deane has his share of that scar tissue which betrays the occupational disease prevalent among accredited representatives of Western powers to the Soviet Union. But there is a difference between the bias of pre-judgment and the mental bent which follows from a plenitude of experience. As far as internal evidence goes, this book persuades one of the fairness of the author, of his readiness to give the Soviets the benefit of the doubt. To be sure, he is not sophisticated in the analytical techniques of political science. His explanation of why the Russians behave as they do does not penetrate very deeply. But he presents his basic data with discrimination and judgment. And it is not irrelevant that both his experience and his deductions fall into a pattern which is familiar to those who have talked with diplomatic and military persons of comparable experience. This might suggest either a universal prejudice among such persons or a mutual confirmation of conclusions honestly arrived at.

The incidents described by the author which are worth mentioning in a review are legion. The story of lend-lease to the Russians and the part it played in the war, of what went on behind the scenes at the great war-time conferences, of the negotiations to bring the Soviet Union into the war against Japan, and of numerous other events furnishes a rich storehouse for impatient historians who want to get at the facts before the archives are opened.

Among the most interesting observations for me were those which illuminated the deep-seated and all-pervasive aversion of Soviet officials to the admission of foreigners regardless of purpose (they first rejected the idea of admitting instructors to teach Soviet airmen the use of the Norden bomb-sight; subsequently they admitted with great reluctance and procrastination a small proportion of those offered but confined those few to a wholly inadequate number of contact hours with Soviet students); their habitual obstructiveness to collaboration, even when the gains to be derived were overwhelmingly to their advantage (demonstrated by their refusal to permit Allied air groups to bomb targets immediately behind the German forces opposing them); the hollow meaning of Soviet "agreement in principle" (revealed in the whole dilatory progress of shuttle bombing); and the degree to which Soviet irritation on political matters is immediately translated into obstructionism in the most irrelevant and far-flung negotiations. Significantly enough, some of the instances of uncommon success in winning collaboration involved conspiratorial enterprises, such as the elaborately faked "escape" of interned Americans who had fought in the Pacific war and the agreement, subsequently rejected by Roosevelt, to coordinate the military activities of the N. K. V. D. and our own OSS.

Throughout the war distrust of Allied motives and intentions remained an article of Soviet faith. No gesture, however generous, was sufficient to allay suspicion. Tremendous quantities of lend-lease materials were furnished the Soviet Union without that scrutiny of needs which was characteristic not only of our dealings with our other Allies but even of our supply of our own armed forces. The response accorded us hardly lends support to those who now advocate the winning of Soviet confidence and cooperation by the generous and open gesture—particularly in respect to turning over the secrets of the atomic bomb.

The problem of the atomic bomb and of its control was constantly in this reviewer's mind as he read the book. General Deane avows, though with diffidence, that he has the answer to the question of how to deal with the Soviets. That answer is a minor variation on the now rather trite "patience with firmness" formula, the chief addition being an insistence on demanding quid pro quo and on not turning the other cheek, whether facial or posterior. But that system is not suggestive of methods for achieving international control of atomic energy. It must be admitted, and General Deane tacitly admits it by the manner in which he skirts the issue, that the experience related in the book, while "not all bad," does not encourage optimism concerning ultimate Soviet acceptance on an effective working level of anything comparable to the Baruch proposals.

BERNARD BRODIE

Our Own Philosophers

A HISTORY OF AMERICAN PHILOSOPHY. By Herbert W. Schneider. Columbia University Press. $4.50.

HERBERT W. SCHNEIDER has given us a very good book. It is a book we have anticipated for a long time, and it fulfils our expectations. In length and soundness, in comprehensiveness and insight, it fits the needs both of the institutionalized reader and of the reader at large. The former will take to it for its accuracy and its bibliographies, the latter for its generous quotations and its clipped asides—"It was fear rather than faith that brought in political democracy"; "Democracy was not a theory of popular government but a symbol of class conflict"; "American national socialism was pre-

"What does the community propose to do both to control the power of unions and also to help them develop their enormous constructive possibilities?"

The Challenge of Industrial Relations

By SUMNER H. SLICHTER

LAMONT UNIVERSITY PROFESSOR AT HARVARD

Addresses itself squarely to the most fundamental questions that the community must decide in order to construct a labor policy which meets the problems created by the rise of unions.

What is the present state of the trade union movement in the United States?

How does the rise of trade unions affect the administration of business concerns?

How do trade unions conduct their own affairs? Are their procedures democratic?

Just how is collective bargaining supposed to work? How does it work?

Shall the right to strike for certain purposes or in certain occupations be made illegal?

What can be done to make unions more effective instruments for advancing the general welfare?

SUMNER H. SLICHTER has been teaching and writing on American economic problems for nearly thirty years and is a frequently cited authority on labor-management relations. THE CHALLENGE OF INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS is a careful, objective, forthright analysis of the fundamental issues created by the rise of the labor movement.

To be published in March, $2.50

Cornell University Press

ITHACA, NEW YORK

Marxian but . . . post-revolutionary."

The book surveys American thought from its beginnings to the near present. It ends with an excellent account of pragmatism. It does not include the recent developments of realism or naturalism, and it makes no attempt to handle logic or the physical sciences. But it covers almost everything else in our thinking. The main figures in our literature are considered, biological ideas are present in the wings if not on the stage, philosophical psychology is reviewed at length, and ideas on society, politics, and religion are fully expounded. The major philosophers are of course given the central place. The careful analyses of their views are supported with such liberal quotations that the reader has the sense of working directly on source material.

Schneider recommends as supplementation to his account Joseph Dorfman's "The Economic Mind in American Civilization" and as a companion volume the anthology of "American Philosophic Addresses: 1700-1800," edited by his coworker Joseph L. Blau (published simultaneously with Schneider's book by the Columbia University Press).

One of the excitements I had in reading the book was the continual discovery of significant persons who had been previously bare names. I found especially interesting the radical utilitarianism of Daniel Raymond, the theory of scientific social planning of Richard Hildreth, the scientific humanism of Chauncey Wright, the anticipations of objective relativism in Francis Abbot, the foreshadowing of emergent evolution in Edmund Montgomery. Each reader will of course make his own discoveries in terms of his own slant, but that each will make them to his own reward is sure.

Those who are alien to the continual reaching out of Demos for power will underline such a statement as this one by Fischer Adams: "Democracy is an illuminated Hell that in the midst of remorse, horror, and torture rings with festivity." Others in this land of the multiple will side with Whitman: "We must be constantly pressing onward—every year throwing the doors wider and wider—and carrying our experiment of democratic freedom to the very verge of the limit."

Professor Schneider expounds rather than professes. He refuses to summarize the tale he tells. This decision is undoubtedly wise, and I shall not tarnish its wisdom by a formula. But it is worth noting that Schneider in his caution almost leaves the impression that American thought is without distinction. He sees American philosophy largely as a reaction to ideas from other cultures. He fails to find a "central content, a dominant note, or a moral lesson" in its history. "Our past is fully as confused as our present. Its vitality, therefore, must be sought, not in a definable quality or direction of movement, but in that vague yet tangible energy which it exerts when it is faced with new ideas."

I should merely like to raise the question whether that energy is not more tangible and less vague than Schneider suggests. Negatively the point can be made in terms of his own insistence upon the close connection between philosophic ideas and politico-social ideas in our culture; if this is so, then if there is anything distinctive in our social thinking and institutions it should also appear in the related philosophies.

Positively I can only state that the philosophic material Schneider presents gives me the feeling that it does so appear. American philosophy has stressed the primacy of the practical reason over the theoretical reason more than any other segment of the philosophic tradition has done. It has been more strongly pluralistic in tone. And it has persistently sought to unite an emphasis upon individuality with a recognition of the social context which makes individuality possible and which provides it with its responsibility. The way American philosophy has handled these topics is at least as unique as American culture.

CHARLES MORRIS

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

An important new book by the author of AMERICA'S ROLE IN THE WORLD ECONOMY
Alvin H. Hansen's
ECONOMIC POLICY
AND FULL EMPLOYMENT

One of America's leading economists offers his timely and significant plan for achieving high levels of employment and production through long-range planning. "He returns the barb to those who try to pin the label of 'visionary' on the planners. . . . He goes on to reveal the basis of the instability which plagues our economy . . . stimulating further debate on one of the crucial questions of our time."—N. Y. Times Book Review

At all bookstores • $4.00

WHITTLESEY HOUSE

A Division of McGraw-Hill Book Co., N. Y. 11

THE STORY OF MARY SURRETT" (Henry Miller's Theater) is concerned with the fate of an innocent woman whose foolish son got himself involved in Booth's plot to assassinate President Lincoln. The action begins on the evening of the crime, when Mary Surratt first discovered that her son was implicated; the entire middle section is devoted to her farcical trial before a military court determined in advance to hang her; and the play ends rather too conventionally with a scene in the death chamber just before the execution. The author—that same John Patrick who last year gave us the odd but not uninteresting piece called "The Hasty Heart"—has told his story in a simple, straightforwardly effective manner, and he has had the good fortune to get for the title role Miss Dorothy Gish, who gives a performance really memorable for its restraint, its dignity, and its power. Obviously then, whatever its further merits or defects may be, "The Story of Mary Surratt" cannot fail to hold the interest and to make an impression.

Playwrights of the present do not usually choose to deal with history unless they are prepared to indicate some implications for today, and it is plain enough that Mr. Patrick intends to do just that. Indeed, there are moments when one wonders whether he means to suggest a protest against the whole conception of "war guilt" and to hint that more injustice than justice is likely to be the result of any series of military trials. But he never explicitly states any charge either so specific or so sweeping as this, and when, in the final scene, he comes to draw his moral, it is merely that war is evil not only because it slaughters so many in battle but also because the whole atmosphere it creates is unfavorable to everything civilized or humane.

Now this thesis—if it can be called that—is one which any story of any injustice connected with a war would to some extent illustrate, for all wars and all injustice have something in common. But it is not clear that there is any very close parallel between the incident with which this play deals and any recent events, or that "The Story of Mary Surratt" has any unique pertinence at the present moment. It seems to me, therefore, that the final judgment passed upon it must depend upon its effectiveness as a piece of dramatic art rather than upon anything which it proves or even any moral which it illuminates. And it seems to me further that, for all its competence, its honesty, and its general air of truth—for all, even, of Miss Gish's admirable art—it both falls short of real greatness and lacks the power thoroughly to satisfy an audience, since it never manages to cross that hard-to-define line which separates the merely distressing or the merely painful from the genuinely tragic.

I know of course that there is possibility in the drama as well as in other forms of literature a degree of intensity and elevation in whose presence what would otherwise be intolerable becomes, for reasons which neither Aristotle nor anyone since his time has quite adequately explained, capable of giving pleasure. At least for the sake of argument, I am also willing to grant that there are occasions when an artist may legitimately ask his audience to endure intense discomfort, if some important moral cannot be drawn unless the spectator can be forced to confront some unpalatable fact. But,

I have already tried to indicate, "The Story of Mary Surratt" is not quite elevated enough to transform the painful into pleasure and not unique enough in what it has to say to justify the author's demand that we witness events so purely distressing.

The whole question of the happy ending and of poetic justice is curiously involved. The insistence upon the former is commonly and perhaps properly regarded as one of the most characteristic features of philistinism. The doctrine of poetic justice is commonly cited as the most absurd of the inventions of a now long dead pedantry. But neither the philistine nor the neo-classicist is wholly absurd, because both are fumbling inexpertly with one aspect of a truth; and what can be said on their side of the argument was once said with great sobriety and moderation by Dr. Samuel Johnson. When the latter came to issue his edition of Shakespeare he probably amazed the more instructed of his contemporaries, as he has certainly amazed many succeeding critics, by confessing that he was not sure he did not prefer to the original ending of "King Lear" that new conclusion, written by Nahum Tate and long accepted on the stage, in which Cordelia is revived, given in marriage, and dismissed to live happily ever after. What he said in his own justification is said so much more pointedly and sensibly than anything of the sort has ever been said since that I must ask permission to quote it directly. "A play in which the wicked prosper, and the virtuous miscarry, may doubtless be good, because it is a just presentation of the common events of human life; but since all reasonable beings naturally love justice, I cannot easily be persuaded that the observation of justice makes a play worse; or that, if other excellences are equal, the audience will not always rise better pleased from the final triumph of persecuted virtue." I can see nothing either philistine or merely pedantic in that statement, and I think it a relevant comment on "The Story of Mary Surratt."

"John Loves Mary" (Booth Theatre) is a farce comedy by Norman Krasna, that expert concocter of such affairs who was recently responsible for the enormously successful "Dear Ruth." Like the latter piece, it is concerned with the artificial complications besetting the love life of a returned soldier; like the latter, it is cleverly plotted, cleverly written, and amusing enough to be pretty sure of a good long run. But there is hardly any excuse for saying any more about it than just that.

MONEY-SAVING MAGAZINE COMBINATIONS

For Your Convenience

The NATION

- ☐ with Harper's Magazine . . $8.50 You Save $2.50
- ☐ with Consumers Union . . $9.25 You Save $1.25
- ☐ with Harper's Magazine
and Consumers Union . $11.75 You Save $3.75

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses.

THE NATION by itself:

- ☐ One Year $6 ☐ Two Years $10 ☐ Three Years $14
- ☐ Servicemen's Rate $4 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage $1 a year extra

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed. ☐ Bill me.

NAME _____

STREET _____

CITY _____ ZONE _____ STATE _____

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

THE large-scale show at the Whitney, "Painting in France, 1939-1946" (through March 2), provides a much-looked-forward-to report on the present state of painting in the country that has been the undisputed capital of that art for the last hundred years. According to the catalogue's foreword, "It was our [the museum's] wish . . . that the work of younger artists and those less well-known in America should predominate." That wish, fortunately, has been met on the whole.

The show itself is shocking. Its general level is, if anything, below that of the past four or five Whitney annual exhibitions of American painting—about the lowness of which I have expressed myself rather strongly in the past, lamenting the sad state of American art in our day. Taking both American and French art wholesale, I now see that we have reason to congratulate ourselves on being as good as we are. Naturally, I except from this comparison the "old masters" of Paris—Picasso, Matisse, Braque, Rouault, Dufy, Bonnard, and Jacques Villon. These are represented at the Whitney by single examples—of which Bonnard's still life is the jewel, and a matchless one, while the other artists are generally shown in twos or threes.

FROM LAKE GENEVA TO LAKE SUCCESS

By Lillian T. Mowrer

IN THE MARCH ISSUE OF
THIS MONTH MAGAZINE
On Sale at Newsstands or Send 25¢ to 247 Park Ave., New York 17, N. Y.

BOOK BARGAINS

ALL NEW, HANDSOME ORIGINAL EDITIONS FOR LOVERS OF GOOD BOOKS. LIMITED STOCK, BUY NOW.

Book of Psalms (Stephen Daye Press)
3.75 list
North, East, South, West (T. Soslins) anthology, C. Lee, ed., 3.75 list
The Curse of Bigness (& other papers)
L. D. Brandeis, 3.50 Viking Revolution of Nihilism: H. Rauschenberg, 3.00 list
Union Now: Union Now with Britain:
Clarence Street, 5¢ Harper, 2 vol. set
1.00
The following are A. A. Knopf editions
The Ship of Flame: W. S. Stone (7.50)
Illustrated 2.00
San Francisco's Literary Frontier, 5¢;
P. Walker 3.00

George Bancroft (3.50) R. Nye (Pulitzer Prize)
Mark Twain's Travels With Mr. Brown
(85) Dana & Walker 2.00
Prairie City: Angie Debo, $3 list 4.00
Lessons of My Life (2.50) Vanstittart .50
The New World Order, (1.50) H. G. Wells .75
Commodore Vanderbilt (3.75) W. J. Lane 1.50
Freedom's Battle (3.50) J. A. del Vago
(An authentic history of Spanish Civil War) 1.25

SPECIAL

Birds of America; J. J. Audubon
(Macmillan) 5.00

(Postage Free in U. S. A.)

DOWNTOWN BOOK BAZAAR, 212 B'way, N. Y. C. 7

The works of the older and less well-known artists, such as Goerg, Surville, Souverbie, Lhote, Marquet, Desnoyers, and others, demonstrate only too well the justice of their being less well known. Marquet remains his sober self, but most of these—Surville, Souverbie, Goerg—are not plodders on the trail of a limited or stale sensation but quick-change artists who orient themselves toward worldly public taste and predigest their betters for stylish consumption. The same corruption affects a good section of the younger generation, who, if generally less decorative, show a similar readiness to be content with superficial effects, provided only that they are flashy. Neo-cubists, neo-realists, neo-surrealists, neo-expressionists—they are alike in their brittle color and their excited and equally brittle design. Where their American equivalents tend to mud or garishness, French painters tend, apparently, to confetti and neon lights. If the Americans seem stodgy and dull, the liveliness and the knowingness of the French are empty. Nor, contrary to expectations, are the French more facile or tasteful. They are just as coarse, just as inept for the most part—and hysterical in the bargain.

Those who, like Ceria, Caillard, and Brianchon, stay closer to impressionism or who, like Oudot, Quizet, and Venard, slavishly imitate the generation of Derain and Utrillo, are at least occasionally pleasing. They have less effrontery and do not make a meaningless commotion. The Franco-Spaniard Borès likewise manages to please by treading humbly in Matisse's footsteps.

The most ambitious and advanced group is formed by the "synthesizers," those who marry Picasso to Matisse—Tal Coat, Tailleux, Pignon, Gischia, Fougerson, Bazaine. Tal Coat seems indeed to be the best of all the younger or less well-known artists present: in such canvases as "The Horse" and "The Rooster" he actually succeeds in making a quick Picassoish sort of calligraphy work against a background of fauvist color. And next to him on the wall Tailleux's still life, "The Fishes," while not so clarified, promises even more substance and force. These are the only ones of the younger painters whose work, on the evidence of this show, has both validity and the interest of the new. And even they are a trifle thin. Both Gischia and Pignon, whom I have seen to much better advantage in reproductions, are represented by big and empty pretentious canvases—although Pignon does draw a ram's head beautifully in one of them. In Gischia's case the over-literal influence of Léger crushes all spontaneity; in Pignon's and Fougerson's, mannerisms taken from Picasso do the damage.

Except for two very bad pictures by Gleizes and Bazaine respectively, no outright abstract painting is to be seen. There is very little flat painting. Miró's influence is not to be detected anywhere, and no one, except Gleizes, ventures to go farther in surrendering the third dimension than Picasso and Matisse have done. Bernard Dorival suggests in the ornamental prose (translated) of his occasionally acute catalogue note that this relative conservatism—let one only compare it with American abstract painting—is motivated by the desire to place a synthesis of cubism and fauvism "at the service of the human aspiration of the expressionists and surrealists." And, indeed, most of these painters seem to be obsessed with the notion of violent and intelligible, explicit, obvious emotion, which they try to convey by expressive distortion applied to "significant" objects. The trouble is, however, that these distortions do not inhere sufficiently in style. Like the distortions in most of Picasso's recent work, they are arbitrary in an ultimate sense, not compelled by a style that is the emotion itself but superimposed or inserted with the label "emotion." The result is vulgarity and theater, and painters such as Lorjou, Ambrogiani, Ajame, Dany, Bertholle, Prassinis, and Alix upset all our notions about French temperament by outdoing the German expressionists at their wildest and most bathetic. The surrealists and neo-romantics present, like Coutaud, Labisse, and Courmes, are equally unspeakable.

Of course, it is quite likely that the whole show has been badly chosen. It is an institutional affair, supervised by curators, and we know from experience with the American variety how inept curators can become in the face of contemporary art—even when it happens to be their Fach. Some important painters have been left out: among them, Eugène de Kermadec, whose work in reproduction is impressive, and Dubuffet. Also Estève, Lepicque, and several others—of whom reproductions give, however, an unfavorable idea. And in any case three such painters as Dubuffet, Tal Coat, and Kermadec, all under fifty, are enough to prove that French art still has vitality. Nevertheless, I myself feel more hopeful about American art. We lack poise, but we do seem to have on the whole—and at the moment—more originality and more honesty. And whereas, when all is said and done, Tal Coat, Kermadec, and even Dubuffet culminate in charm, we at least, when we do culminate, shall have force.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

IN THE last New York Philharmonic crisis, four years ago, Rodzinski and the management were, I thought, right in their changes of personnel, but the dismissed players also were right in some of their accusations against Rodzinski and the management. They contended—rightly, it seemed to me—that the management had blundered in engaging and reengaging Barbirolli. By the management they meant both the board of directors and the business manager, Arthur Judson; and it seemed to me reasonable to assume that where the directors' qualifications were their money, business standing, or social position, Mr. Judson's activity had not been limited to issuing stamps and petty cash. They also contended that Mr. Judson, in his use of his power, had subordinated the orchestra's interests to those of his Columbia Concerts Corporation; and again I thought it reasonable to argue that a man who had conductors and soloists for hire should not have anything to do with the hiring of conductors and soloists for the orchestra.

It is this power of Mr. Judson and his use of it that are the issues in the present crisis. Rodzinski now accuses him of usurping power in artistic matters that the business manager of an orchestra should not have, and of using it improperly for his own interests as a manager of concert artists. The artistic matters Rodzinski refers to include the appearances of guest conductors and soloists with the orchestra; and he contends that they are properly among the things over which the musical director of an orchestra should have power, not the business manager, and certainly not a business manager who is also a manager of conductors and soloists and who, instead of engaging artists for the artistic benefit of the orchestra, can use appearances with the orchestra in its concerts and broadcasts to build up the prestige and commercial value of the artists he manages and to lure artists away from other managers. In this general contention Rodzinski is right beyond any question; and as far as his own case is concerned one might, as I did and still do, question his fitness for the post of musical director of the Philharmonic, but if one decided to give it to him one would be obligated to give the powers over artistic matters that go with it to him, not to Mr. Judson.

This is one of the occasions when a music critic must speak not only to the public but for it; and Virgil Thomson, in his Sunday article on the subject, spoke out precisely and unequivocally about the "unbalance of power" that is "the trouble with the Philharmonic," and about the fact that "Arthur Judson is unsuited by the nature and magnitude of his business interests to manage with the necessary self-effacement a major intellectual institution doing business with his other interests." For Olin Downes, on the other hand, too little had been published of Rodzinski's charges and the directors' answers, and "the details of this matter are not this column's present concern"—which enabled him to escape from the immediate issue into a two-column cloud of history and generalization.

One passage in Mr. Downes's article calls for comment. Speaking of past mistakes he wrote: "Why John Barbirolli . . . was made musical director of the orchestra . . . and maintained there . . . for seasons after he had conclusively demonstrated his insufficiency for that post is still a mystery which has been impossible to solve. As a result the orchestra quickly and appallingly retrograded . . . while reviewers became positively embarrassed to record the level of mediocrity, or worse, in the performances." Actually the Philharmonic management was able to maintain Barbirolli in his post because of reviews such as Mr. Downes's in the Times of October 11, 1940—characteristic not only in its swirling flood of muddy thought and prose, but in the way the truth about Barbirolli's performances of Elgar's "Enigma" Variations and Sibelius's Second Symphony was restricted to slight, unobtrusive, and minimized qualifications of the lavish praise. The Sibelius symphony, for example, "was read, for the greater part, in bardic vein. There was breadth and sweep of line in places where interpreters have fussed with detail. . . . There was sensitive treatment of details of delicate and haunting instrumental effects. . . . A thoughtful reading was distinguished prevailingly by fine proportions and a real sense of form"—after which one read that "where this feeling was lost was in places where tempo was too suddenly whipped up or slowed down," and, paradoxically, "the impression was of a too calculated performance, with many fine attributes, one which, had all previous calculations been forgotten, and the music given its head, would have been a complete instead of a conditioned success."

This was hardly an embarrassed recording of mediocrity or worse, and anything but a demonstration of the conductor's insufficiency for his post; and Barbirolli probably would be conducting the Philharmonic today if it had not been for Mr. Thomson, who summed up his impressions of the same concert with the statement that "the

WHAT FUTURE FOR Labor IN GERMANY?

Frieda Wunderlich

in this dispassionate, thoroughly documented study gives the historical facts on which any new Labor Movement will be built. She presents a crystal-clear picture of the development of the German Labor law up to 1925; tells how the system operated between that date and 1933, and details the methods the Nazis used to cripple it.

German Labor Courts

AT ALL BOOKSTORES • $3.50

THE UNIVERSITY OF
NORTH CAROLINA PRESS
Chapel Hill, N. C.

MOTION PICTURE

BARRY FITZGERALD
DIANA LYNN • SONNY TUFTS

'Easy Come, Easy Go'

A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

In Person THE INK SPOTS PLUS ELLA FITZGERALD
EXTRA ADDED ATTRACTION
COOTIE WILLIAMS
And His Trumpet and Orchestra

NOW
TIMES SQUARE

PARAMOUNT

Midnight
Feature
Nightly

STAGE PLAYS

"A smash hit of proportions." —
Ward More-
house, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way. CH 4-4256
Evenings 8:40. Matinee Wednesday & Saturday 2:40.

"Must be seen.
... Warming,
charming,
chuckling."
—Morehouse, Sun

FREDRIC FLORENCE
MARCH ELDRIDGE IN YEARS AGO

The New Smash Hit by RUTH GORDON
Directed by Garson Kanin
MANSFIELD THEA., 47th St. W. of B'way. CI 9-9056
Eves. 8:40 Mats. Wed. & Sat. at 2:40

"STUNNING AND ENCHANTING."—Barnes, Herald Tribune

JOSE FERRER IN CYRANO de BERGERAC

FRANCES REID • RALPH CLANTON • MIRIAM SHERMAN
PAULA LAURENCE • FRANCES COMPTON
ERNEST GRAVES • WILLIAM WOODSON

BARRYMORE THEA., 47th Street West of Broadway. CI 4-0390
Eves. 8:40, 1:20-4:30. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30

RODGERS & HAMMERSTEIN Present

In association with JOSHUA LOGAN
"A REWARDING COMEDY."—Barnes, H. Trib.

JOHN LOVES MARY

A New Comedy by NORMAN KRASNA

Directed by MIL LOGAN

BOTH Theatre, 45th St., West of B'way
Evenings 8:40. Matinee Wed. & Sat. 2:40

"A NEW HIT."—Morehouse, Sun

HELEN HAYES in HAPPY BIRTHDAY

A New Comedy by ANITA LOOS

Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN

BROADHURST, 44th St., West of B'way
Eves. 8:40, 1:20-4:30. Mats. W. & Sa. 2:40, 1:20-3:30

"ALL TRIUMPHANT."—Barnes, Her. Trib.

ETHEL MERMAN

In the Musical Smash

ANNIE GET YOUR GUN

Music and Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN

Book by HILBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
with RAY MIDDLETON Directed by Joshua Logan
IMPERIAL Thea., 45th St., West of B'way
Eves. 8:30 Sharp. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30 Sharp

TO PLACE AN ADVERTISEMENT
CALL BARCLAY 7-1066

MOTION PICTURES

MANHATTAN

ALHAMBRA
COL-SEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST.
81st LEX. & 3rd
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENCY
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

BRONX

CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE
HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

WESTCHESTER

MT. VERNON
NEW ROOM.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

"Unusually subtle and intelligent."—N.Y. Herald Tribune

BETTE DAVIS

Paul HENREID • Claude RAINS

'DECEPTION'

Based on LOUIS VERNEUIL play

— AND —

'DICK TRACY vs. CUEBALL'

MORGAN CONWAY • ANNE JEFFREYS

BROOKLYN

BURSWICK
DYKER GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT REPUBLIC
TILYUO
Coney Island

QUEENS

MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAUD
Far Rockaway

MANHATTAN

COLONIAL
B'way & 82 St.

"HAS DRAMATIC DEPTH."—N. Y. Herald Tribune

W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM'S

The Razor's Edge'

Tyrone POWER

Gene TIERNEY

John PAYNE

Anne BAXTER

Clifton WEBB

Herbert MARSHALL

— AND —

'DANGEROUS MONEY'

SIDNEY TOLER as CHARLIE CHAN

INSTRUCTORS!

Take Advantage of the Nation's Special Class-Rate

30c Monthly per Student for orders of 10 or more copies to be sent to one address.

DESK COPY SUPPLIED FREE

Address your order to

The NATION

30 VESEY STREET

NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

Buy Your Books Through THE NATION

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price post-free if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C.O.D. No C.O.D.'s outside the United States. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible. Make checks payable to The Nation.

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION

The NATION

20 VESEY STREET

NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

music itself was soggy, the playing dull and brutal." It was after he had spoken out that others, including Mr. Downes, followed; and it was under this pressure that the Philharmonic directors acted to replace Barbirolli. So today: if they had only the material in the Times to worry about they wouldn't worry at all; and if they do act to make the Philharmonic out of Mr. Judson's power it will be under the pressure created by Mr. Thomson's comment.

Not that this seems likely: what the eruption has brought into the open is not merely the unbalance of power as between the business manager and the musical director within the Philharmonic, but the status of the Philharmonic itself in relation to other organizations, which is responsible for that unbalance. The Philharmonic is not, like the Boston Symphony, an independent organization with its own business manager and legal representatives who deal with the representatives of artist bureaus and recording and broadcasting companies. Its status is rather like that of a subsidiary of U. S. Steel: not only is it managed by the head of Columbia Concerts Corporation, but a member of the legal counsel for CBS, Columbia Recording Corporation, and Columbia Concerts Corporation is the Philharmonic's lawyer and an audibly influential member of its board of directors.

That material in the Times—Mr. Downes' Sunday article, the early news stories carrying smears of Rodzinski that had later to be retracted, the story of Mr. Judson's career on the Sunday music page, which might have been written by his publicity representative—is the sort of thing one expects to find in a conservative newspaper, which believes literally in conserving whatever exists and functions and has money invested in it or important people associated with it, and which therefore believes that nothing or as little as possible should be said that will discredit it or those people. One would expect to find the same thing in the Herald Tribune; but that review of Mr. Thomson's in 1940 was only the first of many surprises.

But though Mr. Downes operates as the critic of a conservative paper, a big enough issue will move him to the proper response. Let a conductor keep his audience quiet between movements of a symphony, and the Downes anger will spill out on paper. Let the musicians' union ask an orchestra for a higher weekly minimum, or let composers try to increase the modest fee for performances of their music, and there will be an indignant Downes harumphing about this dangerous attempt to exact "all that the traffic will bear." I would give something to hear the composers and orchestral musicians on the subject of Mr. Downes's income from his various services to music.

Letters to the Editors

Postscript to Pay Day

Dear Sirs: There is another story to tell. Last Thursday the good people of Georgia took over the Capitol. They came from everywhere; from little towns you can't find on the map, and plenty that you can, to protest at the white-primary hearings. Grass-roots Georgia, cheering like old Confederates, giving the rebel yell but with fine new words. The theme song was, "Yes, we're proud to be Georgian but we are prouder to be American."

It was camp-meetin'-style democracy and as much fun as a camp-meetin'. We had everything but "dinner on the ground." The protests and the crowd were warmly humorous, polite, rippling with soft laughter, and as colloquial as "Saddy" afternoon. All of this illumined by flares of Southern oratory in defense of decency and truth, and a refrain running through almost every speech like a revival song, about Christian brotherhood. Preachers and veterans made the eloquent speeches; but the women from rural sections spoke with a shy sincerity that moved me even more deeply.

Maybe you don't know how it feels to hear for the first time in your Capitol the words of democracy spoken with pride and without fear. But we down here, burdened so long with the taboo of silence and the urge to "expediency," were stirred to the heart when that silence was broken to splinters in the crowded senate room. Everybody wanted to make a speech for human rights, or against Roy Harris, or for democracy. The chairman finally had to limit speeches to one minute. People called out in pain, "I've gotta speak," and folks would laugh and say, "Oh, let 'em speak." We've whispered so long in Georgia. It was wonderful to be able to shout aloud for democracy.

What does it mean? We do not yet know. Some say it was the largest crowd ever to attend a hearing at the Capitol. Whatever else, we know these people came on one of the coldest days of the winter, hundreds of miles, driven to Atlanta not by pressure groups but by the pressure of their own conscience. There is nothing like a Southern conscience when it gets going on sin. But white supremacy was called SIN at that meeting last Thursday. If that kind of revival gets going in Georgia, Humman had better begin looking for something else to fool our rural folks with.

LILLIAN SMITH

Clayton, Ga., February 11

An Old Disease

Dear Sirs: The world today, as for some time past, is suffering from generalitis, or acute inflammation caused by the presence of too many generals in positions of great power and influence.

Our Secretary of State is a general, as is also our Assistant Secretary of State for Enemy Territories. We have a general in charge of the Veterans' Administration, another heads Labor Department Rehabilitation, and a third the Office of Temporary Controls. We have a general as ambassador to Russia, another as ambassador to Belgium, and an admiral as ambassador to Panama.

A recent rereading of some Gibbon left me with the feeling that the outstanding fact in the slow decay of the Roman Empire was the unwillingness of victorious generals to yield in time of peace the power they had enjoyed in time of war.

ASA M. HUGHES

Lansdale, Pa., February 10

The last book — His Testament!
H. G. WELLS Mind at the End of its Tether
 at bookstores $2.10
 340 Madison Ave., New York 17

Nation Readers are cordially invited to the 42d ANNUAL LUNCHEON, L.I.D.

HOTEL COMMODORE, New York

Saturday, MARCH 1, 12:30

in honor of

TRYGVIE LIE

Secretary-General, United Nations.

Subject:

PLANNING THE PEACE

DR. BRYN J. HOVDE, Presiding

Make reservations at once to LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
 112 East 19th Street, New York 3, N. Y.

$4.00 a PLATE

Writs Dr. Harry W. Laidler, Conference Chairman, for program of other sessions of Spring Conference addressed by distinguished speakers on Feb. 28 and Mar. 1.

★ BUY BONDS ★
FOR KEEPS

Crossword Puzzle No. 200

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Dear old things that are cared for in homes
 5 Maker (making a fateful pronouncement, from the sound of it!)
 9 Gate, or fascinate—it depends on the accent
 10 It makes painful hearing
 12 Sad shack
 13 Book for a young scholar who does not find it easy to start
 14 French town of draped walls
 15 Though no Spartan, this Persian viceroy comes from Sparta
 17 We hit a paleface
 22 Back parts—they sometimes feel it!
 23 Wake here
 24 Tree that kills anything growing beneath it
 26 What they did to the regulation about English church bells when the invasion threat ended

28 Human hooter

29 Is it the jag that makes these big cats so noisy?

30 Made out (6 & 2)

31 Downs rise and elevators sometimes do this

32 First steamship to cross the Atlantic (in 23 days)

DOWN

- 1 Pursued by a river, she changed into a fountain and ran into the sea
 2 Smarten up

- 3 This bird seems chicken-hearted
 4 Save
 5 Top of the bottle
 6 Kingdom of a Henry
 7 The fevered brow?
 10 The GI makes it
 11 Lariats
 16 She has a part in the National Theatre
 18 They often follow suit in trains
 19 Obligated to be seen?
 20 Dig in
 21 What the paperhanger does for a change at home?
 22 Crush
 25 Under a shade tree Ira stands, in a southern New York town
 27 Is frequently getting stewed
 28 Her fiancé gives her a ring, no doubt

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 199

ACROSS:—1 PEBBLES; 5 PALSIED; 9 UNLADEN; 10 NOVELLO; 11 CORPS; 12 CHALLENGE; 14 COLT; 15 EXTREME; 18 COG; 20 RAS; 21 HEARKEN; 23 BUMP; 26 CALLS OVER; 28 LARVA; 29 AVAILED; 30 ALMONER; 31 SADRON; 32 SACHEL.

DOWN:—1 PAUNCH; 2 BELFRY; 3 LADY-SMOCK; 4 SIDECUT; 5 PINNACE; 6 LEVEL; 7 INLANDER; 8 DIOGENES; 13 FOE; 16 TIME LIMIT; 17 MAN; 18 CIOCTAWS; 19 GALLIARD; 22 NEVADAN; 23 BURIALS; 24 FRENCH; 25 BARREL; 27 SOLAR.

BOOKS

ANCIENT and MODERN TRUTHS

IN A NEW EDITION

Yours for $1.50, sent to E. F. LEE

Box 261, EVANSTON, ILLINOIS.

SCHOLARLY BOOK CENTER
 BROOKLYN. Isaiah Berger, managing Judaean-Oriental Book Service, takes pleasure in announcing the new book store under his personal supervision with large stock of old and new books in all branches of Hebrew, Judaica, Orientalia, Theology, Folklore, is open to the public. Isaiah Berger, 125 Dumont Av., Brooklyn, N. Y. (IRT subway, Saratoga Ave. station.)

FOR SALE

"GOLDEN APPLES"

Send Indian River Citrus Fruit as Gifts or a Treat for the Family

ORANGES AND GRAPEFRUIT

Full Bushel (35 lbs.) $4.75

Half Bushel (30 lbs.) 3.00

Express Prepaid, No C. O. D.

HONEY GROVES
Sebastian Florida

CONTRIBUTORS

ELIZABETH BISHOP is the author of "North and South," which received the Macmillan Poetry Award.

WILLIAM EMPSON is the author of "Seven Types of Ambiguity," "Some Versions of Pastoral," and two books verse.

WYLIE SYPHER is professor of English at Simmons College.

ROBERT LOWELL has written two books of verse, "Land of Unlikeness" and "Lord Weary's Castle."

ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, Jr., whose "Age of Jackson" won a Pulitzer award, is an associate professor of history at Harvard University.

DELMORE SCHWARTZ is the author of "Shenandoah," "In Dreams Beg Responsibilities," and "Genesis."

NATHAN GLAZER is assistant editor of Commentary.

WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS is practicing physician as well as a distinguished poet and novelist; "Paterson" is his latest book.

CHARLES MORRIS, the philosopher, is at present lecturing at the New School for Social Research. His most recent book is "Signs, Language, and Behavior."

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 164

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 1, 1947

NUMBER 9

The Shape of Things

THE SEVERAL FACTORS THAT HAVE MADE IT possible for Senator McKellar to inflict his senile abuse on David Lilienthal for a month have at last worn thin. One is the patience of the Congressional Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, which has indulged McKellar as a guest inquisitor. Last week chairman Hickenlooper (R., Ia.) chided him for being "completely and utterly inaccurate"; McMahon (D., Conn.) charitably characterized the testimony of McKellar's witnesses as "a lot of rag-tail talk" and Hill (D., Ala.) as "innuendo and gossip." Vandenberg (R., Mich.) rebuked the Tennessean sarcastically, and Knowland (R., Cal.) said flatly: "I have not seen or heard any evidence presented thus far that ties Mr. Lilienthal to communism." Equally worn down, we hopefully believe, is the Republican conviction that Lilienthal can be defeated in the Senate as a whole, with consequent embarrassment to the Administration. It is improbable that President Truman would have voiced his confidence in Lilienthal's confirmation without a pretty convincing poll by his Senate leaders. This prospect, plus Vandenberg's position, gives Senator Taft's reckless onslaught on Lilienthal the appearance of an historic political boner. A senseless defeat on the first major test of his leadership should qualify him to join Mr. Bricker in the league of Ohioans who never will be President.

✱

WE ARE BY NO MEANS ASSUMING, HOWEVER, that the fight on Lilienthal is over. It will really begin in earnest if and when he is confirmed. Under the law that created the Atomic Energy Commission that body is the sole judge of whether or not patent rights are to be granted to private interests for exploiting any given method of producing atomic energy, the criterion being the commission's opinion as to whether or not the proposed development is "affected with the public interest." It is Lilienthal's long and magnificent record as a guardian of the public interest that has won him the delicate attentions he has received in recent weeks, and not his fantastically alleged communism, his inclination to share the secrets of nuclear physics with Mr. Stalin, or the Czechoslovak origins of his aged parents. The forces that lurk behind this curtain of slander are getting set for a long struggle. A representative in the Tennessee legislature, unaffected by the braying of his distinguished Senator, put the question squarely. "We hear that atomic energy may one day provide us with heat and light," he said. "I ask is this an attempt on the part of big business to grab off the latest natural resource that has become available to man?" Of course it is. And it will be for Lilienthal and his commission to insist that science did not split the atom so that business might split the profits.

✱

HERMAN TALMADGE, GEORGIA'S PRETENDER, plows ahead in his efforts to set back democracy's clock in the face of rising popular protest. His signature to the White Primary bill converts the Democratic Party of the state into a private club. The constitutionality of such action and all "Humman's" other actions in his role of governor will be tested when the decisions of three Superior Courts come up for review before Georgia's Supreme Court late this month. Some twenty members of the House and three members of the Senate, making their own estimate of the way the wind is blowing, have left the opposition and jumped on to the Talmadge bandwagon. The most important single defection is that of Ben Fortson, Secretary of State, who in happier days managed Ellis Arnall's campaign. But though the fair-weather boys have jumped quickly, the majority of Georgia's aroused citizens have hardened their determination to win back their rights and the reputation of their state. The Reverend Joseph A. Rabun, marine veteran and minister of Talmadge's own church, continues his outspoken condemnation of Talmadge; letters pour into the newspapers; editorials in journals large and small point out that the issue is a moral one transcending in its importance the eventual decision of the Supreme Court. The students on Georgia's campuses remain in ferment. In a recent poll of 300 students from 99 Georgia counties taken at the University of Georgia, 67 per cent expressed themselves in favor of M. E. Thompson and only 28 per cent for Herman Talmadge; 66 per cent said they would join a new party, if necessary, for the purpose of defeating Talmadge. In a one-party state this last is significant, particularly since eighteen-year-olds can vote in Georgia. So the fight goes on. As Lillian Smith wrote in last week's Nation, "We've whispered so long in Georgia, it's wonderful to be able to shout aloud for democracy."

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	233
Passage from India	236
Palestine Our Problem	236

ARTICLES

Labor's House Divided by Wilbur H. Baldinger	238
Why Does Russia Act That Way? by Harold J. Laski	239
How to Run Coal by McAlister Coleman	242
Korea: An American Tragedy by Will Hamlin	245
British Socialism Begins at Home by J. Alvarez del Vayo	247
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	249

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Life with Franco by Thomas J. Hamilton	250
Fragments of Fragments by William Barrett	250
Employment by George Soule	254
In Grayest Moscow by Leigh White	255
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch	256
Films by James Agee	257
Music by B. H. Haggin	259

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 201

by Jack Barrett	260
------------------------	-----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor
J. King Gordon

Literary Editor
Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo
Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kelllogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

PROMINENT ON THE CREDIT SIDE OF THE Georgia ledger is the judicial treatment meted out to Homer L. Loomis, Jr., and Emory P. Burke, guiding geniuses of the Nazi-inspired Columbians. Both statesmen, going to the people of Georgia for the first time, were elected to the rock-pile, Loomis for one year and Burke for three. The juries that tried the two Columbians, on charges of incitement to riot and usurpation of police powers respectively, were quick to bring in their verdicts, and both demonstrated a fine scorn for the racial harangues with which the defendants thought it advisable to favor the court. Loomis was defended—if it can be called a defense—by his Park Avenue father, a rabble-rouser in his own right, who assumed that a Georgian jury would free anyone who might be painted as a victim of Southern Negroes and New York Jews. Besides landing his ne'er-do-well son in jail, Loomis pere now faces the lively possibility of disbarment proceedings for a particularly offensive performance. Both convicts are due to face further charges, and the handling of their cases so far inspires complete confidence in the desire of Georgians to smash this obnoxious little gang.

✱

BY COMMITTING THE UNITED NATIONS TO action against Franco, the Lake Success resolution on Spain was something of an ultimatum to those states which have encouraged a perilous deal between capitulationist Republicans and the Spanish monarchists and other reactionary groups. It was so understood by Señor Prieto, who provoked the recent Cabinet crisis and thus brought into being the Llopiés Cabinet, in which a majority are of his persuasion. The Spanish dictator has also appointed a Falangist committee to report on the possibilities of a restoration of the monarchy. British reaction to Señor Prieto's success has been prompt. On February 19 Mr. Bevin declared in the House of Commons that he had already made contact with the new regime. It would seem that eventual recognition has also been discussed, for when asked what his future relations with the Spanish government in exile were to be, the Foreign Minister replied that he "must wait to see if it has stability." What is meant by stability? If Mr. Bevin is merely suggesting that Señor Llopiés must boldly follow the Prieto plan of action, he will discover that the new Cabinet is farther from stability than any of its predecessors. The Spanish Communists, whose entry into the new regime has alarmed many groups which were not originally hostile to them, have evidently realized the fact. In a speech designed to explain the party's turn-about, La Pasionaria has urgently invited the abstaining parties to reconsider their decision. "It is," she declares, "utterly false to assert that we can facilitate the liberation of our people by renouncing the Republic in order to get the approval of the Communists." What effect this appeal will have cannot be foreseen. Though the Communist leader explicitly demands the restoration of Republican legality as it existed in 1936, there is nothing in the reports of her speech resolutely closing the door against a plebiscite, which surely must involve the most dangerous of compromises with reactionary classes in Spain. The crisis therefore remains.

✱

OLD THROW-BACK JOHN RANKIN HAS DONE his best to silence 92,500 American veterans who have something to say to the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs. Among all the groups John hates, the American Veterans' Committee ranks high because its articulate members think in enlightened terms and because they protected witnesses in the Mississippi hearings against his stable mate, Theodore G. Bilbo. Last week Rankin, with the aid and advice of legionnaires and V. F. W. sharpshooters, introduced a resolution to the committee which would bar testimony before it from all but "accredited" veterans' organizations. John looked pretty foolish when it turned out the A. V. C. was accredited by the Veterans' Administration; then he went into a huddle with Representative Alvin O'Konski of Wisconsin, who emerged with a second resolution, passed by the committee, which limits testimony "to those organizations which have exclusively active, participating veterans of American wars." The A. V. C. frankly, and proudly, claims 400 veteran merchant seamen among its membership; this technicality will now be used to prohibit the A. V. C. from testifying on bills concerning veterans' welfare now before the committee, some of which were drawn up in the offices of the A. V. C. itself. Rankin has had his revenge, and the pork-barrel banner will fly above the committee chambers while housing and other measures vital to veterans are deliberately sidestepped. There is, however, a means of counter-attack for those who believe "that the well-being of the veteran is of some concern . . . and who see in his sound reintegration into the fabric of our society the surest guaranty of our liberties." The A. V. C. has just started a drive for $100,000 needed to publicize legislative requirements for that reintegration and to combat those who, like the real estate interests, chiefly stand in their way. Contributions may be sent to Charles G. Bolté, chairman of the A. V. C., 1860 Broadway, New York City.

✱

EVERY ONCE IN A WHILE, WHEN WE WATCH the behavior of men like Generals Eisenhower and Marshall, we wonder whether we haven't become too set in our ancient bias against the military mind. But the military mind doesn't leave us wondering for long. What currently refreshes our prejudice is the proposed promotion of James A. Killian to the permanent rank of colonel. Killian is the gentleman—all officers are gentlemen—who commanded the camp for American army prisoners at Lichfield, where the policy laid down for guards was, "Work him over—just don't break too many bones." Responsible for innumerable beatings, clubbings, and at least one unwarranted shooting, Killian was convicted of brutality by an army court-martial last September, despite his arrogant intimidation of witnesses. He was sentenced to the cruel and unusual punishment of a $500 fine and an official reprimand; and now, having been duly punished, he is to be promoted. The War Department is a bit apologetic and has been at pains to explain to the press that it has no alternative: promotion by seniority is automatic under the law, unless Congress withholds approval. Secretary of War Patterson is reported to have asked Congress to change the law, and his public-relations officer appears to be asking the public to sympathize with the army in its embarrassment. We might, if we knew why a change in the "senility system" was not demanded long ago. The navy, with Congressional sanction, has been promoting by selection for several years now. Moreover, if the army had really wanted to get around this fatuous regulation, it could have "broken" Killian to a second lieutenant at the time of his conviction. Better still, it could have discharged him dishonorably as though he were an enlisted man.

✱

THE RAILROADS ARE FAR FROM SATISFIED with the billion-dollar increase in freight rates which they secured from the Interstate Commerce Commission at the end of 1946. On February 19 their chief spokesman, R. V. Fletcher, president of the American Railroad Association, said that the carriers "must seek a return commensurate with the earnings of other industries." Not less than 6 per cent on their investment, double the current return, was necessary, he suggested, for the maintenance of "adequate rail transportation." This was not a casual statement but a formal declaration of policy. Yet it is difficult to believe that its author, or those whom he represents, have thoroughly considered its implications. For how could railroad net revenues be doubled at the present time? Certainly not by doubling freight rates and passenger fares, for that would drive away so much traffic that quite possibly it would lead to a reduction in operating income. It must be equally obvious that the desired increase in profit cannot be secured from the pockets of railroad workers unless a terrific depression forces down wages generally. But since such a catastrophe would inevitably mean a drastic shrinkage in traffic, the railroads would find themselves still farther from their goal. Thus the only conclusion that we can draw from Mr. Fletcher's remarks is that, if a 6 per cent return is the minimum price for which private enterprise will consent to operate the railroads, it is high time for us to follow the British example and seek a solution for transportation problems in public ownership.

Passage from India

IT HAS not been easy for Indians to grasp the fact that their independence is really won. Many of them have always been convinced—not without reason while the Tories ruled in Whitehall—that Britain would never voluntarily relinquish "the brightest jewel in its crown," and that occupation would end only when the occupiers were forcibly evicted. Even the unequivocal statements of the British Labor government, both before and after the Cabinet mission's visit to India last year, failed to dissipate such doubts entirely. In fact, the subsequent outbreak of bloody communal rioting, the backing away by the Moslem League from its acceptance of the mission's plan, and the subsequent constitutional deadlock induced fears that the old policy of divide and rule was being revived and that the British were encouraging Moslem intransigence with a view to postponing their departure indefinitely.

Mr. Attlee's announcement that the transference of power into responsible Indian hands will take place not later than June, 1948, clears the air of such suspicions. The Indian parties now know that they cannot afford to waste time in bickering. Within the next sixteen months they must write their constitution and ready themselves to take over the government of India as a going concern. The penalty for failure will not be the prolongation of British rule; it will be administrative chaos and imminent danger of civil war.

Mr. Attlee's statement also gave fair warning to both the All-India Congress and the Moslem League that Britain did not intend to impose a solution of the constitutional problem on which they are so sharply divided. Neither party, it is clear, can count on British aid in coercing the other. As Pandit Nehru, vice-president of the interim government and leader of Congress, said in commenting on the "wise and courageous" decision of the British government, "it is a challenge to all of us." Making a new plea to the Moslem League to end its boycott of the Constituent Assembly, he emphasized that the task of constitution making could proceed only "on a voluntary basis." "There can be no compulsion," he declared, "except the compulsion of events that none can ignore."

Unfortunately, early reactions from the Moslems have been less conciliatory. Jinnah, head of the League, has not commented directly on Attlee's statement but he has reiterated his determination not to yield "an inch" on the demand for Pakistan—a completely independent Moslem state within India. Still more ominous is the prediction of civil war between Hindus and Moslems soon after the British depart, attributed to "an important Moslem leader." Such uncompromising attitudes may seem to justify the fear of the London Times that the announcement of a deadline might serve to inflame communal strife rather than bring pressure to bear on the Indian parties to end it.

But the British government's decision does not, in fact, create any new peril; it simply brings an already existing peril into sharp focus and forces India to face it. Both the Congress and the League are aware that the alternative to mutual accommodation is a civil war which would be disastrous to both sides. The dreadful example of China must be vividly before them.

At this stage, when the Constituent Assembly is stymied by the abstention of its Moslem minority and the interim government stultified by complete lack of cooperation between its Congress and League members, some new initiative was essential. Yet the steps open to the British government were very limited. There could be no going back on the pledge of independence and no suggestion of revising the constitutional plan in a way that favored one side against the other. Britain, in short, could not consider cancelling its passage from India; it could only confirm its intention to depart by setting an early sailing date.

Palestine Our Problem

BRITAIN has referred the problem of Palestine to the United Nations. One is tempted to say that in taking this action Mr. Bevin has closed an epoch, but that is not so, for the Zionist movement will continue to fight for ideals that have been betrayed by British procrastination and insincerity. Moreover, the Jewish people still have to reckon with Britain, whose disinterestedness cannot be taken for granted.

Though Mr. Bevin has announced that he will make no proposals to the General Assembly, the mandatory power will strongly influence decisions. The British Empire is in process of dissolution, but the oil-bearing regions of the Near East are of such economic and strategic importance that the Foreign Office may still pursue the policy that has rendered Britain bankrupt in Palestine. The Arab states will continue to oppose Jewish aspirations, and as long as Mr. Bevin controls London's policy it is not improbable that their demands will find favor with those countries that have followed the British lead in other matters. Britain has declared that it will entirely withdraw from Palestine if the United Nations so order—as if it could do otherwise!—but it would be sheer naive to equate this with a firm promise to abandon all previous strategic ideas. The costs of the present military occupation are heavy and Britain is facing the severest economic crisis in its history, but that is not to say that London will not seek to bend the United Nations to the service of British interests. And finally, though the military authorities in Palestine are showing unexpected caution, between now and September events born of past blunders and unconfessed intentions may yet prejudice the reaching of a decision creating a viable Jewish state.

Only firm representations by the United States could have induced London to impose a just solution in Palestine. It implies no disrespect for other powers to say that the creation of an autonomous Jewish state still depends in large measure upon this country's readiness to urge that course and to take responsibility upon itself. Because of its great economic interest in the Near East the United States has a reason to keep Arab good-will. But it is unlikely that even the fire-eating professionals of the Arab League, which has no real authority over its members, will be able to get the Arab rulers to oppose a collective decision with violence. And this country, alone or through the United Nations, can confer upon rulers and people benefits that will far outweigh any injury to their feelings caused by the partition of Palestine.

The policy which this country should follow within the United Nations was indicated as long ago as October 4, when President Truman frankly declared that the Morrison-Grady plan was unacceptable. That warning should be repeated, and vigorously. So, too, should the request that Britain at once admit 100,000 Jews to Palestine. Speaking of the reception given to the Jewish Agency's proposals concerning the viable Jewish state, the President said, "From the discussion which has ensued it is my belief that a solution along these lines would command the support of public opinion in the United States." We believe that Mr. Truman was right then, and his words remain true in the new situation. They should be the basis of United States policy in the United Nations. In 1944 both political parties went on record as favoring the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine. Since then, moreover, Republican and Democratic leaders have given support to Zionist demands. It should therefore not be difficult to frame a policy acceptable to both parties.

The present danger is that Palestine will be buffeted from side to side in the hurly-burly of great-power conflicts. What Russia's policy will be is not clear from the record. But if the Palestinian problem is divorced from power politics there is no reason to believe that Moscow will oppose the creation of the viable state. One thing is certain, the Jewish population in the Holy Land has absolutely no desire to align itself against the U. S. S. R. Nor have the Arab peoples. This country, if it follows the policy suggested by the President's October 4 statement, will be in a position to put an end to the heartbreaking injustices that have been inflicted upon the Jews.

With this issue The Nation presents the first of a series of political cartoons drawn by Ezekiel Schloss, whose work has previously appeared in France-Amérique, the New York Times, the Herald Tribune, the New Republic, and other publications. Mr. Schloss's cartoon will be a regular feature in The Nation.

Labor's House Divided

BY WILBUR H. BALDINGER

Washington, February 23

THE immaturity of the American labor movement—or movements, rather—is becoming a painful embarrassment to its friends and a source of profound gratification to its enemies on Capitol Hill. The brawling between A. F. of L. and C. I. O. shows no sign of a letup despite the incidental—and insincere—let's-make-up chatter which is interspersed among the jeers and taunts. The double house is shaken by dissension and sags with indecision. The Sunday-best front displayed on the porch by William Green and Philip Murray fools nobody, not the distressed neighbors who want to be helpful, and certainly not the authorities on the Hill, who are ready to issue warrants for disturbance of the peace.

Labor demonstrations to the public here in the past week are characteristic cases in point.

C. I. O. President Murray, keeping his left hand behind his back, clasped the right hand of phony fellowship which A. F. of L. President Green extended from Miami, where Green's executive council, making a bad joke, called for "organic unity." The A. F. of L. gesture was in cynical response to an equally disingenuous C. I. O. proposal of last December for "unity of action" against new labor legislation. It would have been more honest if Murray and his faithful C. I. O. vice-presidents had told Green and his council what they all knew: that this generation will see no merger between the C. I. O. and A. F. of L., and that it is childish to play games in public about the idea.

After this display of labor family warmth, which was as hollow as the headlines that hailed it, Green and Murray went their separate ways to the Hill to do battle for unions against a predatory Congress. They succeeded only in inflaming the tempers of the statesmen on the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee who will write the verdict on labor. They would have served labor's cause better if they had gone up to the Hill, together or singly, with a legislative plan or two in hand—a plan for jurisdictional peace, for instance. Instead, they made impassioned pleas of not guilty to all the counts in the Senate committee's indictment, although the evidence seemed to call for no-defense pleas in some cases.

"God Almighty," Murray said prayerfully in his resonant voice with its Scotch burr, "what crimes have these organizations I represent committed except to perform a patriotic duty as Americans?" "We have appealed to our rivals to come home to the house of labor," Green intoned piously, excusing himself from any responsibility for jurisdictional strife. "I see no way to correct the situation so long as the rivals fight." Murray had a somewhat better answer on that critical point than Green, but it was not good enough. The C. I. O. spokesman suggested, knowing that the Senate committee had not been constituted as a referee in such inter-union matters, that it "get Willie Green down here" to talk over the jurisdictional situation under committee auspices. This gracious proposal could hardly be expected to get anywhere, and is as good an illustration as any of labor's ineptness in the face of a common threat to the existence of unions in this country.

Senator Joseph H. Ball, the brooding Republican from Minnesota who had hoped to rise in the Eightieth Congress as the savior of free enterprise and conqueror of trade unions, probably has lost his crusade to ban union shops, stop industry-wide bargaining, and slice up the Wagner act. If he has lost, no thanks in particular are due to labor lobbyists; even Senator Robert A. Taft, the Republican boss, developed early doubts that Ball's blockbusters were feasible. At the same time restrictive labor laws are certainly in the offing, and the weak spot in labor's battered armor is the jurisdictional point.

The A. F. of L., which has been unable to settle jurisdictional strikes within its own organization, is far from any serious discussion of unity with the C. I. O., with which it is in jurisdictional conflict on almost every industrial level. What the labor organizations cannot do for themselves, Congress is going to do by outlawing such strikes by legislative fiat. And in doing that, Congress probably is going to do much more—weaken the Wagner act, regulate strike votes, limit secondary boycotts, police such national emergencies as coal strikes.

Hollywood studios are closed by strife between A. F. of L. stage hands and other A. F. of L. craft unions. A. F. of L. electricians refuse to handle products from shops under legitimate C. I. O. contract. Coos Bay, Oregon, has been virtually closed down for five months because C. I. O. longshoremen refuse to handle goods from ships manned by A. F. of L. crews. These are open and valid invitations to Congress to rise in wrath, and since last November, at least, the Republicans have needed no invitation.

Green made some sound arguments against much of what the Senate committee may do to labor. Murray arrived with a forty-one-page text, a sixteen-page summary, and a stack of briefs on wages, prices, profits, and laws. C. I. O. Vice-President Walter P. Reuther, the brain trust of the United Automobile Workers, lectured the committee on economics while hewing to the C. I. O. line that any new labor law was bad. Their reasons were worth studying by Congress if it wants to understand the causes of industrial unrest, but under the circumstances nobody on the Senate committee regarded the statements as required reading. Senator James E. Murray of Montana, one of the few unreconstructed New Dealers on the committee, listened to the labor leaders in morose silence. Senator Wayne Morse, Oregon Republican who knows the labor pitch, was irritable.

"Let me in on a secret," Morse finally said sadly to Reuther. "Do you really believe the Eightieth Congress is going to adjourn without passing labor legislation?"

Philip Murray and William Green know what is on the lawmakers' books. They should know that a dose of self-regulation might prevent an epidemic of anti-labor laws. But the time is very late.

Why Does Russia Act That Way?

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, February 11

OF THE many impediments to reconstruction few are more damaging than the grave misinterpretations, sometimes honest and sometimes dishonest, of Russian international policy. We hear of Russian "obstruction," of Russian "permeation," of Russian "strategic imperialism," and of perhaps half a dozen kindred evils. Nearly all of them are wholly mythological; the grain of truth in some of them is usually explicable in historical terms, and if these were understood, an agreement could be reached at least as easily with Russia as with any other great power.

It is essential to remember that Russia entered this war as a poor nation which had endured immense sufferings for almost a generation in order to modernize its economic equipment. It must also be remembered that the destruction wrought by the war in Russia probably wiped out at least the major part of the achievements of the years between 1917 and 1941. It is reasonable, therefore, to conclude, first, that Russia does not want a new war, and, second, that any major war would place a strain upon its economy which it is not in a position to bear. These two conclusions must be set in the perspective of the fact that for nearly twenty-five years the other powers, great and small, intervened in Russia to aid and abet civil war there; that they refused it diplomatic recognition; that they gave it little or no economic assistance in its difficulties; that they did not hesitate to "appease" its enemies; that one of the major causes of war in 1939 was the refusal of the semi-fascist "Colonels' regime" in Poland to agree to any Anglo-Russian accord which would have permitted a serious attempt to defend Poland against Hitler; and that since the war capitalists in both Europe and America seem to regard Russian security as a threat to their own interests and to be hardly less anxious to see the failure of the Soviet experiment in 1947 than they were in 1937 and before.

After the immense sacrifices required of Russia, one can hardly be surprised that it makes international security its first objective. In the absence of security, it is compelled to devote a disproportionate amount of its resources to defense; hence it cannot fulfil either the capital-goods or the consumer-goods program which are both necessary to expedite long-term recovery and to make life easier for the people in the meantime. International security for Russia means (1) safeguards against sudden and aggressive attack, so fatal in an age of atomic warfare; (2) the conviction that it can count on the goodwill of neighboring states in the event of war; (3) the impregnability of its frontiers against the kind of invasion Germany was able to mount in 1941; (4) sea-power conditions that do not cut off either its warships or its mercantile marine from access to warm-water ports; and (5) assurance that no treaty arrangements, either in the sphere of defense or of economic life, are made against Russia by other powers.

In the light of Russian history since 1917 I do not think that any one of these is an unreasonable demand. Each of them is entitled to the same consideration as if it were put forward by Great Britain or the United States. I do not believe they have received such consideration. American demands for bases in the Pacific and in Greenland are taken as a matter of course; Russian demands for a base in Spitzbergen and for free access to the Mediterranean are regarded with profound suspicion. America's penetration of the Middle East, in its quest for oil, raises no alarm; the parallel Russian interest in Middle Eastern oil is looked upon as a threat to the independence of all the peoples of the region. Russia's patronage of Marshal Tito's regime in Yugoslavia is viewed with indignation; so also is its special relationship with Czechoslovakia—this has cost the Czechs a proposed loan from the United States. Yet no one has asked that Great Britain's support for the fascist dictatorship of Salazar in Portugal, which is a major source of its strength, or the complete domination of occupied Japan by the United States, despite the expressed disagreement of Russia and Australia to many of its policies, be examined in terms of the need, all over the world, to dig up the roots of fascism.

HAROLD J. LASKI is well known as one of the leaders of the British Labor Party and the author of many stimulating books on political and economic subjects.

That there is one standard by which to measure Russian conduct and another to measure that of the other great powers seems to me to be obvious. I do not for one moment assert that the behavior of Russia is beyond criticism. The retention of its troops in Persia beyond the agreed date of withdrawal was indefensible. The volume of its unilateral activities in Germany and Austria is indefensible also. It is a grave misfortune that Communist parties all over the world, even after the dissolution of the Third International, continue to pursue "wrecking" tactics and make that natural alliance of left working-class parties which the post-war situation so clearly calls for unacceptable to millions of Socialists. I think the hair-splitting obstructionism of Mr. Molotov and Mr. Gromyko does little but harm. I believe that many of the most eminent Russian leaders are badly informed about conditions outside their own country because they turn their embassies and legations into what are almost fortresses from which there is little egress and into which any friendly penetration is rare; it was not so in the days of Mr. Litvinov in Washington or of Mr. Maisky in London. Much of the propaganda from Moscow is calculated to cause irritation. It is a great pity that Russia did not join UNESCO at the outset; and that, despite Stalin's recent declaration to Elliott Roosevelt, such immense difficulties are placed by the Russian Foreign Office in the way of exchange of students, professors, and intellectuals generally. While a great deal of the talk about the "iron curtain" in Russia is both mischievous and ignorant, the heavy censorship of news into and out of Russia has extremely unfortunate effects. And it should not be regarded as dangerous for, say, an Englishman who looks upon Mr. Maisky, for example, as an old and valued friend to visit him without permission while in Russia, or to communicate with him as freely when outside Russia as if Mr. Maisky lived in Copenhagen or Zurich.

Let us grant that Russian diplomacy has always been suspicious and tortuous, and that Bolshevik methods, therefore, represent no important change. Let us grant also that, to a considerable degree because of the lack of external security, Russia remains the police state it has always been. No one acquainted with the temper of the common people in every country which participated in the recent war can seriously doubt that Russia would be amply repaid at this grave juncture by attempting experiments in international friendship instead of assuming the usefulness of continued suspicion. If the America of Roosevelt is temporarily in eclipse, the Britain of Mr. Churchill has been replaced by the Britain of Mr. Attlee. There is good-will to Russia in France and Italy, in Norway and Sweden, in India and the new Indonesia, over and above that in the nations directly under its influence. The more Russia builds its policy upon that good-will, the deeper and wider is likely to be its influence. If, for example, Russia had whole-heartedly accepted the Lilienthal plan for the control of atomic energy, even with a reservation as to minor arrangements, we should by now have taken a long step on the road to disarmament. As it was, we got the impression that all Russia would accept was some futile sort of Kellogg pact unsupported by sanctions; only after weary months of discussion did Stalin say that Russia naturally agreed to inspection—a view which, I am confident, the Russian government recognized as necessary from the beginning of the discussion.

I agree that Russia has to walk very warily. The facts make it clear that the Vatican is directly and indirectly encouraging the enemies of Russia all over the world, and the Vatican has become, since Mussolini's day, one of the most militant supporters of reactionary privilege. Mr. Churchill's Fulton speech, made under the chairmanship of President Truman, was an unhappy contribution to peace-making, and his recent sponsorship of a committee for European Union from which Russia and the Slav countries are to be excluded is bound, for all his disclaimer, to seem like a streamlined form of the old cordon sanitaire. In the light of his plea for Anglo-American unity and Franco-German friendship, both of which seem chiefly desirable, in his mind, as methods of isolating Russia in the post-war world, it is easy to see why the British Labor Party recommends its members to have nothing to do with Mr. Churchill's plans. Of course the Russians watch the eagerness with which the bogey of the "invisible red hand" is used by every reactionary element in the United States—journalists like Westbrook Pegler, newspaper proprietors like Colonel McCormick, Southern Congressmen trying to suppress the elementary rights of the Negro, Northern Senators seeking to wrest from labor the gains won during the New Deal. That is what makes so valuable a forthright reply like that of Stalin to Bevin on the Anglo-Russian Mutual Assistance Treaty, as it makes so stupid the fantastic comment of Pravda which produced Bevin's note of protest. Why should the Politburo allow the Westbrook Peglers of their own journal to make enemies of those who want to be friends?

I think myself that mutual understanding would be helped if Russian statesmen said plainly that the international situation is not yet compatible with political democracy within Russia, instead of insisting that their political system is more genuinely democratic than that of any other country. It is of real importance, in this matter, to be honest. I think Russia has achieved a remarkable social democracy; it has gone, in my judgment, farther toward an effective democracy in the realm of economic life than any other country I have seen. But on the political plane there is no right of opposition; hostility to the policies of the one-party state brings very quickly the formidable charge of treasonable conspiracy. No writ of habeas corpus is honored. There can be arrest, internment, and exile without trial; a man may be imprisoned or executed without even his wife knowing the offense with which he is charged, or the evidence brought against him; or whether he is alive or dead. The secret police remain an imperium in imperio, reaching long fingers into the control of every aspect of national life.

For a member of the Politburo to try to school an intellectual in his duty is as foolish as if Arthur Greenwood or Herbert Morrison were to tell Sir Adrian Bax what kind of music he ought to compose or J. B. Priestley what theme to choose for his novels. Nor is it wise, in the long run, to satisfy the curiosity of a Russian about English elections by referring him to Charles Dickens's comic account of the Eatonswill election in "Pickwick Papers," or to arouse his horror at the presence of 109 capitalists in the House of Commons without making it clear to him that the Labor Party is the master there, at least until the next general election, by an immense majority. The House of Commons has no doubt many defects, but unlike the Supreme Soviet its debates are real debates, and it has a great record, which the Supreme Soviet would do well to emulate, as the guardian of personal freedom against threats from ministers, judges, and the police. It would be helpful to Russians to compare the British record in the realm of personal freedom during the war with their own. It would be even more helpful if the Politburo would inform its over-zealous propagandists that, over any considerable period, the only propaganda which has lasting value is that which is rooted in truth.

It is perfectly possible for anyone with common sense to understand why Generalissimo Stalin and his colleagues do not yet feel that the time has come for political democracy in Russia. In the Soviets' twenty-nine years of life there have been five years of civil war and nearly five years of international war. There have been grave conspiracies against the state; literacy is still relatively new; political maturity in a multi-national community of two hundred million people is hardly to be expected in a generation, least of all in the aftermath of a great war by which it was strained almost to the breaking point. If the leaders of the Russian government said this quite frankly, and if they added, as I think they are entitled to add, that in half a dozen vital realms of social activity they have nothing to learn from Western civilization and much to teach it, a good deal of the hostile criticism they encounter would be seen in proportions fatal to its effectiveness. The present method of claiming non-existent achievements only does harm to Russia because it is only believed by small groups of enthusiasts who have somehow persuaded themselves that the Russian people already are privileged to live in the Elysian Fields.

The Russian attitude is not unakin to that of a man who suddenly attains high status and is fearful that he may be overlooked; in order to make himself heard he indulges in an overemphasis that is often arrogant or theatrical. Americans were like that under the stress of criticism from other nations until quite recently; Dickens pointed out this quality both in "Martin Chuzzlewit" and in "Notes on America." For many years we in Europe were compelled to hear how everything in America was bigger and better than anything in our poor benighted continent. Belief in the "manifest destiny" of the United States was so excitedly sensitive that even men like President Theodore Roosevelt could not refrain from telling the world how to do its business. Anyone who watches the behavior of the Russian zealots must be aware of the resemblance to immature America. The new Russia is not sure of itself. It is looking for insults. It is afraid that someone may forget it has come of age. That leads it to throw its weight about, and to be difficult and irritating in negotiation.

Patience and good-will are going to be urgently needed in international relations for the next few years. I know no nation in a position to make war at present which wants war. Undoubtedly there are individuals who envisage war as possible, and certain interests which would welcome it. But I am confident that not one of the governments of the five great powers wants war, and that no difference exists between their aims which would justify war. Within the framework of determination that the peace must be kept and every precaution taken against aggression there are naturally differences of opinion, but at this stage, at any rate, they are differences of degree and not of kind, and differences of degree always yield to patience and good-will. A comparison of the angry meetings of the Council of Foreign Ministers in Paris and Moscow with the recent meetings of the Council in New York—at which real progress was made—shows that where there is genuine give and take the way is open to progressive understanding. Stalin was wholly right when he said that if the five great powers were determined to understand one another there was no reason why the United Nations should not work and war be banished from our lives. What this requires first of all is the recognition that politics is the art of compromise, and that there must be the skill and insight to find the way to a good compromise when it is necessary. I am not certain that Mr. Molotov has that skill and insight in the degree that Mr. Litvinov had it; I am quite sure that Generalissimo Stalin has it. It would be a great step forward if he could make Mr. Molotov see that a series of insistent and emphatic negatives, sometimes shrill, sometimes niggling, do not add up to the kind of compromise which makes both parties emerge from a transaction with real satisfaction and deepened mutual trust.

I have, therefore, profound confidence that there can be full reliance on the purposes of Russia once we convince its leaders that we are as eager as they are to make its international security effective and will take steps to see that any attempt to revive fascism is broken into pieces at its birth. We can ourselves make a real contribution by realizing that, in Poland, for example, safeguarding the forms of democracy is not necessarily the same thing as safeguarding its reality; the same principle holds for the Greek elections. But Russia can make a great contribution too. Grave harm is done to good-will when Russian authority is used to impose fusion on the Socialist and Communist parties in the Russian zone of Berlin. Grave harm is done when Russian control blocks the creation of a Germany that, though vigorously demilitarized, is yet viable enough to give its people the right to hope. Not least, the Russian government needs very badly to humanize its Foreign Office and its diplomatic services. If every Russian ambassador abroad treated the citizens of the country to which he is accredited with the wisdom and good-humor with which Stalin treats his visitors, the legend would soon perish that the Russians are a strange race, anxious at any cost to destroy bourgeois civilization. Most Russians, in fact, are hospitable and friendly people; given the chance, they would convince the world quickly of their good faith. And the men in the Kremlin need have no anxiety about the future of bourgeois civilization—it has long passed the point at which it was possible to save it.

How to Run Coal

BY McALISTER COLEMAN

BROPHY Urges Mines' Nationalization." This recent headline took old-timers in the labor movement back to the exciting days of 1921-22, when American coal diggers were seeking some other way out of their plight than the usual devastating strike. John Brophy, then president of District 2 of the United Mine Workers of America, with headquarters at Clearfield, Pennsylvania, was head of the Nationalization Committee created by the miners' union at its 1921 convention. For years it had been routine at conventions for the miners to pass a resolution in favor of the nationalization of the coal mines of the country. Now they decided to back their words with a plan for action.

McALISTER COLEMAN is an author and journalist who has long made labor problems his special field. His most recent book is "Men and Coal."

The man they picked to work out a plan was the quiet-spoken Brophy, son of a Lancashire miner, who had gone to work in the pits in Pennsylvania at the age of twelve and who, despite his Catholic upbringing, had early come to a Fabian socialism. Brophy, aided by progressive mine leaders from Pennsylvania and Indiana, enlisted the services of two competent researchers and publicity men, Robert Bruère and Heber Blankenhorn of the Bureau of Industrial Research, and in 1922 brought out his committee's report. It was called "How to Run Coal," and its proposals started a debate which resounded far beyond the coal fields.

It is a commentary on the lack of any long-range planning by the private interests responsible for coal production that Brophy, now Director of Industrial Union Councils for the C. I. O., can make today just about the same argument for nationalization of the mines as he made a quarter of a century ago. Nothing has happened since then to affect the truth of the fundamental charge—manhandling of one of our greatest natural resources—brought against private ownership by the original Brophy report. "The coal industry," it said, "has been so disorganized and mismanaged that the situation in recent years has approached what big business men and stand-pat Senators describe as a 'catastrophe.' . . . Unless unification and order enter the industry, there will be a blow-up somewhere, followed by drastic, angry, and frenzied legislation. The American Kingdom of Coal is today in as chaotic and explosive condition as the states of Europe. No single, constructive suggestion has come from the operators. No large, leading idea has come from the public. The public is feeling intensely but is not yet thinking wisely. . . . The only large-scale proposal has come from the United Mine Workers of America in their demand for nationalization. It is the only proposal that grapples with slack work for the miners, higher prices, and irregular supply for the consumer."

LEWIS ON NATIONALIZATION

John L. Lewis, who had been head of the miners since 1919, backed away from the report and forbade discussion of it in the United Mine Workers' Journal, then edited by Ellis Searles, former press agent for the Indianapolis Chamber of Commerce. Lewis, a protégé of Sam Gompers, followed the conservative line laid down by Gompers in opposing the Plumb plan for the nationalization of the railroads—a plan which had been the source of many of Brophy's ideas. Both Gompers and Lewis feared any change in their accustomed way of doing business with the bosses; both looked with dark suspicion upon any proposal emanating from such dread "intellectuals" as Blankenhorn and Bruère. Gompers was still dizzy from his successful debut into the best Democratic circles during World War I. Lewis was sitting cheek by jowl with Herbert Hoover, then Harding's Secretary of Commerce, who was promising that a formula would be found to avert government intervention. The formula turned out to be the Jacksonville agreement of 1923, which was promptly torn up by the operators, with the result that the miners' union was destroyed south of the Ohio River, not to reappear until the Blue Eagle days of the NRA. Lewis, however, stuck to his guns and published under his signature a fantastic book called "The Miners' Fight for American Standards," in which he reaffirmed his Republican faith in the beneficence of cutthroat competition in bituminous coal mining, of monopoly in anthracite. In a dubious election Lewis beat Brophy for the presidency of the miners' union, and until recently nothing more was heard of nationalization from the men in the pits.

The operators are making much of the fact that at the last U. M. W. convention a resolution favoring nationalization was defeated. This convention was of course a Lewis-dominated affair, and the resolution was tossed aside without debate. Since Lewis's recent abortive attempt to help the mine owners put an end to government operation of their properties, there is again talk of nationalization on the "gob-piles," where the miners gather for lunch. A new generation has entered the pits since the publication of the Brophy report. These younger diggers have been around, many of them overseas, where state ownership of resources is no such bugaboo as here. Given a chance for free discussion, which they do not enjoy as members of our most autocratic—if also, ironically, our most militant—international union, a large number of them would undoubtedly plump for nationalization. However, so long as Lewis keeps his iron grip on his 400,000 well-disciplined miners, we can expect no Macedonian call for it from the pits. And if Lewis is on his way out, as Drew Pearson has predicted, his successor, whom he will name, is unlikely to make any fundamental change in the union's social or economic policy.

So it is up to us, the consumers, who have had enough of the anarchy which characterizes the production of coal for private profit to bring some measure of "unification and order" into this perennially distressed industry.

Public administration of natural resources has been justified by the success of the Tennessee Valley Authority, the less spectacular achievements of the Interior Department's public-power and irrigation projects on the Pacific Coast, and the building and profitable operation of the Big Inch and other pipe lines. All these projects can serve as guideposts to an integrated fuel and power policy in which nationalized coal would play a dominant role. In the past twenty-five years research work in the Bureau of Mines, the engineering schools, and a few centers supported by the industry has shown the way to the more economical burning of coal and the use of its by-products. The technological "know-how" is ours for the hiring. We can end what Stuart Chase years ago called "the tragedy of waste" whenever we have the common will to do so.

Our common will to do something constructive about coal is immeasurably strengthened by the egregious failure of all parties to the present dispute to act their ages. President Truman has strutted his stuff as the nation's number one strike-breaker, the iniquitous injunction in labor disputes has been disinterred, the miners' treasury has been judicially looted, but the only proposal to come from the White House is the creation of another commission to consider ways of fragmenting industrial unions like the United Mine Workers. For their part, the operators, backed by their bosses in the utilities, the railroads, and steel, are sticking to the late George M. Cohan's dictum that "many a bum show has been saved by the flag." They have assumed the role of patriotic and innocent bystanders, in the meantime pocketing the profits handed over to them by the naval officers who are operating the mines on behalf of the Department of the Interior—as weird a set-up as has ever been devised for this essentially bizarre industry. Egged on by the open-shoppers, the Southern operators are paving the way for another nation-wide strike this spring, when they will attempt to renege on the basic Appalachian Agreement of 1941, which for the first time made the Southern operators pay civilized wages and under the extension of which the mines are still operating. This will give the atavistic Mr. Lewis his chance to come back fighting, and the whole hoorah will begin all over again.

A FEDERAL COAL AUTHORITY

When the public sobers up from its recent emotional spree about coal, those who are at last willing, in Brophy's words, to "think wisely" about the industry will not view a sensible plan for the nationalization of the mines under democratic controls as the "opening wedge to communism," whatever the operators say. There are indications that strong popular support would be given to a plan for having coal run by a federal authority patterned after the TVA. Purchase of the mine properties by the government after a fair valuation and through the exchange of government debentures for privately owned paper would turn a national headache into a national asset. The groups most concerned with the continuous abundant production of cheap coal—the miners, the technicians, and the consumers, small and large—would have representation on the board of directors of the authority.

The authority would operate the mines through regional boards whose decisions would not have to be made in Washington and whose concern would be the engineered production of coal for the use of all consumers. Unburdened by the present private concept of coal as "something that can be mined profitably," these boards would have an eye to the conservation of what is still our most precious natural resource. The high-cost "marginal mines" could be eliminated by a public authority, which would see to it that displaced miners received severance pay while being trained for new occupations.

The authority could integrate coal with hydroelectric power and natural gas and put an end to the present wasteful cross-hauling of competing coals by the profit-hungry railroads. And because it would be free of the domination of vested interests, it could greatly expand the underground gassification of coal, or the burning of it at the pit-mouth, with the transmission of the energy thus derived through pipe lines or power lines. Though the solid-fuels technicians in the Bureau of Mines have done a yeoman's job investigating new domestic sources of coking coal, advising federal agencies and private industries on the efficient use of fuel-burning equipment, and gathering general technical information which could save millions of tons of coal a year, the private operators have been too busy warring on their help to pay heed to such "high-brow" activities. The immediate application of such research findings and the expansion of research to the barely scratched field of coal's invaluable by-products would be a "must" for a public authority.

It is in the field of human relations, however, that the authority, under decentralized, democratic controls, would prove of the greatest value. It would bargain with the miners' union as the TVA now bargains over wages and hours with the Tennessee Valley Trades and Labor Council, which represents some 16,000 workers. Nationalization, to be sure, will not end all labor-management disputes: miners, without a contract, will walk out on government-operated mines, as was proved not long ago. But American coal diggers, despite all the recent propaganda, are good democrats; indeed, those who have lived with them have found them to be among the most likable, alert, and courageous of all our industrial workers. If they are given a voice that counts in decisions affecting their welfare and a status befitting their all-important part in the national economy, they will not be found neglectful of the public good.

Proposals now being advanced, even in some liberal quarters, that in the event of government operation no-strike clauses be written into contracts with workers in key industries are pointless, to put it mildly. It would take a large part of the standing army, to say nothing of the navy, to keep miners in the pits against their will. The public authority would look to the causes of the miners' discontent. Their present demands are not, as some person would have us believe, wholly a matter of wages. They have to do with living conditions in enclaves far removed from ordinary American amenities, with high prices in company stores, with inadequate educational facilities, with the deadly monotony of existence on remote cinder patches, which the younger people here as in England loathe so bitterly. They have to do, as well, with the death of 1,500 miners a year and the injuring of some 50,000 in accidents, many of which are preventable.

Under the best of circumstances the mining of coal will always be a back-breaking occupation attended by unusual hazards. However, under private operation, with a few honorable exceptions, no serious large-scale attempt has been made to better the circumstances. The general run of hard-boiled mine owners consider even the more rigid enforcement of safety codes under government operation and the setting up of health, welfare, and medical funds to be red-revolutionary activities. Of course these men and the powerful interests which they serve will scoff at the suggestion that only a public authority such as is here roughly outlined can handle these human problems. But their protests will fall on deaf ears once the public realizes that there is an alternative, and a democratic one to boot, to the recurrent coal wars which keep our power-driven economy so perilously on edge.

Korea: An American Tragedy

BY WILL HAMLIN

Seoul, Korea, February 6

KOREA is seething with unrest. United States army intelligence officers are frankly worried and have warned the American command of possible violent demonstrations in the near future. Numerous factors are contributing to this explosive situation. People are beginning to feel the pangs of hunger as the food crisis forces prices skyward on all the necessities of living. The farmers are angered by the high-handed methods being used to collect the rice harvest, methods which have been far from successful. Great excitement was aroused by the alleged rape in early January of three Korean women by American soldiers. As a result overt hostility is being shown toward both Americans and Russians, and less and less effort is made to apportion the blame for the country's ills between the two occupying powers.

The American command in South Korea, disregarding the recommendations of the recently adjourned Korean-American conference called by General Hodge to study the country's problems, has seen fit to maintain in office notorious Japanese collaborators and grafting politicians. Among these are the Korean directors of the national police and the Seoul municipal police, both of whom were indicted by the conference on several counts, including outright corruption. The local police are hated by the people for their brutal and arbitrary actions, but are upheld for political reasons. The summary "justice" meted out by American military courts to Koreans accused of crimes against the American forces also rankles in the Korean mind.

Recently the American command authorized the formation of a so-called "Interim Legislative Assembly" composed of forty-five elected members and forty-five appointees. As soon as the legislature began to feel its oats and showed signs of becoming an embryonic democratic institution under the progressive leadership of Dr. Kim Kyu Sik, it was informed by the Americans that it derived its power not from the people but from the Military Government and that its decisions could be no more than suggestions to the American authorities. It had been about to make a sweeping and much-needed investigation of Korean government personnel and to enact a radical land reform when it found it was practically impotent. Unless American policy is radically altered and the legislature is allowed to go its own way, the Korean people will lose any interest they still feel in this abortive experiment in democracy.

THE RHEE SYNGMAN PLOT

The American command finally learned the truth about Dr. Rhee Syngman, wealthy right-wing leader and one-time unofficial Korean representative in Washington, and induced him to leave Korea so that Dr. Kim Kyu Sik could take the initiative in forming the interim legislature and in seeking the political unification of right and left. In the early days of the occupation General Hodge, acting on poor advice, gave tacit support to Dr. Rhee and his colleagues, the State Department having omitted to inform the American commander of the suspicions that several years of unofficial contact with Rhee had generated. Finally, Hodge found him out to be the ambitious egocentric that he is, a man too much influenced by the desire for money and political power to be relied upon for sincere patriotic leadership.

Rhee's latest adventure—his trip to the United States in December ostensibly to plead the cause of Korean independence before the United Nations—damned him in American eyes here. In the first place, some thirty million yen was "voluntarily" contributed by South Korean citizens (many large companies collected a compulsory levy on all employees regardless of their sentiments) to cover the expenses of this pilgrimage. Through negotiations with local American Protestant missionaries Rhee managed to exchange this sum for dollar bank credits in the United States at the rate of 100 yen to the dollar, whereas the legal rate is 15 yen to the dollar. The entire transaction was clearly illegitimate, and all parties concerned must have known it.

When the real reason for Dr. Rhee's trip finally came to light, the American authorities here received an even greater shock. The story is essentially this. Before his departure Rhee gathered his lieutenants about him and concocted a plan which, if successful, would deliver the political, and thus the economic, control of Korea into their hands. The first step was to be a rightist-inspired demonstration in South Korea directed not only against the Russians and Americans and the idea of trusteeship in general but particularly against General Hodge and his policies. The signal for this affair was to be a telegram from Rhee in the United States. It was thought that the demonstration would be so damaging to American prestige and attended by such violence that the American command would be forced to jail its leaders. Three men—Kim Koo, Cho Whan Ku, and Ahm Hung Suk—were selected to be the martyrs. The jailing of these men would in turn be the signal for Rhee to launch a vigorous campaign against Hodge in the United States in the hope that it would result in his removal, for with Hodge in command, Rhee and his group knew they would never be able to gain a dominating position in the country. As soon as a replacement for Hodge was named, the plan called for Rhee to request the new American commander to set up a separate South Korean government. Then, with the aid of his political henchmen, the national police, Dr. Rhee hoped to bring off a coup d'état. The final step was to be the imposition of the authority of this South Korean government on North Korea, by peaceful means if possible, if not, by bringing about war between the United States and the Soviet Union.

WILL HAMLIN is the nom de plume of a member of the American occupation forces in Korea.

Fantastic? Perhaps, but the American command evidently did not think so when it alerted the Seventh Division. Dr. Rhee's telegram has arrived; right-wing leaders from all over South Korea have met in Seoul to make plans for the demonstrations; rightist groups are carrying on a vigorous anti-Hodge campaign. The bulk of the people now believe that the General is on the verge of agreeing to the Soviet terms for reconvening the Joint Soviet-American Commission which adjourned in complete disagreement in Seoul last May. Under these terms all persons who have expressed opposition to a trusteeship would be excluded from consultation with the commission and from participation in an interim government. In effect, this would mean the exclusion of everyone except members of the Communist Party and of a few affiliated groups, a very small minority. The report about General Hodge's intentions, erroneous as it surely is, is apparently being deliberately propagated. Moreover, Rhee has $300,000 in his pocket, and probably millions more are available from business friends in the United States who might care to invest in the venture. No wonder the American authorities are worried.

GENERAL HODGE AND THE COMMUNISTS

General Hodge is undoubtedly the best man in Korea. Unfortunately he is surrounded by inept and inefficient—and sometimes corrupt—army brass. He is hardly on speaking terms with Major General Archer L. Lerch, military governor of Korea, who is thoroughly disliked by the Korean people, but he is smeared by the ill-advised actions of Lerch and other subordinates.

The major sin of which General Hodge is guilty apparently stems from his lack of knowledge of Communist tactics. In spite of continued warnings from his political advisers, he is playing right into the hands of the Communists in South Korea and swelling their ranks at every turn. For instance, he maintains that anyone attacked by the Communists should be kept in office—even such notorious figures as the Korean directors of the national police and the Seoul police—because to remove them would be to give in to Communist demands. Apparently he forgets that the Communists exploit an evil situation for their own ends—to arouse feeling against the "reactionary" and "imperialistic" Americans. If the evil were removed, the wind would be taken out of their sails. The way to combat communism is to offer something better. Instead, striking students have been expelled without any sincere effort to learn their grievances; once legitimate left-wing groups, particularly farmers' associations and labor unions, have been forced underground; and the many paper guaranties of civil liberties have been made a farce by allowing the politically infested police and courts to run wild—the present chief justice of the Korean Supreme Court once remarked that any judge fit to hold office was naturally influenced by prejudice in a case involving a leftist.

In short, the American Military Government is doing all it can to drive Korea into communism, although up to a few months ago the people plainly preferred some form of democratic socialism. General Hodge, like many of his compatriots, fails to recognize that the arch enemy of the "party" is the social democrat, the progressive, the liberal—not the reactionary. It is understandable that the Russians have refrained from suggesting a joint withdrawal of American and Soviet forces. A few more months and the Americans will have delivered South Korea solidly into the waiting arms of the Soviet-controlled Korean Communist Party.

Any consideration of the Korean muddle must include a reference to the State Department, whose first political directive relative to Korea arrived nine months after the occupation had begun. Since then it has time and again taken action on Korea without consulting the American command here or even giving warning of its intentions. The American authorities have been seriously embarrassed on numerous occasions and are never certain that their decisions will not be reversed by Washington.

Caricature by Sellgren
General Hodge

The General has frequently urged Washington to seek a simultaneous withdrawal of Soviet and American troops from Korea, but to no avail. It is true that this might mean civil war, but what modern progressive nation has been born without birth pains? As far as the United States is concerned, the point of diminishing returns has long since passed. There is no possibility now of obtaining the cooperation of the Korean people. They simply want us and the Russians to get out and let them have their independence for better or worse.

After the horrible expense of the Pacific war it is tragic to see the United States lose every shred of the prestige it once had in this part of the world through the gruesome débâcle in Korea. The blame must be placed right at the door of the War and State departments, which have failed to provide a satisfactory administration for this critical area where the American and Soviet ways of life are contesting for favor. The whole episode is somewhat like a race in reverse. It is a moot question whether the Russians in the north or the Americans in the south are doing the worst job. Right now, the Americans seem a little ahead in this backward sprint.

British Socialism Begins at Home

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

London, February 10

CRITICISM of the British Labor government's foreign policy in the past two years has tended to obscure its remarkable efforts in the field of domestic policy to break the hold of big business and monopoly capital by a bold program of nationalization. Taking an objective view, however, one must recognize that British Labor is attempting a profound transformation of the nation's economy in the face of extremely difficult conditions and against terrible odds.

The hardest problem is to build on the foundations of an empire that is today a historical anachronism. The somber drama of this great empire in the process of disintegration cannot be relieved even by playing up the extraordinary determination of the British people to accept any sacrifice that will set their country on its feet again. On the one hand, the law of history has obliged London to apply the principle of self-determination in India and Burma; on the other hand, each time a piece is lifted out of the empire another blow is dealt to the economy stability of Britain. The readjustment from the flourishing empire of five decades ago to the curious British conglomeration of today would be difficult under any circumstances; it is incredibly painful at the end of a war in which Britain gave everything it had. In men, in human suffering, other nations may have paid a greater price, but in terms of national effort and the expenditure of its national wealth England was second to none. Now the utterly exhausted people of Britain must shoulder the burden of rebuilding their land and propping up a crumbling empire. Last year when I visited London for the first time since 1940 it seemed to me that their fatigue was temporary, the kind of healthy tiredness that comes after an almost superhuman job has been accomplished successfully. My second visit has made me realize that their weariness is more intense than I had assumed.

This impression was undoubtedly heightened by the fact that I arrived in England in the midst of a cold wave that would nip the most daring impulse in the bud. According to the Weather Bureau, the cold has been more severe in Paris than in London these past days, but somehow one feels it more here. The dampness penetrates to the marrow; a leaden sky casts a pall of sadness over the city. I have experienced bitter cold days in Berlin, Vienna, New York, and even in Soria, Spain, but I cannot remember ever having been so close to freezing to death as one night last week in London. I had spent the evening with some friends—discussing Bevin, the atomic bomb, Russia, the weakness of the American left—in a house where a tiny electric heater was more a courteous gesture than a radiator of warmth.

The people are taking these hardships good-naturedly without trying to get around the law: Their food rations have been worked out scientifically and are no doubt adequate, but the fare is so monotonous that one is bound to lose one's appetite. Yet, unlike the French, the British are not inclined to rail at the shortage of meat and bread or to blame—however unjustly—the government and the selfish Americans who live amid luxury and abundance. Certainly most Europeans feel Americans have not yet realized that unless they help Europe they will wake up one day to find a group of nations which are incapable of buying American products in sufficient quantity to prevent an economic crisis in the United States. But Britons have learned to accept hunger in their stride.

Unfortunately, this very stoicism, however much a part of their character, imposes a kind of strain on the British and makes them unable to understand the nature of other Europeans. With a little more political imagination the Labor government might have surmounted the present critical situation to make Blum's visit to London more fruitful. With England paralyzed by the worst winter in many years, I realize how difficult it would have been for Prime Minister Attlee to announce that he had accorded France a larger share of Ruhr coal. But in the last analysis the greatest problem, it seems to me, is the inability of the average Englishman to appreciate any mode of life other than his own. He is outraged in a polite sort of way by the elegance of the Parisians, by the restaurants off the Champs-Élysées where one can eat magnificently well at prohibitive prices, by the advertisements for expensive new perfumes and the opulent displays in the windows of the shops along the Rue de la Paix. What he does not realize is that the bulk of these luxury items are shipped abroad to provide France with foreign currency.

Despite these obstacles, Blum's visit has produced some results. The discussions of Anglo-French trade and economic collaboration, initiated when he was here, are going ahead. Their aim is something more than an ordinary commercial agreement. Since France and England face similar problems, there is talk of combining the Monnet and Morrison plans for reconstruction and of setting up complementary industries that would link the economies of the two countries. Obviously an important phase of such a plan would be to divert to the non-dollar nations part of the orders which are now going to the United States. For the specter of the coming American crisis is very present in the minds of the men who are rebuilding out of the ruins of Europe; they fear too close a tie with America's economy, today so powerful, yet liable at any moment to crack under the chaotic and arbitrary rule of monopoly capital.

Labor's achievements at home explain its successive victories in the by-elections that have taken place since 1945. The Attlee government has lived up to its domestic program as outlined in the campaign manifesto "Let Us Face the Future." The domestic platform on which Labor went to the polls had three parts: to meet the immediate post-war problems; to pursue a program of social redress; to effect the transfer of Britain's economic machinery from private to national ownership. The nationalization program has been pushed vigorously, to the dismay of those who confidently assumed that point three was mere rhetoric: the Bank of England, the coal mines, overseas communications, and civil aviation are already under state control; bills to nationalize the railways and electric utilities are now before Parliament; and the government has under consideration similar measures covering the oil, gas, and iron and steel industries. Such a daring handling of the question of nationalization makes the first Ramsay MacDonald experiment look like a harmless excursion into academic Fabianism. On the trade front the last eighteen months have seen a spectacular rise in exports, accomplished partly by depriving the population of the simplest comforts; but Britain is still a long way from its goal of a 75 per cent increase over the pre-war volume, and the people face several more years of austere existence.

The most crucial issue confronting the Cabinet is to provide homes for a large part of the British population who are still without a place to live. This problem is being tackled by Aneurin Bevan, one of the ablest and most refreshing personalities in the government. A few days ago he promised that by the end of this year there would be 300,000 new homes. Labor's future may depend in great measure on its ability to fulfil this ambitious program; I am sure Bevan would not risk his party's reputation and his own by making predictions that cannot possibly be realized.

But the bravest of human efforts have their limitations, and in this moment Britain's prospects are not bright. The recent White Paper soberly assessed the situation and concluded that "the position of Great Britain is extremely serious." Fourteen industries surveyed in the White Paper require 657,000 workers if they are to return to pre-war levels of production. No one can figure out where they are to be had. Proposals for utilizing foreign workers have met with strong objections from the trade unions. The Communist-led unions are hostile to the idea because they fear it would give the government a chance to bring in Poles from the Anders army, White Russians, and other suspect Eastern Europeans who have chosen to become political exiles from their respective countries. More serious is the objection by union leaders that employers would be tempted to use this cheap imported labor to cut union wage scales.

The only large source of additional man-power is the British army, with its million and a half men still in active service. If the government demobilized these soldiers and sent them into the factories, it would not only solve the man-power shortage but eliminate a budget expense which the country can ill afford. But this supposes a foreign policy which rules out the idea of a showdown between the Soviet Union and the Anglo-Saxon world. That is why Stalin's telegram to Bevin was received here with a deep sense of relief, and the Churchill proposal for a European Union, which might be interpreted as another step toward an anti-Russian coalition, was rejected by the majority of the Labor rank and file.

In the continuing controversy between the British Socialists and Communists the latter may try to minimize what Labor has done. Apparently Stalin does not share their view, for when a delegation headed by Harold Laski visited Russia last summer, he told them that the accomplishments of the Labor government confirmed his opinion that there are other paths than the Russian to socialism.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Colonial Socialism

OUT in the East African bush country bulldozers and tractors, demobilized from British army service, have started to clear land for the biggest socialized farming development to be found outside Russia. Plans for the current year call for planting 150,000 acres to groundnuts—peanuts to you—but this is merely a beginning. Next year a much larger acreage will be put into production, and by the time the project is completed five or six years hence, almost 3,250,000 acres, divided into 107 fully mechanized farms of 30,000 acres, will be devoted to the humble but invaluable goober.

This scheme, conceived less than a year ago, has been rushed through by the British government because of the urgent necessity of enlarging world supplies of animal and vegetable oils and fats. According to the Food and Agricultural Organization of the United Nations, 1946 world production of these dietetic essentials was 16,000,000 tons compared to about 20,000,000 pre-war—a deficiency which is one of the biggest causes of the malnutrition afflicting so many nations. Britain itself, much better off than many countries, needs another million tons a year, and it hopes to obtain upwards of 600,000 tons in the form of peanut oil when the new East African venture is in full production.

From the world's necessities springs Africa's opportunity. In the British mandate of Tanganyika and the adjacent colonies of Kenya and Northern Rhodesia a growing population is pressing heavily on a limited food supply. The productivity of the native peasants, who till the soil with hoes and use no fertilizer, is extremely low, and it is now seldom possible for them to shift to a new patch of land when the soil becomes exhausted. Yet in this area there are vast stretches that are practically uninhabited either because they lack surface water or because they are infested by the tsetse fly, deadly to man and beast alike. Most of the land scheduled for the peanut project is of this type. Clearing the bush where the tsetse flies breed will make it habitable, and the construction of catchment basins and the drilling of wells will look after the water supply. Normal rainfall in the selected districts will in any case be sufficient for peanut-growing provided that moisture-conserving methods of cultivation are followed.

Since the farms are to be fully mechanized, labor requirements will not be large, and this is important, for man-power in the colonies involved is by no means abundant. Each farm, it is estimated, will provide permanent employment for some three hundred Africans. Seventy of these will be skilled men—tractor drivers, mechanics, dispensers, clerks, and so forth—and many of them, it is hoped, can be recruited from among those who fought in the East African regiments during the war. It is not easy for such men, who acquired a considerable degree of education in the service, to readjust to ordinary tribal life.

Three hundred workers and their families will form a village community large enough to be properly provided with amenities. It will have its store, school, clinic, and other welfare institutions. In areas where water supplies permit, ancillary farming operations are likely to be developed, making possible a growth in population. Peanut vines are a good fodder, and the crop-rotation system which will be followed will leave the land under grass half the time. Thus there should be opportunities for dairying and cattle breeding.

The report of the technical mission sent by the Colonial Office to East Africa last summer very strongly emphasizes the importance of research in connection with the project. Continuous investigations of soil fertility, plant breeding, insect pests, crop diseases, nutritional problems, and other related matters are an integral part of the scheme. Such studies, together with the demonstrations of scientific farming which the peanut tracts will afford, will gradually influence agricultural practice over a wide area.

The additional wealth created in the three territories will be of very considerable significance in raising standards of living. For instance, when the project is fully developed, the exports of Tanganyika, where about half the farms will be located, will be doubled, making possible increased imports of consumer goods. The expansion of local-government revenues will make greater sums available for welfare developments. Communication improvements, including new railroad, highway, and port facilities, which are an intrinsic part of the scheme, will open up large areas to trade.

These groundnut estates are to be owned and managed by a public corporation financed by the British Treasury, which will advance in instalments something over $100,000,000. Later, when this investment has been amortized, the plan contemplates transfer of control to the colonial governments. Eventually, it is hoped, native cooperatives will take over the whole project. However, this final stage is admittedly a long way off, and I would like more definite information about what happens to profits from the scheme meanwhile. Assuming the accuracy of the financial estimates on which the British government is proceeding, the margin between cost, including interest and amortization, and sales price will be very substantial as long as the world shortage of fats continues. The technical mission's report, in fact, speaks of a "saving" on the British food bill of some $40,000,000 a year. Does this mean that the whole crop will be sold to the British Ministry of Food at cost, so that the whole "profit" accrues to Britain?

I hope that when the project is discussed in Parliament this important point will be elucidated. To me it seems essential that in colonial-development schemes of this kind all or most of the profits be retained in the colonies and used to build up their productive capacity and raise living standards. If this is not done, colonial peoples are likely to think that socialist exploitation is painfully similar to capitalist exploitation. Subject to this qualification, we can agree with the London Times that the plan is "the boldest and most comprehensive ever launched for developing backward territories." Let us hope it will serve as an inspiration for other efforts to spread the benefits of Western technique, efforts which the industrially advanced peoples must make if their own productivity is not to prove a curse.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Life with Franco

COMPLACENT DICTATOR. By the Rt. Hon. Sir Samuel Hoare (Viscount Templewood). Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

A YEAR ago, when I was back in Spain for a brief visit, the fascist newspapers were having great sport with Hoare's reminiscences, which had already been published in London. His statement that he took a Scotland Yard escort to Madrid in 1940 and himself carried a revolver as protection against kidnapping amused them no end. But it is to the credit of the British Foreign Service that at least the Franco regime did not hasten to publish these memoirs in Spain, as it did those of Carlton J. H. Hayes, who was American ambassador during the later stages of Hoare's mission to Madrid.

This is the first volume of a series of memoirs by Hoare, and his American publisher would have been well advised to retain the non-committal English title, "Ambassador on Special Mission." Franco is, to be sure, an extremely puffed-up little man. But his complacency hardly surpasses that of Hoare himself, and it is not to be spoken of in the same breath with that of Hayes.

As the Hoare-Laval deal had demonstrated years before, such considerations as democracy, collective security, and so on were all chimeras to Hoare's "realistic" mind—it was the same realism that led his friend and colleague, Neville Chamberlain, up the Munich path. His appointment as ambassador to Madrid was therefore interpreted by the Spanish fascists as a sign that the British wanted to make a deal; he arrived in Madrid just as France was collapsing and Mussolini was nerving himself to attack a beaten foe. So there were numerous Anglo-Falangista deals. But it must be said to Hoare's credit that he drove as hard bargains as he could, and that the refusal of Franco to declare war in June, 1940, or in January, 1941, was due as much to him as to any one man.

Hayes did not arrive in Madrid until 1943, and by that time the danger that Franco would openly join Hitler had disappeared. Hoare's informing book, filled with its scorn of Franco and most of the gang he had around him, is a welcome contrast to the special pleading of Hayes, for whom Hoare had a contempt that is poorly masked here. Their great quarrel came in 1944, when the State Department, smarting under Franco's cable of congratulations to the puppet whom the Japanese had installed as head of the Philippine "republic," ordered Hayes to demand a complete embargo on the export of Spanish wolfram to Hitler. Hoare was against this long-over-due requirement, which the democracies could easily have enforced by continuing their embargo on Franco's supplies of gasoline. His alibi, given here, is very unconvincing, and it is clear that by then his years of appeasement had become a habit. It was constitutionally impossible for him to compel even the "complacent dictator" to come across. Despite Hayes's delight at rubbing shoulders with Spanish grandes and his general approval of the Franco regime, it was the American ambassador who was in the right on the wolfram question.

But Hoare rendered an undeniable service to the Allied cause by his inimitable sangfroid, even though his boast now about having kept on playing tennis in the bad June days of 1940 rather takes the edge off what was a very good performance. Equally important, today, is his authoritative disclosure of the hostile acts committed by Franco throughout the war. His book should be required reading for all the present-day "realists" who argue that, after all, Franco didn't actually declare war on the Allies. In a memorandum to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in July, 1943, Hoare detailed, in what he calls a "grand remonstrance," occupying seven pages in his book, the "instances of unequal facilities granted or not denied to the Axis, and of discrimination against British subjects and British interests."

These included facilities given five Italian and German submarines to leave Spanish ports instead of being interned, refueling of U-boats in the harbor of Vigo itself, crews of Axis military planes repatriated and British crews detained, facilities given Axis espionage and sabotage groups in the neighborhood of Gibraltar and elsewhere, constant attacks on Britain and its Allies in the Spanish press. The memorandum concluded: "Meanwhile the Blue Division remains in Russia, and looks, unless quick action is taken, like being the last non-German force left fighting for the Germans. Events, in fact, are developing very fast, and Spain is in serious danger of being overtaken by them."

Unfortunately, no such events have overtaken Franco Spain, and this is to be attributed mainly to the fact that Hoare, and the men like him still in the Foreign Office, are concerned with the short-term interests of Britain.

It has been British policy for a century and more to support a weak regime in Spain, and Franco is as weak a ruler as the Foreign Office could want. In good Churchillian style Hoare would like to see him replaced by "a constitutional monarchy, untainted by Falange poison and based on political amnesty, free discussion, and vigorous social reform." Meanwhile, however, Franco rules in accord with the interests of Britain, whatever may happen to the Spanish people. But it is to Hoare's credit that he has a lively contempt for him. He publishes with relish Franco's letter to Churchill of October, 1944, proposing that Britain join Spain in an alliance against Russia, and Churchill's acid rejection. The book contains, also the State Department documents proving Franco's close working arrangements with Hitler and Mussolini.

THOMAS J. HAMILTON

Fragments of Fragments

A KIERKEGAARD ANTHOLOGY.
Edited by Robert Bretall. Princeton University Press. $5.

SHALL we say that Kierkegaard has at last arrived in America: he has his anthology? (Ours is the Reprint Era, but let us comfort ourselves, re-

A sincere and substantial new novel by the author of WINTER WHEAT
THE Quarry
by Mildred Walker

THE QUARRY is a tale of granite and soapstone, a story of the yeast of democracy working in a small Vermont village during the Civil War and in the years that followed. It is a novel of family life, of a harsh but righteous father and a gentle son, of a Southern belle who played Dixie on a piano in a Vermont parlor, of a runaway slave who found a life of dignity, of a love that was thwarted, yet endured for a lifetime. $3.00

ALL THE KING'S MEN
by Robert Penn Warren

"A brilliant, merciless study of the life and times of a Southern demagogue, his morals and manners, women and satellites."

—Paul Engle, Chicago Tribune $3.00

by Ann Abelson

Angels' Metal

A frank and frequently satirical tale of life in a Catholic college for women and of Helen Bianchi, one of the college's humbler graduates. The story of Helen's career and marriage brings to a climax a novel of extraordinary moral and psychological insight.

$2.50

LOOK SOUTH to the POLAR STAR
by HOLGER CAHILL

A novel of Americans bobbing like chips amid the ebb and flow of China's polyglot humanity. "Rarely has such a welter of sound and fascinating material about a country been crowded between covers of a single book . . . a thousand things have seldom been recaptured more vividly; the people and the politics are just as he describes them."—Annalee Jacoby, co-author of THUNDER OUT OF CHINA, in the N. Y. Times Book Review.

At your Bookseller's $3.00

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY

membering that the Italian Renaissance was also a period of the reprint.)

Sooner or later the anthologist was bound to catch up with Kierkegaard: the quality of nearly all his writing—abounding in purple patches, repetitions, and verbosity—seems to promise that nothing, or not very much, will be lost by selection. But if Kierkegaard's strength does not lie in the order, economy, or logical development of his ideas, it does on the other hand lie in the intensity of experience and irony he is able to concentrate on isolated particular points. And when we do not allow him his density, we are apt to remain unsatisfied with the dilution. His books suggest natural gardens, wild and irregular, where cutting and clipping may mark out paths easier to follow, but will inevitably diminish the powerful impression communicated by the whole wild tangle. To cite one example: the passages from "Either/Or" in this volume are chosen in order to give us the gist of Kierkegaard's distinction of the levels of human existence—aesthetic, ethical, religious—but I doubt whether enough is given to enable a person who has not read through the whole book to grasp these levels in their full concreteness; and with Kierkegaard concreteness is of the essence.

I do not mean to insinuate any doubts as to the excellent job Mr. Bretall has done in editing these selections; only to call attention to the attendant danger that the reader who has not previously touched Kierkegaard or has been repelled by the difficulties may be tempted to make this volume a substitute for reading any single work from cover to cover. Kierkegaard's own ironical title, "Philosophical Fragments," may truly describe his whole philosophic contribution, but ought we to compound his quality by taking fragments of fragments? The real and serious usefulness of this anthology will be as a companion and introduction to the study of Kierkegaard's works themselves: Mr. Bretall has arranged his selection in chronological sequence so that the reader obtains a kind of panoramic view of the entire gamut of Kierkegaard's writings.

Another scheme might have been followed in this anthology. Though Kierkegaard's thought deliberately baffles systematization, it does center in a certain number of major issues, like (1) the three stages, aforementioned, of human existence, (2) existential dialectics, (3) the concept of dread, or anxiety, the "sickness unto death." An anthology along these lines might omit a good deal of the specifically Christian material that Mr. Bretall includes, but it would have other compensations. Mr. Bretall remarks that "The Sickness unto Death" is his favorite among Kierkegaard's works and that he is printing more of it proportionately than of any other; but I do not think what he prints, or even the work itself, is fully intelligible apart from the correlated "Concept of Dread." In the anthology I am suggesting there might have been room for both works. Such an anthology might tend, of course, to separate the philosopher from the Christian in Kierkegaard, and in any final sense such a separation appears impossible. But we should remember that Kierkegaard's influence has fructified also in men without any religious persuasion—Jaspers (until his recent conversion), Heidegger, and the French existentialists—and his ultimate stature has to be measured in the light of this influence.

The degree of this influence will hardly permit us to relegate Kierkegaard to a minor rank. Is this a rather crude and "pragmatic" test? I think you will find it works pretty well for the history of ideas, where, so far as I know, no influence—whether for good or ill—has ever spread wide or deep without having laid hold of some intuition that really marks a new turning point in thought. And if you want a more internal clue to Kierkegaard's importance, you can find it in the fact that some of the main categories of his thought—anxiety, dread of freedom, death—are on their way to becoming the key terms, the verbal stigmata, of our present civilization. Take the example of the "sickness unto death," which looks like mere religious psalmody until we hear Freud telling us that we are eventually killed by our inner conflicts. Doctors have lately been performing lobotomies with considerable success, and we can imagine some future stage of science where the operation has been so perfected that it will relieve us of most of our conflicts—at the price of relieving us of most of our personality. Under such circumstances human beings would be faced with a very plain choice: to consent to be a person is to consent to the burdens and tensions that eventually kill us; or, as Kierkegaard would put it, the will to be a self is also the will to "the sickness unto death." It is evidence of Kierkegaard's genius that he could grasp through the introspective imagination a profound character of the human condition that we had to wait for psychoanalysis to validate empirically.

The INSIDE STORY of HITLER'S WAR PLANS
BASED ON SECRET
GERMAN DOCUMENTS

DESIGN FOR AGGRESSION

By PETER de MENDELSSOHN

"Deserves wide distribution... a grim revelation, from primary sources, of the actual nature and inner dynamics of Fascism."

—Professor FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN, Williams College

"Richly documented and compelling... especially for a people that seems to have forgotten to remember."

—MAX LERNER

At all bookstores • $3.50

HARPER & BROTHERS • NEW YORK 16

HERE IS TRUTH— That Every INTELLIGENT AMERICAN Should Know!

Timely books . . . VITAL books—so important that they MUST be read by every thinking individual! Here are FACTS! Authoritative, proven facts which break down the walls of silence and shine the light of TRUTH on a subject which has long been considered “hush”!

- on a subject that has too long been TABOO in America . . .
- on a subject which newspapers and magazines USUALLY AVOID . . .
- that YOU MUST KNOW if you are to stay free in a free land!

FORGOTTEN WOMEN— by Helen Conroy

“Her appeal is to the American people for a New Deal for the Forgotten Women in Convents.”

LOS ANGELES
TIMES

$1.25

THE SOUL of a PRIEST by L. H. Lehmann

The life story of the widely known authority on Roman Catholicism, who describes his experiences as a Roman Catholic priest on the three Continents of Europe, Africa and America.

$1.50

CRUX ANSATA— by H. G. Wells

An indictment of the Roman Catholic Church. An historical summary of the Catholic Church's political intrigues leading to its tie-up with the Nazi, Fascist, Shinto Axis.

$1.75

BEHIND THE DICTATORS by L. H. Lehmann

“Dr. Lehmann presents FACTS to show the reactionary, fascist elements of the Catholic Church for what they are, and to encourage those within the Church who are progressive.”

$1.75

THE WITNESS

FREE!

TO THOSE WHO SEND IN THEIR ORDER FOR ANY OF THE FOUR BOOKS
WITHIN 10 DAYS!

VATICAN POLICY in the SECOND WORLD WAR— by L. H. Lehmann

This famous booklet has quickly sold 50,000 copies at 25¢ and is still selling like wild-fire! It is yours FREE if we receive your order within the next 10 days!

Special Offer!

4 GREAT BOOKS FOR THE PRICE OF THREE!

$5.00

Remember: quantities are limited because of paper shortages—
Send your order in TODAY!

USE THIS COUPON

AGORA PUBLISHING CO., Dept. 351NM
120 Liberty Street, New York 6, N. Y.

Enclosed please find $..... for which please send me

..... Special Combinations at $5.00

..... Copies CRUX ANSATA at $1.75

..... Copies BEHIND THE DICTATORS at $1.75

..... Copies FORGOTTEN WOMEN at $1.25

..... Copies THE SOUL OF A PRIEST at $1.50

And include my FREE copy of VATICAN POLICY

Name.....

Address.....

City..... Zone..... State.....

And within philosophy itself we have the analogous evidence that Kierkegaard, existing in parochial Copenhagen, nevertheless participates in a very broad movement that sweeps through a much wider part of modern philosophy than contemporary existentialism. This movement, including Nietzsche, Bergson, the German Lebensphilosophen, also touches William James, Bradley, and Whitehead in part, and a good many other figures too. It is not always easy to define what is at issue in this modern tendency, but at least it is united in its revolt against the classical and eighteenth-century confidence in human reason. And Kierkegaard, had he really grasped his historical position, would have directed his great polemic against Leibnitz—as the last complete rationalist, in the older sense—rather than Hegel, who is already infected with the newer content. Kierkegaard owes more to Hegel—and in a positive, not merely negative sense—than is commonly recognized: Hegel had already composed his own "dialectical lyrics," and Kierkegaard could not have written "The Sickness unto Death" if Hegel's "Phenomenology" had not already analyzed "the unhappy consciousness." And in his earlier work Hegel had already elaborated, in practice, a kind of "existential dialectic"—which ceased to be existential because he let it be directed too easily into the system. Now, though this tendency in modern thought has often been rightly criticized as anti-rational, we should be mistaken not to see beneath its disturbed and disturbing surface the ferment of a new orientation for human reason. And it is rather odd, though perhaps significant, that Husserl, who has usually been criticized for lacking the historical sense and who on the whole stands apart from this tendency, should nevertheless have been the one to formulate most clearly the historical task that agitates its depths: the necessity that human reason grasp and reconstitute itself anew.

Put in this broad historical frame, Kierkegaard becomes a figure inviting very careful scrutiny. We are currently running the danger of having his readers divide into two rigid groups: those who never read any philosophy before they heard of French existentialism, and for whom Kierkegaard is something of a literary fad—the newest old hat from Paris, if I may slightly paraphrase Sidney Hook; and, on the other hand, the various petty tyrants of Philosophy I throughout the land who are ready to read him out of their classroom for inconsistencies, obscurity, or what not. Kierkegaard deserves better readers. So long as we still exist in the modern problem of the "reconstitution of human reason," we are not finished with him.

WILLIAM BARRETT

Beyond this, the opinions diverge widely. A number of the authors have favorite schemes of their own. Some lay greater stress on the difficulties than do others.

Frank D. Graham, for instance, thinks that the job can and should be done without deficit financing, without additional taxation, and without a variable program of public works. He advocates the issue of money by extension of credit against unsold goods whenever it is desirable to clear the markets of excess inventories and so keep production steady at a full-employment level. Henry Simons also is dubious about the commonly recommended remedies, but believes that the key lies in a perfected system of taxation depending mainly on the personal income tax, with variation of the exemption from time to time so that the burden on consumers will be less when production lags. Abba P. Lerner recommends increase of the public debt when necessary to maintain employment, and ridicules the contention that there is any danger in this course. Hans Neisser lays stress on encouragement of private investment to maintain a steady growth in the national income. Carl Landauer presents a variation of the old plan suggested by Mordecai Ezekiel—to compensate business firms for the goods which, according to a national production plan, they contract to produce but find that they cannot sell.

Other contributors discuss special aspects of the problem—Alfred Braunschweig writing on wage policy, Broadus Mitchell on foreign trade, and Norman S. Buchanan on foreign investment.

Such a description of the book may lead one to believe that it is a sort of intellectual smörgåsbord. You might sample its varied dishes, take most of what you like best, and finish without having had a well-balanced or digestible meal. Albert Halasi in his introductory chapter labors heroically and on the whole successfully to prevent such an outcome. He points out the agreements among the authors, skilfully reviews their differences, and aids the reader to make a reasonably intelligent choice. Perhaps his most important contribution is the demonstration that a good full-employment policy cannot rely on one device alone but must be many-sided.

GEORGE SOULE

MODERN REVIEW

A monthly on International Affairs edited from a new world point of view

OUT MARCH FIRST

with articles by

LOUIS FISCHER:

Mahatma Gandhi and Generalissimo Stalin

GIUSEPPE FARAVELLI:

The Crisis in Italian Socialism

JOHN L. CHILDS

American Liberalism Today

PAUL KECSKEMETI:

Existentialism: New Trend in Philosophy

and others

Special Introductory Offer

$1 for first two issues

Regular Subscription: $5 a year

MODERN REVIEW

7 East 15th St., New York 3, N. Y.

Employment

PLANNING AND PAYING FOR

FULL EMPLOYMENT. Edited by Abba P. Lerner and Frank D. Graham. Princeton University Press. $3.

THIS symposium by eleven economists brought together by the American Labor Conference on International Affairs is unified mainly by the aim of all of them—to maintain full employment without abandoning private enterprise. The majority believes that the chief means of doing so is to assure ample purchasing power in the market.

In Grayest Moscow

BEHIND THE IRON CURTAIN. By George Moorad. Fireside Press. $3.

UNFORTUNATELY it is not saying much to say that George Moorad, formerly of the Columbia Broadcasting System, has written the best book about the Soviet Union to be published by any Moscow correspondent since the beginning of the Second World War. Censorship at the source has made it impossible for him to record his impressions of more than a very few aspects of the Soviet reality, but happily it is the reality which interests him. He has thus come a good deal closer to the core of what little he was able to see and learn than Richard Lauterbach, Harrison Salisbury, Ella Winter, and others who have published rosier memories of the meager experiences we shared in that 'correspondents' ghetto called the Hotel Metropol.

Lovers of the Soviets and admirers of Wallace in his present mood will not like what Moorad has to tell them, and there is probably nothing this reviewer can say that will change their minds. For the record, however, I can assure them that what he writes is the undoc-tored truth, presented with admirable self-restraint in a journalistic style that is remarkable for its lack of padding.

There is little food for optimism in Moorad's book, but there is almost no misinformation in it, either. His analysis of the expansionist aims of Soviet foreign policy is even more obviously correct today than when he wrote it. People who still wonder why the Yalta pact has gone so sour may learn something about it, if they desire, by reading his sketchy but accurate account of its diplomatic genesis in Moscow. Those who still doubt that American relief has been systematically misappropriated for political purposes by the Soviet Union and its satellites may be less skeptical if they read Moorad's report of what happened to the Red Cross supplies we shipped to Poland during the war. And innocents who still believe that the Chinese Communists are only democrats in disguise may be somewhat disabused of that quaint notion after reading about his experiences in Soviet-occupied Manchuria.

Moorad contributes little new information about life in the Soviet Union

NO WONDER copies are moving so quickly —get yours AT ONCE!

Readers tell us we hit the bull's eye in the special Survey Graphic—

SEGREGATION:

*Color Pattern from the Past—
Our Struggle to Wipe It Out*

THIS twelfth Calling America number examines racial segregation the country over in schools, employment, churches, the armed forces, residence, recreation, and travel, appraising the cost to us in money, and in morals and psychological conflict. Outstanding authorities—white and Negro—assess recent changes, and show how each of us can help bring about a democratic solution of the problem.

Among the gifted writers: Charles G. Bolte, Joseph Curran, Edwin R. Embree, Liston Pope, the Rev. John LaFarge, Alain Locke, Louis Wirth, Robert C. Weaver, Robert E. Cushman. Missouri-born Dr. Will W. Alexander acted as chief consultant and Thomas Sancton of Mississippi was special editor.

Eleanor Roosevelt calls it "a fine job." Mary McLeod Bethune finds it a "marvelous edition." Channing H. Tobias praises it as "a source book." Harold L. Lundquist, associate editor of Moody Monthly, thinks it is "unusually fine." H. Vail Deale, Iowa librarian, spots it as an "excellent summary." F. E. De Frantz, Indiana YMCA secretary, hails it as a "magnificent issue." Desmond W. Bittinger, editor of The Gospel Messenger, considers it "among the best I have ever seen." The Woman's Press writes, "It provides information and directive for the future," and America describes it as "a noteworthy contribution."

Clippings have already reached us, too, from the N. Y. Times, Post, Sun; from the Christian Science Monitor and Christian Century; N. J. Herald News, Pittsburgh Courier, Amsterdam Star News, The Afro-American, Raleigh Carolinian, Philadelphia Tribune, Sunday Chicago Bee, Memphis World, School and Society and many other publications. NBC carried it across the nation.

Altogether these 132 pages, fully illustrated, offer a frank, timely discussion which vitally concerns every American.

* * * * *

Its companion special number in the field of civil liberties—the previous month's The Right of All People to Know—focuses on magazines, newspapers, books, radio and films making a plea for the breaking down of all barriers which prevent the free flow of news everywhere.

Published in conjunction with our third-of-a-century anniversary celebration, early recognition followed in newspapers ranging from the Minnetonka Record to the New York Times. CBS spread its message across the land, UP flashed it around the world.

* * * * *

Since its inception Survey Graphic has held that peace and the common welfare rest most securely on understanding. This non-partisan approach to basic social and economic issues, according to the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, "has helped shape the course of American life."

Published monthly, the facts, analyses and forecasts you find in both regular and special editions, assure you of an exceptional source of information and insight.

The subscription price is $4 a year, but for a limited period you may take advantage of our—

Special trial offer—

10 MONTHS FOR ONLY $2

including these numbers which sell for $1.10 alone.

Paper is scarce. Despite a record breaking initial print order, we guarantee delivery of these numbers only if you send your order at once—on the form below.

ORDER FORM

SURVEY GRAPHIC,
112 East 19 Street, New York 3, N. Y.

Send me 10 months of Survey Graphic, including your two latest special numbers, for the $2 enclosed. N itself. If anything, he bends too far backward in his effort to be objective about the Soviet housing program, which I think is even feeble than he suspects. He goes to some pains, however, to give a detailed picture of what the Soviet citizen these days is permitted to earn, eat, and wear—a humdrum subject, indeed, if it were not in the nature of a military secret. Throughout, he applies the same standard of criticism to the Soviet Union that is customarily applied to other countries, and because he does—and perhaps also because W. L. White has written the introduction to "Behind the Iron Curtain"—fellow-travelers in the retail book trade have been doing their best to keep it hidden under the counter. LEIGH WHITE

NAME

ADDRESS

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

GEORGE KELLY'S "Craig's Wife" I reviewed for The Nation in 1925. Seeing it again in the new production current at the Playhouse reminds me that the play and I are now in the relation of a re- to a sur-vival, and I can only hope that time has been no less kind to me than to it. There is, as a matter of fact, nothing to indicate that Mr. Kelly's crisp little drama was written more than two decades ago, and I doubt that an innocent spectator who wandered into the theater would ever suspect that it was not now being played for the first time. The subject, a selfish woman who makes the mistake of letting her husband see too clearly the fact that he is nothing to her except a guaranty of security, is either timeless or at least a subject toward which 1947 has no necessary intellectual or emotional attitude different from the attitudes of 1925. The dramaturgical method—"Craig's Wife" is essentially a "well-made play" whose three acts end respectively with a question mark, an exclamation point, and a period, according to the established formula—is one which has never ceased to be sound, no matter what newer fashions may from time to time arouse enthusiasm. Add the fact that the producers have cast, set, and directed the piece quite as carefully and quite as expensively as they would a new play, and there remains no mystery about the fact that "Craig's Wife" shows no signs of age.

The reviewers of the daily press were unevenly divided between those whose judgment was approximately the same as that I have just given and a smaller number who turned thumbs down. The audience at the performance I happened to see responded with marked enthusiasm, and since we so seldom have an opportunity to see revived a play from what I am inclined to regard as, relatively at least, a golden age of the American theater, I am interested to ask myself what reasons might be given by those who regard "Craig's Wife" as in no way noteworthy.

Obviously the subject is not "big." Opinions might differ concerning how common women like Mrs. Craig really are and how much they contribute to human unhappiness. But they are obviously not, like fascism, communism, race prejudice, and the atomic bomb, one of the menaces regularly paraded for our attention through the columns of most journals, and no analysis of the character of one such woman can possibly be considered "important" by those who maintain that at the present moment there is no time for anything except the consideration of the best-publicized threats. It was one of the characteristics of the twenties, when this particular play was written, that most men enjoyed a certain sense of public security which made it possible for them to consider how the good life might be led rather than merely to ponder the question whether or not they were likely to survive at all. That sense of security wilted in the chill wind which blew out of Wall Street in 1929, and I suppose that one's attitude toward a play like "Craig's Wife" depends in part upon whether one looks back upon the men of the twenties with some feeling of envy or merely with contempt.

A similar difference of opinion might also, I suppose, exist concerning the fruitfulness of the method by which the subject is treated. Mr. Kelly carefully delimits it in such a way that his play is purely a study of temperament and personality, and he nowhere exhibits the tendency—which few "serious" playwrights of today could possibly resist to suggest that the economic system is responsible for the existence of our Mrs. Craigs. He introduces Mrs. Craig to the audience, turns her before their eyes until they have seen her clearly from the front, the back, and in profile, and he then delivers her up to the fate which punishes her with neat justice by depriving her of precisely the thing which she has sacrificed all else to retain. While any proponent of economic determinism would call the "implications" of the story he leaves rigidly alone, though it does bring in her childhood experience as a psychological factor influencing her character, and he is content to see a very clear, sharp outline only the disputable facts of her personality.

The story exists chiefly as an excuse for exhibiting the character, but it is also used to satisfy the emotional desires of the audience, which is permitted to see the husband rebel at the moment when the desire to have him do so has become almost intolerable and to witness the visitation of exact poetic justice upon the wickedness it has come to hate. On the school of contemporary criticism, which seems to hold that the exasperation of a reader's or a spectator's desires is the only effect which ought to be aimed at by a writer serious enough to face the fact that only dissonance can express modernity, would no doubt maintain that the very satisfactoriness of the plot of "Craig's Wife" is a proof of its triviality. But the fact remains that even poetic justice has not always and at all times been assumed an artistic blemish, and seeing the play again does not convince me that the period during which it was written was not, in fact, as I previously suggested, a golden age of promise if not entirely of fulfillment—an age that is to say, when American playwrights were at least writing better than they had ever written before and when the end of the movement then underway was not yet in sight. Since it closed we have hardly advanced, and I doubt whether the thirties or forties did what they tried to do as successfully as the twenties the task they set themselves.

THE THEORY OF ALTOFORM

presents an original solution to the problem why some nations vanished while others have survived. It is based on an analysis of the cultures of Chaldea, Assyria, Babylonia, Phoenicia, Mesopotamia, Egypt, Syria, Cyprus, Persia, Greece, Ethiopia, India, China, the Mayas, the Aztecs, the Hebrews and of many others in the light of a new law underlying man's formal efforts. This challenging discovery backed up by searching scholarship of the cultures of the past will enable the reader to discern the chances of survival of any modern nation.

Scholars, artists, ministers and educators are profoundly impressed with this theory.

"... profound effect."

Paul F. Douglass

President, American University

"... most daring..."

Prof. A. Gordon Melvin

City College, New York

Illustrated with photographs $1.00

Write to: ADAM A. SANDERS

The Society for Advanced Thought and Art
107A St. Felix St., Brooklyn 17, New York

Judith Evelyn, the new Mrs. Craig, plays the role with a cold, exasperated intensity which is very effective; Philip Ober is notably successful in preventing the husband from becoming the mere passive puppet he might easily become; and Kathleen Conneys is also excellent as Auntie Austin.

Drama Note

FIVE new plays that are not standard angel-bait are being shown this winter and spring in an Experimental Theater program, sponsored by the American National Theater and Academy, that has exciting potentialities. The first of these, John Finch's fantasy, "The Wanhope Building," had five hectic showings two weeks ago at the Princess Theater.

Limited by a $5,000 budget and plagued by Equity intransigence, the company had the appearance, at the dress rehearsal I saw, of survivors of a desperate adventure hollowly celebrating their survival. That this may have robbed the play of much of its implicit fire, and all of its driving poetic coherence, is not simply to say the venture was mishandled by its producers. "The Wanhope Building" could only receive fair treatment at the hands of a man who had at his call a half-dozen revolving stages and pneumatic platforms.

Whether it would justify such treatment is another question. Finch's allegory of the sailor who sets out to stop a man who will blast all people's will-power with the "W-bomb" operates on extreme levels of simplicity and complexity in symbolism. I believe it requires tempering of both levels if it is to make its symbolism communicate.

J. T.

Films

JAMES
AGEE

13 RUE MADELEINE" is doing astonishingly well at the box-office. I wish I knew how much of this, even in the semi-conscious part of the audience mind, could be credited to the use of uninvented backgrounds, in and around Quebec. These are selected and photographed with such intelligence, and give the film such vitality, that the good performances of James Cagney, Richard Conte, and Annabella and a generally smart piece of movie-making look weak by comparison. The story tells of the training and work of a group of OSS men. At its best it is briskly informative without informing you of much. At its silliest it assigns an OSS boy with a face as transparent as a bent-glass display window to keep tabs on his best friend, who has been found out as a Nazi spy. The whole success of the Norman invasion is made to depend, for a while, on his hiding his feelings about this friend from the friend. OSS is also called O-77, for reasons of security which no patriotic American will question, though some people may never sleep well again if they once reflect that such a gnat was strained when the aforementioned brontosaurus was tossed down without even causing a hiccup. But the backgrounds more than make up for this kind of tarradiddle. Louis de Rochemont, the producer, is not the only man making movies in this country who knows the great value of getting outside the studio and shooting in highly specific places; but he is getting more of it done, more effectively, than anyone else, and if the idea spreads, and becomes a practice, I expect that most of the credit will be due to him.

The substitution of "O-77" for "OSS" as a supposed security measure is child's play compared with what has

NOW EVERY ADULT CAN STUDY this BASIC BOOK on SEX

"Best of All"

"The best of all available books on this subject."
—Hygeia (Published by the American Medical Association)

"The best one-volume treatment of sex in the English language."
—Carl Van Doren

"Few books on the subject of sex can be so confidently recommended as this truly admirable volume."
—Bertrand Russell

"There is probably no better introduction to contemporary theories about the physiology, psychology and hygiene of sex."
—The Nation

"Best book yet published on the subject."
—Mail and Empire

"The Art and Technique of Love"

"Dr. Ellis deals in detail with the technique of love and the necessity of converting it into an art if marriage is to be saved from many of its present frustrations and failures. Never sensational, but always scientific... a sex classic of our age."
—The Observer

"Ellis knows his husbands! He does not hesitate to ascribe to them the 'frigidity' of so many wives."
—Alexander Goldenweiser

"Art in love is defended and described."
—Journal of Public Health Reviews

"Another chapter, perhaps the best in the book, deals with marriage and with the difficulties which are so often encountered."
—Journal of Mental Science

"Packed with most interesting and significant facts concerning sex life."
—Mental Hygiene

"Sexual Difficulty"

"Should prove a certain help to any one perplexed with sexual difficulty."
—The Churchman (Oldest Religious Journal in the English-Speaking World)

"The best place to go to get straightened out on the sex business."
—Cincinnati Inquirer

"Sexual Joy"

"Sexual joy is neither immoral nor unmoral. It is a positive good... The finest art can only grow out of knowledge and understanding; hence the need for a science of sexual behavior."
—Marriage Hygiene

"The section on coitus is full of detail skillfully welded together, nearly every line containing information invaluable to doctors whose advice is asked by nervous young couples."
—British Journal of Medical Psychology

"Fearless and Direct"

"His approach is fearless and direct; yet he never gives offense."
—The Lancet (Leading English Medical Journal)

READ FREE —

Mail this coupon now to your bookseller or to EMERSON BOOKS, Inc., Dept. 787-G,
251 West 19th Street, New York 11, N. Y.

Send me a copy of Havelock Ellis' PSYCHOLOGY OF SEX in plain wrapper marked "Personal." I will pay $3.00 and few cents postage on delivery. I MUST BE SATISFIED — I will return book within 5 days and you will refund purchase price. (I am over 21 years old.)

Name.....

Address.....

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $3.00 with coupon, thus saving delivery charges. (Same money-back guarantee of course.)

STAGE PLAYS

MELVYN DOUGLAS & HERMAN LEVIN present

"CALL ME MISTER"

THE NATION'S TOP MUSICAL REVUE

Songs by Harold Rome • Sketches by Arnold Auerbach • Staged by Robert Gordon

New York—NATIONAL Thea.—with Jane KEAN
Boston—SHUBERT Thea.—with Betty KEAN

"BROADWAY'S BIGGEST REVUE HIT!"—Life Magazine

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAYThe Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way, CH 4-4256
Evenings 8:40. Matinee Wednesday & Saturday 2:40."A smash hit of enormous proportions."
—Ward Morehouse, Sun.

MAX GORDON Presents

MARCH ELDREDGE IN YEARS AGOThe New Smash Hit by RUTH GORDON
Directed by Garson KaninMANFIELD THEA., 47th St. W. of B'way, CI 9-0056
Eves. 8:40. Mats. Wed. & Sat. at 2:40"Must be seen. . . Warming, charming, chuckling."
—Morehouse, Sun

"STUNNING AND ENCHANTING."—Barnes, Herald Tribune

JOSE FERRER IN CYRANO de BERGERACFRANCES REID • RALPH CLANTON • HIRAM SHERMAN
PAULA LAURENCE • FRANCES COMPTON
ERNEST GRAVES • WILLIAM WOODSONBARRYMORE THEA., 47th Street West of Broadway, CI 4-0390
Eves., incl. Sun., 8:30. Mats. Sat. & Sun., 2:30

CONCERT

CARNEGIE HALL, SUN., MARCH 9 at 8:30

SIMON BARERE

". . . one recalls Busoni and Paderewski."

TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE

—New York Times

STAGE PLAYS

RODGERS & HAMMERSTEIN Present

In association with JOSHUA LOGAN

"A WELCOME HIT."—Columbian, Mirror

JOHN LOVES MARY

A New Comedy by NORMAN KRASNA

Directed by MR. LOGAN

BOOTH Theatre, 45th St., West of B'way
Evenings 8:40. Matinee Wed. & Sat. 2:40

"HIGH MERITMENT."—Barnes, Her. Trib.

HELEN HAYES in HAPPY BIRTHDAY

A New Comedy by ANITA LOOS

Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN

BROADHURST, 44th St., West of B'way
Evenings 8:40. Matinee Wed. & Sat. 2:40

"MERMAN'S A WOW."—Chapman, News

ETHEL MERMAN

In the Musical Smash

ANNIE GET YOUR GUN

Music and Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN

Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS

with RAY MIDDLETON Directed by Joshua Logan

IMPERIAL Thea., 45th St., West of B'way
Eves. 8:30 Show. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30 Show

MOTION PICTURES

MANHATTAN

ALHAMBRA
COL SEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
59th ST.
Bt. LEX. & 3rd
HAMILTON
123rd ST.
RECENT RIVERSIDE
Eldre ST.

BRONX

CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE
HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

WESTCHESTER

MT. VERNON
NEW ROCHE
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

BROOKLYN

BUSHWICK
DYKER GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT REPUBLIC
TILYOU
Coney Island

QUEENS

ALDEN
Jamaica
MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Keth's
FLUSHING
Keth's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

MANHATTAN

COLONIAL
B'way & 62 St.RKO NOW

"EXCITING SPY STORY."—N. Y. World-Telegram

JAMES CAGNEY'13 Rue Madeleine'

ANNABELLA • RICHARD CONTE

—AND—

'SWEETHEART OF SIGMA CHI'

PHIL REGAN • ELISE KNOX

"Unusually subtle and intelligent."—N.Y. Herald Tribune

BETTE DAVIS

Paul HENREID • Claude RAINS

'DECEPTION'

Based on LOUIS VERNEUIL play

—AND—

'DICK TRACY vs. CUEBALL'

MORGAN CONWAY • ANNE JEFFREYS

PAULETTE GODDARD

FRED MacMURRAY

'SUDDENLY IT'S SPRING'

A MITCHELL LEISEN PRODUCTION

A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

—IN PERSON—

JOHNNY LONG & HIS ORCHESTRA

JOAN EDWARDS

PLUS

EXTRA ADDED ATTRACTION

LEWIS & VAN

BUDDY LESTER

NOW

TIMES

SQUARE

PARAMOUNT

Midnight

First

Nightly

Buy Your Books Through THE NATION

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price post-free if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C.O.D. No C.O.D.'s outside the United States. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible. Make checks payable to The Nation.

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION

The NATION

20 VESSEY STREET

NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

been done to make "The Beginning or the End," which is the story of the atomic bomb, safe for democracy and points right and left. You learn less about atomic fission from this film than I would assume is taught by now in the more progressive nursery schools; you learn even less than that about the problems of atomic control; and you learn least of all about morals. There is to be sure a young scientist, played with sincerity by Tom Drake, who suffers from scruples; but his conscience is neatly canceled by the posthumous letter in which it is he and he alone who realizes, discarding his worries like last summer's sand fleas, that in God's own time transcontinental commuting, better complexions, and the millennium itself will be achieved on the power generated from an old hat check.

Oh, yes, the movie. Well, there is very little to say. The bombing and the Alamogordo test are effectively staged, though hardly adequate to one's information, let alone one's imagination of how to handle that information creatively. For the rest it seemed to me surprisingly bad even though I rather expected it to be bad, for a good reason: only people of first-rate talent stand even a chance of not being paralyzed, for a long time, by a new subject; "Wake Island," the first American movie about the last war, was hardly better than this. The film is also a horrifying sample of what American movies will be like if the state interferes with them much; it gives me unexpected respect for those who, under such circumstances, do so much better even with the worst of the Russian movies which get over here. Barring the two bits of staging I mentioned, which are to the credit of light-technicians, the whole show could as well be called "Tom Swift and His Giant Ego"—which, for that matter, could go for practically everything to do with the development of the bomb in fact.

Postscript: One seldom has the pleasure of expressing a hope and being thankful for its fulfilment in virtually the same breath. In reviewing "13 Rue Madeleine," above, I spoke respectfully and hopefully of its producer, Louis de Rochemont. I have just seen Mr. de Rochemont's "Boomerang!" It is too late to say more about it in this issue than that it enlarges my respect for him and exceeds my hopes.

Correction: I recently referred, in this column to Archbishop Spellman. Is his hat red!

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

STARK YOUNG, in his brief contribution to "Nijinsky" (Holt; $3), says: "I have in my time seen a few, a very few, artists of the theater who were more profound, more infinitely human, and more tragic to the heart and mind, but I have never seen any other artist so varied in his compulsion, so absorbing in his variety, so glamorous in his stage presence as was Nijinsky." And the book demonstrates the meaning and the truth of his statement with the photographs of Nijinsky that were published in Dance Index a few years ago and with a few additional ones. The compulsion, the variety, the glamour are all there, exercising their power in a way that makes these the most amazing and exciting photographs of their kind I have ever seen. One's pleasure from them is increased by the illuminating notes of Edwin Denby that accompanied them in Dance Index; and the volume (edited by Paul Magriel) offers two other interesting essays from that magazine: Carl Van Vechten's report, written at the time, on the Diaghilev company and Nijinsky in New York in 1916, and Robert Edmond Jones's account of his collaboration with Nijinsky in the production of "Til Eulenspiegel" in the fall of that year. Mr. Young's note on Mr. Jones's essay is one of several appendices; another is a previously unpublished discussion of Nijinsky's drawings—two of which are reproduced—by Marsden Hartley; and there is also a Nijinsky bibliography.

Incidentally, the November-December 1946 issue of Dance Index is devoted to a discussion of Picasso's work in ballet by William S. Lieberman.

One could understand Ballet Society's presenting Ratna Mohini, Pamoedjo, and Soekaro in a group of Javanese court and popular dances: they gave exquisite performances in a highly developed formal style with which very few in the audience were acquainted. But it was impossible to figure out what had persuaded an organization with the name and purposes of Ballet Society that it ought to present Iris Mabry in "Witch" and "Litany," two characteristically limited and monotonous examples of the so-called modern dance that has been on view in great profusion for years. Coming late on the program and lasting long they left one's faculties dulled for the work that came last—Balanchine's "Divertimento," a new and lovely little classic ballet superbly danced by Mary Ellen Moylan and the others in the group with which Balanchine has been working this season: Elise Reiman, Gisella Caccialanza, Beatrice Tompkins, Tanaquil Le Clercq, Francisco Moncion, Lew Christensen, Todd Bolender, Fred Danieli, and John Taras.

Balanchine also devised an amusing production of "Renard" with little help from Stravinsky's music but a great deal from Esteban Frances's costumes and the dancing of Bolender, Christensen, Danieli, and Taras. And the program began with Christensen's charming "Pastorella," which had occasionally effective music by Paul Bowles and good costumes and scenery by Alvin Colt, and was excellently performed by Beatrice Tompkins, Christensen, Danieli, and younger dancers from the School of American Ballet. Again the performances benefited by the fine playing of the music under the direction of Leon Barzin and Emanuel Balaban.

In the Collegiate Chorale's performances of Bach's B minor Mass Robert Shaw used only fifty or sixty singers, with the result that even the small orchestra was heard at all times in the choral passages. A further result was that the choral singing not only was lovely in sound but had a flexibility, a clarity of texture, and a buoyancy which I had not heard in the Bethlehem Choir performance last year, and which made DURING the next six or eight weeks the Books and the Arts section of The Nation will print reviews or articles by John Crowe Ransom, Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., Lionel Trilling, W. H. Auden, Eleanor Clark, Ernest Nagel, Hans Reichenbach, Kenneth Burke, R. P. Blackmur, Jacques Barzun, Dwight Macdonald, William Empson, Delmore Schwartz, Ralph Bates, Albert Guérard, Wylie Sypher, Arthur Mizener, Sidney Hook, Rolfe Humphries, Harold Rosenberg, Robert Fitzgerald, David Bazelon, Mary McCarthy, and Morton Dauwen Zabel; and poems by Elizabeth Bishop, Robert Lowell, and Josephine Miles.

Crossword Puzzle No. 201

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 There is a gun in it, and more than a whiff of grape
- 5 Put pen to paper, and don't omit the aspirate
- 10 Play into each other's hand
- 11 A right royal name, and an improvement on Guelph
- 12 Lace hole
- 14 I fled sin (anag.)
- 16 Reclined at one's ease
- 17 Here's a town in England
- 18 Part of Australasia that is greater than the whole
- 20 Those of London were paved with gold, Dick Whittington heard
- 22 This is the worst of wine
- 24 Not a custom of Lady Godiva
- 26 Large quantity (slang)
- 29 These college students have not yet assumed the pale cast of thought
- 30 Rag Eva and make her desolate
- 32 Political perfectionist visualized by Sir Thomas More
- 33 One pail has a milky hue
- 34 Hammer, but should not break the ice
- 35 Sit about in Hades—in the coolest spot!

DOWN

- 1 Alive and kicking—but not this!
- 2 Do they flatten the waves?
- 3 Hawaiian guitars

- 4 Rush up to a graceful animal
- 6 Ran with Ruy Diaz
- 7 They adorn fezzes and tarbooshes
- 8 A man without a country
- 9 Of the voice that accompanies the banjo?
- 13 Twisted
- 14 Hardly suitably clad, though, for a winter siege
- 15 Cap decoration for a successful wing-commander
- 19 Total lack of variety in the shoe store? (3 & 5)
- 21 Sally leads the orchestra in a slow Spanish dance
- 23 The oculist might remedy this in conjunction with the architect
- 25 Fancy, I'm a spirit for the most part
- 26 Throwing—coconuts, perhaps
- 27 A near thing
- 28 Robbed of little more than headgear
- 31 Stays away from the ball

□-□-□-□-□

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 200

ACROSS:—1 ANTIQUES; 3 CREATOR; 9 ENTRANCE; 10 EARACHE; 12 HOVEL; 13 PRIMER; 14 ARRAS; 15 SATRAP; 17 WHITE; 22 STRAP; 23 ASTERN; 24 BEECH; 26 REPEAL; 28 BOOER; 29 JAGUARS; 30 FILLED IN; 31 DESCEND; 32 SAVANNAH.

DOWN:—1 ARETHUSA; 2 TITIVATE; 3 QUAIL; 4 EXCEPT; 5 CREAM; 6 NAVARRE; 7 HOTHEAD; 8 EIGHT; 11 REATAS; 16 ALTHEA; 18 CASES; 19 BBHOLDEN; 20 ENTRENCH; 21 RELAPSE; 22 SCRUNCH; 25 ELMIRA; 27 PRUNE; 28 BELLA.

passages like the concluding Cum sancto spiritu of the Gloria very exciting. Shaw's faster pace made the opening of the Sanctus less ponderous and more joyous than it had been in last year's performance; but on the other hand it made the Qui tollis of the Gloria less moving. And the opening Kyrie too did not have the wonderful effect I recall its having when Toscanini took it slowly and with expressive inflections.

This time again I found the arias unequal to the choral sections. The ones for soprano were sung with neither beauty of voice nor distinction of style by Ann McKnight and June Gardner; but in the others I enjoyed the singing of Lydia Summers, contralto, Lucius Metz, tenor, and Paul Matthen, baritone. And the obbligatos were beautifully played by Oscar Shumsky on the violin and Robert Bloom on the oboe d'amore.

CONTRIBUTORS

THOMAS J. HAMILTON, now on the staff of the New York Times, is the author of "Appeasement's Child: The Franco Regime in Spain."

WILLIAM BARRETT is associate editor of the Partisan Review.

GEORGE SOULE is the author of "America's Stake in Britain's Future," "The Coming American Revolution," "The Strength of Nations," and other books.

LEIGH WHITE, author of "The Long Balkan Night," is now on leave from the Chicago Daily News and is writing a book about the Sovietization of Eastern Europe.

INSTRUCTORS!

Take Advantage of the Nation's

Special Class-Room Rate—
30¢ Monthly per Student for orders of 10 or more copies to be sent to our address—desk copy supplied free

Address your order to

The NATION
20 VESEY STREET
New York 7, N. Y.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 164

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 8, 1947

NUMBER 10

The Shape of Things

HAVING BEEN INVITED FROM TIME TO TIME to underwrite British failure in Palestine, the United States is now offered the opportunity to accept a receivership for Greece, and presumably for Turkey as well. Under Secretary Acheson is reported, in what we hope are ill-informed quarters, to have handed Lord Inverchapel a note asking his government to maintain its armed forces in Greece while we "explore ways and means of helping Great Britain to carry out its commitments." Since those commitments were incurred largely as a consequence of Mr. Churchill's ruthless determination to force a royalist regime on Greece even at the cost of civil war, the United States has reason to regard the British offer with a certain skepticism. And indeed prudence and isolationist sentiment, in the absence of more generous emotions, would probably dictate a flat refusal were it not for the fear, which may prove even stronger, that with Britain out, Russia would quickly move in. For Greece is one of those frontier posts between "Soviet totalitarianism" and "Western democracy" which can hardly remain unoccupied for long. And Turkey is another. In fact, the job which has been offered this country is not the relatively minor, if expensive and complicated, one of establishing order and economic stability in a devastated land. No, the United States is being called to man the crumbling ramparts of empire against the threat of Russian penetration and to do so in a land where war and revolution, augmented by British intervention and official terror, have created a standing invitation to communism to move in and take over. This is the specific proposal which our Congress must accept or decline. Its broader implications reach around the world.

✱

THAT THE BRITISH, NO LONGER ABLE TO carry the burdens of world power, would like to unload them bit by bit on us is wholly understandable. To assume them, as the State Department seems at least partly ready to do, would be suicidal. Wisely or recklessly, American interests are pushing ahead at an increasing rate in the Mediterranean area; but even our material investments, quite apart from political or moral ones, will not be safeguarded merely by carrying out "British commitments" or by helping the Foreign Office to do so. One look at the condition of the Empire is enough to prove that. The depressed and dependent Mediterranean countries, from Greece around to Egypt, including Palestine and the supposedly sovereign Arab states, need above all else to lose their status as pawns of empire. They need economic rehabilitation and modernization; they need release from the corrupt British-controlled regimes that rule and exploit them. The situation created in Greece by British weakness offers a unique opportunity for international action on a new basis. Let Britain withdraw its troops and submit to the United Nations, through the Economic and Social Council, the problem of reestablishing order in Greece and rebuilding the country's broken economy. Why should this be the job of one nation, whether Britain or the United States—or Russia? Has not the war and its aftermath proved, in Greece and elsewhere, that the old imperialist techniques are bankrupt and inefficient? For the United States to adopt them at this late day would be an act of desperation, not of statesmanship.

✱

MR. HOOVER'S REPORT ON CONDITIONS IN the Anglo-American zone of Germany contains little information not already available, and, broadly speaking, the relief program which it recommends duplicates the plan agreed on some time ago by the Anglo-American occupation authorities. But this lack of originality in no way diminishes its value; on the contrary, it enhances it, for the Administration can now go to Congress with a request for relief appropriations countersigned by the highest Republican authority. Mr. Hoover's findings are such that even the most parsimonious legislator cannot fail to be impressed. His is the old charity-organization approach, which combines a restrained humanitarianism with a strong emphasis on self-help. A starved and desperate Germany, he points out, must be policed by a much larger occupation army, and in this and other ways the American taxpayer can hope to save money in the long run by laying out credits now for the purpose of making the Anglo-American zone self-sustaining. Mr. Hoover

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	261
Mr. Bevin Explodes	263
The Powers at Moscow	264

CARTOON by Schloss	265
--------------------	-----

ARTICLES

Nazi Plots and French Plans by J. Alvarez del Vayo	266
A Faith to Live By: II. Institutions and Men by Cord Meyer, Jr.	269
Farewell to New York by Kay Boyle	271
Busting the Aluminum Trust by Bryant Putney	273
India Comes into Its Own by Shiva Rao	275
In One Ear by Lou Frankel	277
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	278

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Balzac in Limbo by Jacques Barzun	279
Our Native Fascists by Carey McWilliams	280
The Airy and the Earth-Bound by Rolfe Humphries	281
A Roxborough Pastoral by McAlister Coleman	281
Argument from Design by Benjamin Harrow	282
Soviet Statistics by Vera Micheles Dean	282
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch	283
Art by Clement Greenberg	284
Music by B. H. Haggin	284

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS	287
------------------------	-----

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 202 by Jack Barrett	288
---	-----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchway

Managing Editor Literary Editor
J. King Gordon Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kelloz Building, Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

is indubitably right about this, and we hope Congress will give heed to his recommendations. But essential as immediate relief is, it can do no more than prepare the ground for economic recovery. The problem of how to make German industry an asset to Europe instead of a liability remains to be solved, and this job can hardly be tackled by Hoover methods of social engineering.

✱

IN AN EFFORT TO APPEASE REPUBLICAN opposition to the Administration's trade program, the President has issued an executive order modifying reciprocal-trade-agreement procedures. This should make it possible for the American delegation to the International Trade Organization conference, which meets in Geneva next month, to act with less fear of a Congressional stab in the back. Unfortunately, the concessions which the President has made to domestic tariffists will play into the hands of foreign opponents of a multi-lateral trade program and diminish the chances for a satisfactory agreement. To many foreign nations, the new executive order will be new proof that there is more smoke than fire behind the much-advertised American design for freedom of world trade. The real truth, which the Administration apparently dare not blurt out, is that if the United States is to sell abroad on a scale commensurate with its ambitions and its productive capacity, it must be willing to buy the goods of other nations on a still greater scale. Fulfilment of this condition necessitates the maintenance of full employment in this country and a really drastic revision of tariff duties. The first requirement appears to be ruled out by Republican antipathy to planning, the second by Republican objections to hurting any interest with political pull, even though the economy goes to hell in a hack as a result. With such ostrich-like attitudes encouraged by Administration appeasement, other countries can hardly be blamed for believing that America is not willing to take its own medicine for the recovery of world trade. To them, Uncle Sam must seem nearly akin to the good old Duke of York, who led his men to the top of the hill . . . and marched them down again.

✱

LEWIS DOUGLAS IS PROBABLY AS GOOD A selection for ambassador to Britain as the President could have made considering how narrow his field of choice was. The stinginess of Congress in providing for the foreign service rules out all but men of independent means for a post of this sort. Since the critical situation in Britain necessitates the quickest possible filling of the vacancy, the nominee also had to be someone whom the Senate would approve without long and painful hearings. That requirement alone sufficed to rule out any real progressive. Mr. Douglas, like O. Max Gardner, who died on the eve of sailing for London, is a conservative Democrat, but he is at least an intelligent one. In view of his record as a strong supporter of aid to Britain before Pearl Harbor, he will certainly be persona grata in London. Moreover, his statement on appointment makes it clear that he feels a genuine sympathy for the British in their present troubles. Whether he will sympathize with, and understand the reasons for, the economic policies of the Labor government is another matter, for his economic beliefs are decidedly old-fashioned. However, contact with the problems Britain faces may convince him that Ricardo and Mill haven't all the answers.

✱

PHILIP MURRAY IS RELIABLY REPORTED TO have directed his chief subordinates in the C. I. O. to steer clear of both the Progressive Citizens of America and the newly formed Americans for Democratic Action. So far the ban is unofficial, with formal action due to be taken when the C. I. O. Executive Board meets on March 13. Unless Murray modifies his stand before then, the prohibition will undoubtedly go into effect, such being the balance of forces in the C. I. O. The P. C. A. stands to lose somewhat by the decision, since its roster has included Jacob Potofsky of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, not to mention Murray himself, who has now withdrawn as a P. C. A. vice-chairman. The A. D. A., however, is really hit hard. Encouraged by Murray at its inception, it includes among its members such leading C. I. O. officials as Allen Haywood, James B. Carey, Walter Reuther, John Green, Emil Rieve, and many other key men only slightly less prominent. But it is the C. I. O. itself that would lose most of all from this high-handed action. If the top leaders can be given directives concerning their political affiliations, just where will the line be drawn? Already Haywood has ordered his subordinates to keep away from an A. D. A. organizing meeting in Chicago, a session which Reuther and Green have also avoided rather than clash with Murray. This is a new note in American labor—and a sour one. Besides being autocratic, it is obviously discriminatory. Mr. Murray has indicated no intention of abandoning his plan to go to the next Democratic National Convention as a delegate. Nor has he asked Ben Gold, of the C. I. O. Executive Board, to turn in his Communist Party card. By what right, then, does he ask his lieutenants to reject membership in A. D. A. and P. C. A.? We hope there will be sufficient pressure on him before March 13 to induce a healthy change of mind.

✱

HAVING FOUND NOT A WHIT OF EVIDENCE reflecting unfavorably on Gordon R. Clapp, the Senate Public Works Committee voted seven to five last week against recommending him as director of the TVA. The routine effort to pin the red label on Mr. Clapp was remarkable only for the testimony it elicited from two burnt-out stars of the Dies committee. Former Representative Joe Starnes of Alabama told the Senators that President Truman "couldn't have made a happier appointment," and Robert B. Barker, once counsel for the Dies inquisition, admitted that his amateur sleuthing activities had failed utterly to connect Clapp with communistic activities of any sort. Clapp's efficiency and integrity during his years as general manager of TVA were not even questioned. On the face of things, all there was against him was the vindictiveness of Senator McKellar, who has had the ax out for him as well as for Lilienthal, both having guarded the TVA against the well-known McKellar appetite for patronage. But the Tennessee Senator's private feud by no means explains the vote of the seven hostile Senators. These gentlemen were not voting against Clapp but against TVA itself, against the whole concept of public power. Behind their otherwise senseless and arbitrary action is the resurgence of the private-utilities crowd, subdued by the New Deal but unchastened. On the floor of the Senate it should be harder to sacrifice Clapp to the power lobby than it was in the privacy of a committee room.

✱

IT'S GOOD TO SEE A CONGRESSMAN GO IN there swinging for civil liberties the way James Harris of Arkansas has done in offering a bill to outlaw all pending OPA suits against price-chiselers. By thus seeking an "amnesty" for 14,000 war profiteers, Representative Harris has demonstrated his keen concern for the rights of conscience, and we hereby award him the Order of the Sacred Sirloin and two tickets to "All My Sons."

Mr. Bevin Explodes

MR. BEVIN'S speech on Palestine was in part the utterance of an angry and humiliated man, seeking to throw the blame for failure upon other shoulders. And in part it was the speech of a stubborn defender of unconfessed intentions. It is the latter aspect which is important, for while his charges against President Truman will soon be forgotten, the intentions will remain and, if allowed to control the decision to be made by the United Nations, will frustrate that body as they have Britain.

At the outset of his speech the British Foreign Minister made it clear that in referring the Palestine problem to the United Nations he was not proposing to surrender the mandate but merely asking that its terms be changed. Moreover, though he had previously announced that Britain would make no recommendations to the United Nations, the whole structure of Mr. Bevin's argument was devised to rule out a solution acceptable to the Zionists. According to the Foreign Minister, the United Nations may choose among three solutions. It may set up a Jewish, an Arab, or a bi-national state. There was no serious consideration of partition, which had been supported by a majority of the Cabinet and almost the entire British press. Obviously, the intention was to make the bi-national state, based on the present Arab majority, appear the only practicable solution. Mr. Bevin's object is apparent: such a plan would insure the continuance of Palestine as a main repository of British military force in the Near East for a long time to come. That has been Mr. Bevin's purpose since he first took over the problem, or rather, since the Foreign Office first took over Mr. Bevin.

We are forced to that conclusion by the remarks about partition made by the Foreign Minister toward the close of his speech. "I am sure," he said, "that if we agree to partition we should have ten times the row as to where the frontiers should be, but you cannot make two viable states of Palestine. You can make one viable state . . . and transfer the rest to another Arab state." It would seem that to set up a Jewish state in one part of Palestine and to allot the remainder to an existing Arab government would itself be partition. What explains the apparent contradiction between this idea and the proposal of the Jewish Agency? Simply this: by all reliable reports, Mr. Bevin was referring to one of the Foreign Office's favorite pieces of Middle Eastern arcana, the so-called "Abdullah plan," according to which Syria, Transjordan, Palestine, and Iraq would be organized into a federated state, under British military "protection," headed by King Abdullah of Transjordan. The idea was publicly indorsed by Abdullah himself as an effective weapon against Soviet influence in the whole Middle East. If such a merger could be brought about, Mr. Bevin might be willing to consider "partition."

Mr. Bevin is prisoner of the archaic strategies of the High Command and the Foreign Office. Mr. Attlee and the three Ministers associated with him in the Indian and Burmese negotiations have bothered little with the brass hats and for that reason have made substantial and bold advances. Mr. Bevin, who has proceeded with old-time secrecy and procrastination in Egypt and Palestine, has allowed himself to be persuaded that the Middle East is a special region, in which Britain must keep a foothold even by methods which can only produce chaos and the defeat of every generous ideal. Not surprisingly, his record is one of total failure. It is inevitable, and just, that the United Nations should have British security in mind during the coming Palestine discussions. But Mr. Bevin's speech and his conduct of Middle Eastern affairs provide a strong warning. If the Foreign Office officials are allowed to dominate the situation, there can be no hope of a practical and humane solution.

The Powers at Moscow

RUSSIA laid down its line for the Moscow conference in its surprise acceptance of the American demand for the sole trusteeship of the former Japanese islands as strategic areas. Senator Austin's insistence that this large and far-off Pacific zone was "an integrated, strategic, physical complex vital to the security of the United States" found warm support from the usually dour Gromyko. In fact, the Russian representative added a new basis for the United States claim in recalling that America had "played a decisive role in the victory over Japan . . . [and] made a greater sacrifice in . . . the war against Japan than any other of the powers."

On these two grounds, security and sacrifice, the Soviet Union will almost certainly build its case in the discussions about Germany. It goes without saying that, despite the queries in Mr. Byrnes's Stuttgart speech, the Oder-Neisse line will remain as Germany's eastern frontier. And in the military and economic settlement that emerges, Russia's claims for priority on security and reparations will have to receive serious consideration. It is perhaps fortunate that Secretary Marshall heads the American delegation: if his war-time memory serves him right there were other fronts than the eastern front, and other armies than the Red Army fought to win the Allied victory in Europe.

France will be the junior power at Moscow. But its voice will be the most insistent on the subject of military guaranties against future German aggression. Having suffered three German invasions in seventy years, France will be only moderately interested in the revival of German industry. It will point to the failure of the denazification program in the western zones, to the facts underlined by Del Vayo on page 266, to the full-blown Nazi plot recently uncovered by the Military Government authorities. It will demand that if, in Europe's interest, the Ruhr industries are resuscitated, the area be put under French or at least international control.

Russia is likely to join with France in its security demands. For the Russians are hardly less perturbed by the ineffectiveness of denazification in the western zones. Moreover, they harbor dark suspicions that the Western powers are planning to build up Germany as the advance position from which to mount an anti-Soviet offensive when the time is ripe. They mistrust America's sympathy for present German misery when Herbert Hoover appears as the angel of mercy. They suspect our intentions in regard to the former German cartels when they see General Draper—late of Dillon Read—at the head of our Military Government's Economic Division. With England's economic crisis forcing it out of its Continental commitments, Russia sees the United States as the decisive power in the economic revival of Western Europe.

The new French-English alliance against future German aggression—primitive as it appears to those who think in terms of a United Nations world—may in fact have a healthy influence at Moscow. If entered into by Russia and the United States, it should do something to restore the Big Four unity that has been absent since the war. It should lessen France's jitters and perhaps persuade Moscow that our intentions are not strictly dishonorable.

As a matter of fact, the United States is at present more genuinely concerned about the future of Germany and Western Europe than at any other time since the war. The concern is partly humanitarian. Herbert Hoover's estimate of German misery will be listened to, not because it is Herbert Hoover's, but because his is but the most recent of the reports that have testified to the desperate state of more than half of Europe's 386,000,000 people. If these people are not to starve, the United States, independently or through a United Nations agency, must provide the bulk of relief. But Americans are not going to face an unending future of doling out relief to Europe. The very prosperity of the United States depends on Europe's recovery. The United States representatives will therefore press for an economic program designed to put Germany and Western Europe back on their feet. German economic unity was a salient point of Mr. Byrnes's Stuttgart speech. But economic unity, even if it can be achieved in the face of present East-West tension, is merely the first requirement of any program of recovery. The large question remains whether the American representatives possess sufficient awareness of the trend of European development to accept the idea of a planned economy or whether they are firmly committed to the impractical policy of rebuilding German capitalism with American financial aid.

England's position at Moscow will be appreciably weakened by its inability to accept any heavy Continental commitments. And this is a pity. For despite the heritage of Churchillian foreign policy that Mr. Bevin has guarded so thriftily, England remains the one European nation that can exert a genuinely democratic-socialist influence. As Fritz Sternberg showed in his article several weeks ago, the future stability of Germany depends upon economic planning supported by those classes with the greatest stake in political freedom and the least interest in the revival of German nationalism. It is perhaps too much to expect that the representatives of the leading capitalist power will be convinced of the necessity of a democratic-socialist solution for Germany. But it is unfortunately safe to predict that if the United States proceeds with its plans to restore the big German cartels, it will polarize a political struggle between extremes that will invite the resurrection of Nazism and lay the basis for open conflict between East and West.

Nazi Plots and French Plans

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Paris, February 21

ALTHOUGH the gravity of the German problem is generally recognized in the United States, one must visit Europe to grasp its full import. Perhaps the best window into Germany is France. I know some of my American friends will dispute this statement; they will argue that memories of two invasions within the last thirty years make Frenchmen incapable of objective thinking where Germany is concerned. Actually these memories have made the French more critical and alert. France realizes it no longer has a military machine like the army of 1914 to defend its frontiers. Nor can it rely on a system of alliances. Foreign Minister Bidault, Léon Blum, Edouard Herriot, Jacques Duclos—men of divergent political beliefs—are agreed that while in the event of another war mutual-defense pacts would bring the United States and Britain to the aid of France more quickly than in the past, their country could not survive the shock of the first assault launched by a powerful, rearméd Reich.

Consequently, France's only guaranties of security are, on the one hand, a foreign policy that will not breed a new spirit of revenge among the Germans and, on the other, a peace treaty that will prevent Germany from ever arming again. Other nations—Britain, Russia, the United States—can perhaps afford the luxury of a few mistakes in their German policy. Not France. Another political misstep with regard to Germany would spell the disappearance of France as a nation. For all these reasons the French point of view deserves special consideration.

With the Moscow conference only a few weeks off, Paris is profoundly disturbed by the continuing disagreement among the Big Three over the broad outlines of the German treaty. Three very different conceptions—four, including the French—will be advanced in the Soviet capital. Russia wants a politically and economically unified Germany. America and Britain, each for reasons of its own, want a federal state combining the main features of the Bismarck regime and the Weimar Republic, with a central parliament elected by universal suffrage. France inclines toward the creation of a loose federation of autonomous states such as existed before Bismarck. Even in Paris, however, the French plan has evoked no real enthusiasm. A thorough study of Germany's political evolution in the past hundred years and of developments in the two years since the war's end has convinced leading authorities that a German federalism more or less artificially resuscitated offers no lasting guaranty of safety; in their view, the only way to assure the inviolability of the French border is to keep a strong grip on the region from which the German militarists have after each defeat obtained the iron and steel and coal to forge new weapons of revenge. The region in question is Westphalia-Rhineland, and its nerve center is the Ruhr. Will Germany be allowed to rebuild there an industrial plant which can be converted on short notice to war production? That is the crux of the problem.

The French are particularly concerned about the intentions of Great Britain in this respect. The British dilemma, as they see it, is to surmount an incredibly difficult internal situation, dramatized by the present fuel shortage, and to maintain a certain balance of power vis-à-vis Russia. Will Britain permit the restoration of a western Germany governed by nationalists—whether their official label be Social Democrat, Christian Democrat, or Communist—and linked to the Anglo-American economy in such a way as to give the two Western powers exclusive control over the resources of the Ruhr?

INTERNATIONALIZATION OF THE RUHR

The French must find a solution for their own dilemma. A few days ago I talked with Solomon Grumbach, chairman of the Foreign Affairs Commission of the Council of the Republic, which has replaced the old Senate. Since the liberation he has held posts as chairman of the Foreign Affairs Commission of the National Assembly and chairman of the Parliamentary Investigating Committee in the French zone; his knowledge of German affairs is unequalled in France. Grumbach tersely outlined the solution he favors: "Internationalization, not annexation. Expropriation of the mines. Internationalization of the Ruhr under United Nations control, with equal participation by all countries, including Russia. In that way no one will feel that the industrial riches of the Ruhr are going to be used to further an absurd policy of bloc building." However, Grumbach's solution had one proviso: dissension among the four occupying powers must disappear. He saw this as the key to the entire problem.

Unfortunately, dispatches from Berlin seem to indicate that relations among the representatives of the Big Four have become more strained in recent weeks. For a short time after the encouraging session of the United Nations Assembly, relations took a turn toward unusual cordiality; the meetings of the Kommandatura were especially amicable, and the presiding officer, Soviet General Kotikov, was a popular host in Allied circles. But the moment the conference of Foreign Ministers' deputies in London began to discuss the German treaty a perceptible coolness set in again. I do not think this fact should be unduly stressed; it may simply be another expression of habitual Soviet reserve on the eve of an important conference.

As to the proposals the Russians are likely to make at the Moscow conference, little is known at present. Certainly they will not yield on the question of the eastern frontier; if, as is rumored, the American delegation comes with a demand for revision of the Oder-Neisse line, French diplomatic circles believe that the success of the conference may be threatened. On the other hand, it is thought that a compromise can be reached on the question of the political regime for Germany without either the Russians or the British having to abandon completely their point of view. In any case the Soviets appear disposed toward flexibility on economic issues. They have already indicated willingness to accept an increase in the industrial potential fixed in March, 1946, especially so far as steel output is concerned, and the elimination of economic barriers between the zones.

MOSCOW INSISTS ON DENAZIFICATION

On the issue of denazification, however, the Russians will remain adamant, and here they will be strongly supported by the French. Anglo-American circles have given a very superficial interpretation of Soviet objectives in Germany by saying that Russia is primarily interested in obtaining large reparations in order to repair some of the damage it suffered in the war. But denazification is perhaps the cornerstone of Moscow's policy; recent German developments cannot but have intensified its fears and its determination to extirpate the last remnant of Nazism.

Nation readers will recall an article I wrote last summer during a brief stop-over in Berlin en route from Moscow to Paris, and the protest it drew from James Warburg, who felt that my description of Nazi organization and conspiracy in the American and British zones was highly exaggerated. In my reply I quoted a former German trade-union official, a Social Democrat, who at the time was serving as adviser to the Western occupation powers and had a remarkably extensive knowledge of conditions in the western zones. The other day I ran into him by chance at the subway entrance of the Place de l'Opéra; he had just returned from Germany and was leaving almost immediately for London. I canceled all my appointments and spent several hours with him. "The situation," he told me, "is very much worse than it was when we last met. Reaction is moving ahead more rapidly than anyone ever dreamed it could. I knew that sooner or later we would be confronted by an attempt at a Nazi revival, but I never suspected the nationalist movement would reappear so quickly and on such a big scale. On the one hand, international capitalism is helping German heavy industry to rebuild; on the other, the Catholic church now dominates the political situation in the American zone. The working class is powerless through lack of trained leaders. I myself would like to see the Social Democrats assume the leadership rather than the Socialist Unity Party, that artificial hybrid sponsored by the Russians. But while the Social Democrats are gaining numerical strength, their political orientation is disastrous. You will recall how favorably I spoke about Schumacher last year. Well, since that time he has fallen more and more under the influence of violent nationalists who are exploiting his reputation as 'martyr of Dachau' in their propaganda against the occupation powers."

As a matter of fact, I had already read Schumacher's last two speeches, one delivered in Munich and the other in Berlin. Their tone seemed to me to be considerably more aggressive than that of earlier pronouncements, and I wondered whether Schumacher's recent visit to London on the invitation of the Labor Party had not gone to his head. The Socialist leader has hit on one of those simple slogans which have unfailing appeal for a German audience: "Total victory implies total responsibility." Daily he is becoming more exigent in his demands on the Allies, and the once almost mystical voice of the man who was given the honor of inaugurating—as a prisoner, of course—Germany's worst concentration camp has now acquired a marked accent of nationalist belligerence. The point of departure for any anti-fascist movement ought logically to have been recognition of Nazi Germany's war guilt; instead Schumacher has chosen to launch a campaign of criticism of Allied policy. Each successive speech reveals more clearly his main line of attack: all the nations must recognize their equal share of responsibility for the war; consequently, the peace must be reestablished by mutual sacrifices, with Germany contributing no more or less than the others.

RESURGENCE OF GERMAN NATIONALISM

Other German leaders have been quick to follow Schumacher's lead. In his last message Conrad Adenauer, chairman of the Christian Democratic Party in the British zone, warned: "No German Catholic politician will sign his name to a peace treaty that recognizes the Oder-Neisse line as a boundary." And the German press is gradually beginning to dust off the old editorials about the Schuldfrage—the lie of German culpability—which helped create a favorable climate for Hitler's Nazi Party. The Allied Military Government had to choose between two evils—to allow open criticism of the occupying powers or to put up with clandestine propaganda aimed at exploiting Allied rivalries. It chose the former and lifted the censorship. The German papers promptly showed their true colors. A typical example of their attitude is to be found in an editorial announcing the appearance of the newest Berlin paper, Berlin am Mittag: "We belong to no sector, no zone, and no sect. We are not subject to influence from any quarter. We do not believe that Germans who wear foreign uniforms are the best guides for a struggling German press. The policy of the occupation powers, individually and collectively, is far from being infallible. Heaven alone knows how far." Already a note of anti-Semitism has crept into the press. Indeed, anti-Semitism is more alive in Germany than ever before since the Nazi collapse. The few Jews who hold posts in the left parties, in the theater, or in artistic groups are considered by the average German as privileged characters protected by the occupation laws.

These varied manifestations of chauvinism would by themselves be insufficient justification for the anxiety the French are showing about trends across the Rhine. Hostility toward the occupation authorities was to be expected. This winter the Germans are living under horrible physical conditions. Whole cities still lie in ruins. With sanitation facilities practically non-existent, epidemics are likely to sweep the country at any moment and spread to the rest of Europe. At best military occupation is no school for democracy. Military occupation plus hunger plus cold cannot promote even an atmosphere of reconciliation.

No, the crucial problem is not the general xenophobia of the Germans. It is the rapid resurgence of Nazi feeling and organization. Obviously the Nazis have found their best weapon in the widespread misery of the people. However, many Frenchmen believe, and I share their view, that even if material conditions in Germany had been different and the Allies prepared to devote all their energies to the reconstruction and welfare of the country, the revival of the Nazi spirit, which expresses in extreme form the age-old German drive toward domination and aggression, would have taken place just the same.

During the months of December and January military intelligence in the various zones rounded up several hundred young Germans who were reestablishing contact between existent Nazi groups and setting up new groups. The youth, who should have been subjected to the most vigilant surveillance, have enjoyed the fullest liberty to plot. Hoping to win them over, all German parties including the Communists have insistently demanded a wholesale amnesty for the Hitler Youth, on the ground that the élite of the Fourth Reich must of necessity come from their ranks. This has encouraged the Nazis to make more and more use of the young people in their work. All of the boys who were arrested had formerly been members of the S. S. or the Hitler Youth; when apprehended they were carrying guns and knives and secret codes. Despite their extreme youth, many of them were employed as laborers in key factories and military posts. An investigation of these factories, including the important Borsig, Siemens, and Schücker plants, revealed that contrary to Allied regulations the boys were working overtime, not to increase authorized production and speed reconstruction but to make parts for firearms and machine-guns which were being distributed clandestinely throughout Germany. In the course of the investigation a discovery was made that should be of special interest to the United Nations and will, I hope, supply the final evidence—if any were needed—of Franco's past and present complicity in the Nazi plot: funds for the new organization are deposited abroad, principally in Spain and Perón's Argentina.

I could cite dozens of other incidents which point to the growing strength of the Nazis. Just the other day a band of young men, who had apparently made their way from southern Germany to Berlin via the underground, assembled in close formation near the headquarters of the British Military Government and marched across the Reichskanzlerplatz—formerly the Adolf Hitler Platz—singing a familiar Nazi anthem. After which they dispersed quickly and lost themselves in the crowd. Perhaps the real significance of this story lies in the fact that not a single spectator protested against the demonstration.

ACTIVITIES OF THE NAZI UNDERGROUND

Latest studies by Allied military intelligence show that at least three well-developed underground organizations are already operating under the leadership of a group of former Nazi officials and army officers. One group is estimated to have a membership of 15,000. Its activities have been directed at sabotaging Allied lines of communication, including railroads. The second organization, active mainly in the British zone, specializes in sabotaging production in the factories. The third group, which is made up in part of railroad workers and river-traffic employees, has as its objective to slow up coal exports. Aside from these specific assignments, the Nazi movement has set three goals: (1) to sabotage denazification and thus assure the continuance in public office of men who merit the confidence of the movement; (2) to spy on German officials in public and private and exercise continual pressure on them by means of threats of reprisal; lest these threats be taken lightly, the Nazis have even carried out a few summary executions of Germans found guilty of "collaboration" with the occupation authorities; (3) to sabotage the industrial and agricultural administrations, now supervised by the Allies, so that when control reverts to the Germans, their harried directors will be ready to assign key administrative posts to Nazis.

The Nazis are particularly at ease in the American zone. The denazification order has never been applied effectively; finding the job irksome, the Americans turned it over to the Germans themselves. As a result, of 600,000 Nazis screened in the American zone by the end of 1946, less than two dozen received heavy sentences; 85 per cent got off with no punishment at all. In my article of a year ago I said that the Nazis were most adept at fooling the Americans. Now one of the best-informed American correspondents has made the same charge. Ten days ago in a dispatch from Frankfurt to the Paris edition of the Herald Tribune William Attwood wrote: "In the smaller towns incompetent officers with no knowledge of this country, its language, or psychology, whose German mistresses guide their decisions and whose German interpreters carry them out, are the everyday symbols of American democracy." Little wonder that the French press commented as follows: "When responsible American leaders publicly express their admiration for German strivings toward democracy, they are mocking their audience and their own noble words. Democracy in the American zone means letting the Nazis do as they please."

In recent weeks several British and American spokesmen have expressed a desire for cooperation with Russia. But speeches will not suffice at the Moscow conference. There the Western representatives will have to answer specific questions: Will the Rhineland-Westphalia industry be controlled by the Big Four in the interest of peace and the reconstruction of Europe, or by the Big Two of the West in the interest of bloc-building which will benefit only aggressive German nationalism? Will denazification continue to be measured by the columns of meaningless figures published each time there is criticism of present Allied policy toward Germany, or will it be carried through vigorously in accordance with a plan drawn up by all the occupying powers? The conferees will be judged by their answers to these questions. France's answers, as far as I have been able to establish them, will be clear and unequivocal.

A Faith to Live By

II. INSTITUTIONS AND MEN

BY CORD MEYER, JR.

FOR one who cannot accept the dogmas of any established creed or authoritarian party it is no easy thing to define the faith by which one lives, even to oneself. It is impossible to recommend it to others. All that can be done is to identify those often unconscious assumptions which save one from despair or from a life spent in satisfying the desire for wealth and power.

Yet in a time like our own, with its intimations of disaster, the need for articulation of the underlying beliefs that determine conduct is urgent. A process of change too rapid to calculate calls in question the accepted standards of behavior. The living generation of men will never know the luxury of being able to lead a placid and conventional existence. Each man will have to search deep for the convictions to sustain him in a violent and uncertain future.

The simple optimism that has been characteristic of America will not suffice. The naive identification of human progress with advances in scientific ingenuity has been compromised by two world wars and growing terror at the prospect of a third. Not even the most superficial observer can maintain that the discovery of atomic energy is an unmixed blessing. It is becoming undeniably apparent that the power over nature achieved by science is also power over men, and that such power can be used for good or evil. The faith in material progress that has industrialized a continent reveals its immaturity, as the peace and happiness it was to assure seems ever more remote among the wreckage of recurring economic depressions and wars of rising ferocity.

Two broad explanations of what has happened now compete for acceptance. They find expression in militant faiths, each with its consistent body of doctrine, its organization, and its demand for the unquestioning obedience of the faithful. One school of thought maintains that the cause of the world's ills lies in the institutional structure of modern society. Inherited forms of economic and governmental organization are seen to be inadequate for the fulfilment of new needs. Attempts to perpetuate anachronistic property rights or to preserve the prerogatives of absolute national sovereignty are asserted to be at the root of all our misfortunes. Like prison walls, these institutions are held to degrade and distort the unfortunate human beings that are compelled to live within them. Socialists and Communists point out that with the growth of large industry private ownership of the means of production has reduced the majority to dependence on an avaricious minority and created explosive tensions between the working and owning classes that can only be resolved by production for use instead of for profit. The supporters of world government assert that the complete independence of the nation-state in an interdependent world can only be maintained at the price of ever more frequent and devastating wars, in which the bewildered citizens are ordered to fight in defense of the pitiless abstraction that is national sovereignty.

CORD MEYER, Jr., a veteran of World War II, is a junior fellow of Harvard University. He is a director of Americans United for World Government.

Whatever the particular institution that is criticized, this point of view assumes that it is not human nature but the social environment that is at fault. The faith exists that the defects in the environment can be correctly identified and remedied by determined political action. The obstacles that stand between men and their achievement of happiness are said to be their own ignorance and apathy and the opposition of those few who benefit from the established order. It remains only to educate and lead the many and to overthrow the parasitic few in order to create the good society. Of those who believe in this salvation through reason and social action, there are some so convinced of their own infallibility that they are willing to kill and betray millions in the certainty that the golden future will redeem their crimes.

In contrast to this active faith is the religious point of view. It attributes the disasters of the present time to a lack of moral restraint resulting from a loss of religious belief. The only kind of reform considered lasting is reform from within. There is a distrust of mechanistic solutions and a conviction that not by political action but by a rebirth of the spirit of charity and love can mankind save itself from the fate to which it seems doomed by its selfish passions. To this believer no revolutionary change in governments or economics can found the good society. It can only be built, slowly if at all, on a growing number of devoted individuals bound together by a common respect for the human personality based on their belief in the Fatherhood of God. The individual is held to be morally responsible for his actions, and humble contrition rather than an arrogant assertion of his infallibility can alone relieve his guilt. Finally, there is in this religious attitude a tendency to be resigned to the inevitable evils which are believed to flow from the inherent sinfulness of man and to transfer all hope for a better life from this world to another beyond death.

For one who cannot accept completely either the religious or the revolutionary attitude there are aspects of both that provide the basis for a modest faith and a sober hope. To me it seems that the revolutionist, the political reformer, forgets that his indignation at the prevailing disorder and injustice which is his motive for action has its origins in a religious ideal. The Marxian dialectic never told us why anyone should risk death to bring the inevitable to pass. Whenever revolutionary action is genuine and more than a way to personal power, it is motivated by a sympathy for human beings that has its roots in the teachings of the great religious leaders and not in logical reasoning.

The revolutionary is certainly naive when he mistakes the institutional change he advocates for a guaranty of lasting human happiness. He can only create the conditions that make possible a happier way of life. Whether that opportunity is realized depends on the quality of the men involved. If they are sufficiently honest and disinterested, much may be accomplished. If they are not, there is ample evidence that a great deal of blood can be spilled to overturn one form of tyranny only to establish another. The Communist is perhaps the most unrealistically utopian of all reformers in his conviction that ownership of the means of production by the workers will in itself bring about a new era of harmony among men. It is this fanatical conviction that leads him into the most dangerous of all illusions—the belief that he is justified in using any means to achieve his end. The means used inevitably modify and compromise the end.

Yet the limitations of what can be accomplished by institutional change do not mean that it is unnecessary or that no improvement is possible. In his concern for the integrity of the individual the moralist neglects the reality that violence and oppression are needlessly exaggerated by conditions that intelligent action can modify. The failure to adapt ancient laws to the continuous growth of society has created forces that play like idiot tyrants with our lives. It is not necessary to wait for a moral regeneration of mankind in order to right some of these wrongs. Millions of men, for example, have not destroyed one another in battle simply because they were motivated by greed or a lust for power. They were set against one another by the uncontrollable conflicts created by the extravagant claims of their governments to absolute independence; and if they can come to see this fact, there is hope that killing may become a crime rather than a duty.

When avoidable evils are not perceived by the critical intelligence, there is a tendency to believe men more depraved than they actually are and to ascribe to deliberate intention what is in reality the pitiable result of remediable ignorance. In times of sudden transition like our own, when the waves of change smash with rising fury against the stubborn restraint of traditional patterns, the temptation is to resign oneself to the prevailing chaos. There is comfort in a retreat from the tragic stage and consolation for ruined hopes in the prospect of another life.

Such resignation is not justified. Human nature is admittedly weak and inadequate, and the mature man will recognize that no sudden and spectacular improvement in the ways of the world is possible. Yet men are capable of a better existence than they now lead. To be among those who help them find it is the task not only of the political reformer but of the Christian believer. The test of a belief is its expression in action, and those who are moved by sympathy and respect for their fellow-men have no right to be content with a personal integrity preserved by a fictitious retreat from the struggle. In the words of Silone, "He is saved who overcomes his individual egoism, family egoism, caste egoism, does not shut himself in a cloister or build himself an ivory tower, or make a cleavage between his way of acting and his way of thinking. He is saved who frees his own spirit from the idea of resignation to the existing disorder."

The difficulty is to preserve faith without illusion. One does not have to believe in continuous and inevitable progress in order to remain convinced of the unrealized possibilities of the human spirit. It may be that in our lifetime modern society will be utterly destroyed in an atomic war. But, as in the past, new civilizations will rise on the ruins of the old, and those that will build them will be led by the indestructible vision of what men are capable of becoming in contrast to what they are.

Farewell to New York

BY KAY BOYLE

EVER since the beginning I have kept clear of Longchamps in whatever street it lay, so that when the Spaniard—to whom I shall never cease paying homage—said it would be simpler to meet at the one which lay halfway between our two directions, I believed I could not bring myself to go. But I knew it could never be entirely Longchamps as long as the Spaniard, who carried his pride and his history with him, was in the place; so at six o'clock I crossed with the green light at the corner. There was winter darkness on the avenue outside, but as soon as you went through the revolving doors the gilt and glitter leaped to meet you like the blaze of a jewelry counter in a ten-cent store. Just inside stood the imitation fruit-and-vegetable cart trying to give the genteel commotion the air of a musical-comedy market square—with the bounty and gaiety that should entail—and not succeeding. The Spaniard was waiting on the other side of the vegetable wagon, and in spite of the crowd he found a table nearly at once, and the waiter who mourned on the outskirts was stricken with an even deeper grief that we had pushed our way far into the corner to it and sat down.

"We would like tea with lemon, and some pastry," the Spaniard said. It was clear right away that we asked for something far too simple. It would be too easy, too agreeable a thing to bring tea and pastry at this time of day. This time next week, I believe the Spaniard went on saying, you will be in France. I have some letters to friends for you in my pocket—poets, writers, political exiles, he said. I wish I could be with you, but tell them I will be there certainly by spring. In the spring, he said, as if the intentions of men would change with the season, the last act will be played in Spain, and the ending will be a good one.

"You can't just order pastry," said the waiter who stood beside the table. He was young, but his voice was as testy as that of an old woman. "You have to look at the menu and order the kind of cake you want."

"Stop," said the Spaniard gently, for I had already got up from my chair in my impatience. He laid one hand on my arm and drew me down into my seat again, and he looked up into the waiter's face. "Young man, be polite. Let us be polite to each other," he said.

The instant the words were spoken the waiter's face altered. In the short time he had been in this brilliant palace he had forgotten so much, he had forgotten his entire youth perhaps, and the Spaniard's words recalled his memories to him.

"Yes, of course, you are right," the waiter said. He stood looking in amazement and happiness at the Spaniard. He had absolutely forgotten that people had ever spoken to each other that way.

But the Spaniard, being accustomed to saying the words which recalled men to themselves, had forgotten the waiter almost at once, and now he was thinking of France again.

"This time next week in France," said the Spaniard, "remember the French know better than any other nation of men that in political exiles there exists a special devotion. An artist suffers guilt and loneliness when he is alienated from his country, but the artist has a spiritual terrain of silence which is native to him, and which he can turn to in any country where he is. But if a political man no longer stands on his own country's soil, he is maimed and mute, and he must be a great believer in a great faith in order to survive."

The waiter, with exceptional gentleness, put the tea and the cake down before us, and we began to eat at once, and while we ate, the Spaniard told me the story of the exiles in Paris who went to have their identity photographs taken in the rue du Palais.

"There is a little photograph shop (where they do it there," he said. "They have a sign hanging out saying:

KAY BOYLE is the author of many novels and short stories. "Crazy Hunter," "Primer for Combat," and "Avalanche" are some of her recent books.

'Six minutes to wait and thirty francs to pay.' So you go in through a contraption like a subway stile, one foreigner after another, an endless string of outcasts paying thirty francs each as they go. It was a cold December day this time that we went, a dozen or so of us who had survived Franco and Vichy, and so still had a name and an identity. But some of us didn't have overcoats, and we walked with our jacket collars turned up around our ears, and our hands in our pockets, knocking our feet together to keep the blood from stopping in the cold.

Drawing by Wilson

Have some pastry," said the Spaniard quickly. "My God, I can feel the cold now. Have some tea. Even after two years I can feel the cold." So they filed into the photograph place, he went on saying, and one by one, like a chain-gang passing, they paid their money down on the counter and passed into the booths beyond. "There was our group of Spaniards, and there were men from other countries, too," he said. "Czechs, Poles, students who might have been Hungarians once, and men with dark skins from the colonies. Exiles," he said, "eternally seeking to persuade themselves and others by means of a likeness reproduced on paper that they still had the right to a name and a physiognomy."

Into the curtained booths they passed, one after another, and fixed their eyes on the spot the woman indicated, and faced the mirrors and the glare. And once the invisible camera had opened and closed, they moved again, one by one, in single file, their shoulders hunched, their hands thrust in their pockets for warmth, to wait the six minutes huddled against the wall.

"And then the strange thing happened," the Spaniard said. "The finished photographs would come out of a slot in the photographic machine, strip after strip, and a girl with scissors in her hand would pick them up and glance through the crowd for the face as she cut them quickly. And the man to whom they belonged would push forward through the others, and take his photographs still damp and limp in his hand, and look at them curiously and uneasily, with a little display of the vanity he had left, and go out into the cold again. And then, suddenly a strip of photographs came out which belonged to no one in the place," said the Spaniard. He took a great swallow of his tea. "The girl with the scissors waved the little handful of photographs in the air, and no one went forward to claim them. 'He must be here. Where is he?' she said, 'Let him come through to get them. This is holding everybody up.' She raised the photographs up high so that we all could see him, a thin, tired-looking young man with long black hair that he hadn't had the time or money to get cut, with a foulard knotted around his neck. He was certainly not in the photograph shop with us. None of us had seen him there. And then one of the Spaniards standing beside me in the crowd made a queer sound in his throat, and he called out: 'I knew him. We came from the same town, we went to school together. He was killed in Durango in 1936.' There was silence in the place," said the Spaniard, "and then the girl said, 'Are you trying to make a fool out of me?' But she did not say any more, and she put the photographs of the man who wasn't there aside. Then she picked up the next strip, and clipped it, and the one after that, and the men they belonged to pushed their way through the crowd and got them, and went out the door. But with the third strip the same thing happened—there was the photograph of a young man who wasn't in the room with us. He had a beard, and a scar down one side of his face, and another of the Spaniards called out, 'That's Amaro. That's my brother. He was shot in Guernica.' The girl did not say anything that time because the tears were running down his cheeks," said the Spaniard. "But the next strip, and the strip after that, it was just the same, and at the sight of the unclaimed photographs the voices would call out from the crowd in the shop, 'That's José Casals. I was with him in Madrid before they got him.' Or, 'That is Ramón Rodriquez. They killed him at Almeria.' They were there," said the Spaniard, "in spite of death. When we go out now, with our bellies full, we will find them in the dark, for they are always there."

The Spaniard gave me the letters he had written to his friends, and we went out, and we said goodbye at the top of the subway steps in the rain. "Write," he said. And his eyes were sad and bright in the city darkness.

So I write you now, Spaniard, that if I feel guilt it is not because I am a writer alienated from the soil of my own country for a little, but because there are writers and poets to whom the invitation to speak was given, a long time ago, and they made their answers.

"You are all mad," wrote Ezra Pound in 1937. "Spain is an emotional luxury to a gang of sap-headed dilettantes." "If I were a Spaniard I should be fighting for Franco," wrote Evelyn Waugh in the same year. "As an Englishman I am not in the predicament of choosing between two evils, I am not a fascist nor shall I become one unless it were the only alternative to Marxism." And T. S. Eliot opened the door a little way and whispered: "While I am naturally sympathetic, I still feel convinced that it is best that at least a few men of letters should remain isolated, and take no part in these collective activities." *

* "Author Take Sides," edited by Nancy Cunard, Left Review, London, 1937.

Busting the Aluminum Trust

BY BRYANT PUTNEY

Washington, February 27

AT A time when big business is rapidly getting bigger, it is pleasant to report that the most powerful monopoly of all is on the skids. Within the last twelve months competition has come to the aluminum industry; new producers are challenging the absolute rule exercised for half a century by the Aluminum Company of America. If the initial successes of the government's campaign against the aluminum monopoly are followed by early and vigorous action in the courts, the Truman Administration can win its biggest anti-trust victory. And an industry already four times as large as it was before the war can look forward to still greater expansion in the years ahead.

What has happened in the aluminum industry in the last few months provides dramatic evidence that the de-monopolizing process is an effective way of putting more men to work, creating new industrial markets, stimulating mass consumption—in short, that it pays dividends to the entire country in the form of higher living standards. "The preliminary results of the aluminum program," the Senate Small Business Committee pointed out a few weeks ago, "make an unanswerable argument for a strong national campaign against monopoly and the concentration of economic power."

When the Germans marched into Poland, the fifty-one-year-old aluminum industry was still small. With Alcoa the sole domestic producer of the primary metal, output amounted to less than 1 per cent of the country's steel production. Although potentially the most abundant metal on earth, aluminum was the principal raw material for only a few products—notably airplanes and cooking utensils. Its limited use at that time could be explained by the experience of the automobile industry. The automobile makers had cut the amount of aluminum in the average car from around seventy-five pounds in 1915 to eight pounds in 1939. They would have preferred to use more of a metal weighing only a third as much as steel, but when Alcoa arbitrarily raised its price from 19 cents a pound to 33 cents in 1915, they discovered the danger of relying on a single source of supply and turned to other materials. Alcoa's monopolistic position, besides penalizing the car-buying public, destroyed a market which would have absorbed the entire output of the aluminum industry in 1939.

War demands necessitated a larger expansion of aluminum capacity than of any other major industrial metal. Although Alcoa resisted expansion for many months, with incalculable harm to the war effort, it finally took advantage of extremely favorable amortization laws and tripled its plant. Meanwhile the government had spent $670,000,000 to build facilities which dwarfed Alcoa's investment and brought total capacity to seven times its pre-war size—various types of fabricating facilities were expanded as much as forty-five times. When the war ended, the government owned over half the industry's capacity, most of its plants having been designed, built, and operated by Alcoa.

In opposing expansion in 1940-41 Alcoa officials contended that war-built plants would stand idle in peace time for lack of markets. But before the Missouri entered Tokyo harbor, the company was seeking to extend its leases on some of the most desirable government plants and thus freeze out post-war competitors. A few months earlier—in March, 1945—a federal court of final appeal had handed down a long-awaited decision holding Alcoa to be an illegal monopoly in the production of aluminum ingot. (The court postponed issuance of a dissolution order, however, until the effects of the government's plant-disposal program on the competitive situation should become known.) Backed by this decision, the government canceled Alcoa's leases in August, 1945, and put the surplus plants on the auction block.

An epic struggle followed—with Alcoa battling desperately to preserve its dominance, and the government forces, led by Surplus Property Administrator Symington, determined to break the company's stranglehold. The fight revolved around the disposition of the huge government plant at Hurricane Creek, Arkansas. Using processes patented by Alcoa, this plant crushed low-grade Arkansas bauxite into alumina—the powder from which the pure metal is made—at costs low enough to compete with the alumina produced by Alcoa in its own plants from high-grade ore. By preventing the Reynolds Metals Company from leasing the plant Alcoa hoped to cut off the supplies needed to operate government ingot plants and thus block the entire disposal program. Alcoa, of course, flatly refused to release its patents unless the government agreed either to dismiss the anti-trust suit and end the threat of dissolution or to allow the company to take over some of the surplus plants.

The struggle continued for many weeks. Finally Symington called Alcoa's hand. In a letter to Senator O'Mahoney dated January 6, 1946, with copies to the press, he accused the company of "using its patents to obstruct the Reynolds transaction." He added, "No disposal of any plants to competitors will be possible unless Alcoa changes its attitude, or unless the courts, acting under the Sherman act, reorganize Alcoa so that its monopolistic power is broken." Four days later Alcoa threw in its cards, offering to grant royalty-free licenses on the strategic patents. (But because Alcoa still is holding out for the right to use any patent improvements developed by other companies, the license agreements have not yet actually been signed.)

BRYANT PUTNEY, a Washington writer, was formerly connected with Editorial Research Reports.

With the deadlock broken, Reynolds at once signed a lease on Hurricane Creek, bought or leased seven ingot and fabricating plants—Reynolds has fabricated aluminum for many years—and began to produce the primary metal on a small scale in 1941. Henry Kaiser's Permanente Metals Corporation also entered the field, leasing the remaining government alumina plant, at Baton Rouge, Louisiana, and taking over two ingot plants and a rolling mill in the state of Washington. Six fabricating plants were disposed of to smaller companies, and Alcoa was permitted to buy another. By the end of 1946 Reynolds and Kaiser had taken over all of the government's primary aluminum facilities—except several uneconomical plants—and all surplus sheet mills; together they controlled slightly over half the industry's facilities for producing raw aluminum.

In the space of a few months the beginnings of competition within the industry have brought about remarkable changes in the market outlook. Because there are three primary producers instead of one—and four times as much metal as before the war—aluminum is finding hundreds of new uses. It is going into freight cars, shingles, deep-freeze units, canoes, garage doors, and curling irons, to name only a few. Before the war the country had produced a total of 23,000 aluminum window frames, but one Arizona company, buying its metal from Reynolds's Phoenix plant, now turns out as many every three days. The amount of aluminum currently going into housing materials alone is larger than our total annual output in pre-war years. With mills running full blast, producers are struggling to stay abreast of orders; delivery on some items takes a year.

Although rumors persist that a price rise is imminent, Alcoa has given no sign of returning to its pre-war policy of charging what it believed the traffic ought to bear. So far, the threat of dissolution and the changed conditions within the industry have been sufficient to prevent aluminum prices from skyrocketing like those of other metals. (During the First World War, when imports were cut off and demand soared, Alcoa brazenly raised its price from 19 to 38 cents a pound; between 1923 and 1940, with costs never exceeding 11½ cents, the company sold its product at prices ranging from 19 to 29 cents.) At present pig aluminum is still selling at the 1942 price of 14 cents—the lowest in history—and because of high-volume output the producers are making good profits. The favorable price is a stimulus to new uses, and aluminum is displacing steel, copper, and other expensive metals in a wide variety of products.

If genuine competition develops, further tremendous expansion is altogether probable within a few years. The automobile industry is again beginning to turn to aluminum, particularly for trucks and buses. Once the manufacturers are convinced that they no longer need to dance to Alcoa's tune, they will step up their demands enormously. Alcoa's engineers estimate that 500 pounds of aluminum can be advantageously used in a medium-sized passenger car—for doors, wheels, hood, and numerous engine parts—without materially changing designs or production machinery. At that rate of consumption twice the present aluminum output would be needed for the automobile industry alone.

The latent demand of the railroad industry has hardly begun to be felt. Use of aluminum is now limited mainly to passenger-car bodies on a few streamliners. But an aluminum hopper car can carry six and one-half more tons of coal than a steel car—and the sulphur in coal will not corrode aluminum as it does steel. An aluminum box car can be loaded with five to ten extra tons of freight. Ten such cars recently delivered to the Chicago and Alton were so efficient that they were put to use as express cars on passenger trains.

Only an acute shortage of metal prevented the navy from building the aluminum destroyer its architects developed in 1941. Alcoa is now erecting a plate mill to supply the wants of an almost untouched market in shipbuilding. Within a few years aluminum bulkheads like those in the Normandie will no longer be exceptional nor will aluminum decks and gangways. Housing likewise offers a vast market. Aluminum already is coming into wide use for roofing, siding, hardware, storm sash, screens, and other items. Construction of all-aluminum industrialized houses like those planned by Fuller, Lincoln, and Consolidated-Vultee will create a still greater demand.

But if the aluminum industry is to realize its almost limitless potentialities, Alcoa's monopoly must be completely smashed. Temporarily at least the company's two chief competitors depend on it for some of their raw materials. Kaiser is counting on Alcoa to supply nearly all of his 1947 bauxite requirements—under a contract that can be canceled on sixty days' notice. Even after they have developed economical and dependable bauxite supplies, Kaiser and Reynolds will be in a precarious competitive position. For Alcoa, besides controlling practically all high-grade domestic bauxite, owns a fleet of ships which can bring in foreign ores at low costs. Its power costs, a crucial factor in ingot production, are lower than those of its new rivals. And if it chooses, Alcoa can call upon its affiliate, the Aluminum Company of Canada, for aid in driving competitors to the wall. Thanks to war-time expansion subsidized by the United States, British, and Australian governments, the Canadian company is now the world's largest raw-aluminum producer, and its costs are so low—less than 7 cents a pound—that the present 3-cent tariff could not prevent it from invading the American market.

Congress could bolster Alcoa's competitors and pave the way for expansion of the industry by carrying out the recent recommendations of the Senate Small Business Committee, which are that the bauxite tariff be lifted; that a special government corporation be created to replace the bungling War Assets Administration in winding up the plant-disposal program; and that the St. Lawrence and other public-power projects be speedily approved, in order to furnish the low-cost energy needed to put a number of ingot plants back into operation and make possible the construction of others. Even in the unlikely event that this aid should be forthcoming, however, the independents would still face formidable obstacles in cutting down Alcoa's lead. Attorney General Clark's advice to Congress a year and a half ago is still sound: "The best answer to the problem is to subdivide the company into efficient but competing units. Only in such a climate will the aluminum industry be able to operate, new and old assured of a fair opportunity to live and thrive."

Before long Alcoa will probably petition for dismissal of the pending anti-trust case. The government should head off this move by asking the court to order the company's dissolution without further delay. The job of de-monopolizing aluminum, now well started, should be finished.

India Comes into Its Own

BY SHIVA RAO

New Delhi, February 24

IN ANALYZING the Indian situation a month ago I pointed out the many uncertain factors in it. In the meantime the Moslem League, ignoring the gesture of the Congress Party, has decided to demand the dissolution of the Constituent Assembly, asserting that its decisions are invalid and illegal. The princes seemed tempted at one stage to follow the Moslem League's example and boycott the Constituent Assembly—a procedure which would have greatly strengthened Churchill's hand—but some important states have adopted the courageous line of negotiating directly with Nehru and his committee concerning their representation. Thus of the four main groups—the Congress Party, the Moslem League, the smallest minorities, and the princes—all except the League and possibly some princes clearly accept the Constituent Assembly.

The Congress leaders could with reason have asked for an immediate break-up of the coalition. Appeasement of the Moslem League could obviously go no farther. The interim government was divided into two hostile sections, and administration was virtually at a standstill. Nehru and eight of his colleagues, including three representatives of minorities outside the Congress, finally told the Viceroy that there was no room in the government for both them and the Moslem League's nominees. The Viceroy communicated with the Labor government, and Attlee announced the results of the discussions in the House of Commons last week.

The Congress Party had raised the point of the propriety of the Moslem League remaining in office while repudiating the Constituent Assembly. The Moslem League had demanded the dissolution of the Constituent SHIVA RAO, correspondent in India for The Nation and the Manchester Guardian, is on the staff of the Hindu of Madras.

Assembly, taking its cue from Churchill and the Tories. Attlee faced neither question positively. Instead, he adopted an entirely new line. He fixed the precise date for the British withdrawal from India as not later than June 19, 1948. And he took the unprecedented step of terminating Lord Wavell's career as Viceroy, explaining that it was only a war-time appointment and that the present juncture was an appropriate one for a change. Lord Mountbatten will relieve Lord Wavell next month and prepare the ground for the final transfer of power next year.

Churchill's intemperate outburst about Wavell's dismissal has only complicated an extremely difficult situation. The Congress leaders' ultimatum to the Viceroy clearly meant that they would resign if the Moslem League stayed in office. Wavell's sympathies ever since he assumed office have been with the Moslem League. The resignation of the Congress from the interim government would inevitably have been followed by its abandoning office in nine provinces out of eleven. Once that occurred, nothing could have prevented the Congress Party from renewing the struggle against the League on a mass scale.

Could Britain have controlled the situation under those circumstances? Attlee and the Cabinet obviously ruled out allowing such a development. What was the alternative? To compel the Moslem League to quit office—logically the correct policy—would have meant the lesser disaster, but disaster it would have been, with the interim government already hard put to administer the country. Attlee's declaration has one supreme merit: it keeps both the Congress Party and the Moslem League functioning inside the government. The spectacular step of dismissing the Viceroy, as Churchill unwisely put it, should not obscure this important point.

Nehru's reaction is significant. He called the declaration "wise" and "courageous," removing "all misconception and suspicion and bringing reality and a certain dynamic quality into the present situation." He renewed the invitation to the Moslem League to give up suspicion and fear and become "partners in this historic undertaking." The moment British rule disappears, declared Nehru, the responsibility for governing India will automatically devolve on the Indian people. Toward Britain he made a generous gesture. Earnestly hoping that the long past with its conflicts and ill-will was over, he looked forward "to a peaceful and cooperative transition and to the establishment of close and friendly relations with the British people for the mutual advantage of both countries and for the advancement of the cause of peace and freedom throughout the world."

Caricature by Seligson
Lord Mountbatten

I asked Nehru yesterday about his plans for the future. He said he would first see whether the Moslem League enters the Constituent Assembly. If it does, Attlee's stipulation that the constitution must be framed by a fully representative Assembly will be satisfied. Britain can then, without further argument, transfer power.

I drew Nehru's attention to the statement of a prominent member of the Moslem League who said he appreciated the friendliness of Nehru's latest appeal but felt that only the recognition of Pakistan would solve the problem. Though Jinnah has not spoken and the League's executive has not yet met to consider Attlee's statement, as it will shortly, the pledge to transfer power by June of next year "to some form of central government for British India as a whole or in some areas to the existing provincial governments" may encourage the League to remain out of the Constituent Assembly. In that case Nehru will recommend to the Assembly that it proceed on a somewhat different basis.

Under the British Cabinet's long-term plan the union center government would control only three subjects—defense, external affairs, and communications—with the finance necessary for administration. If the Constituent Assembly without the League is not fully representative, there is no point in working for a weak center. The Assembly, therefore, while continuing to function, will not feel bound by compromises intended to attract the Moslem League. It will probably frame a constitution conceding the provinces the largest measure of autonomy but at the same time leave to the federal government at the center greater authority than the Labor government has recommended. Such a constitution would be acceptable to at least eight provinces and to a number of states.

What will the Moslem League do? Jinnah will wait for the parliamentary debates on India—as will the Congress leaders. He will await, too, the final outcome of the League's move to defy the Punjab ministry's restrictions on the formation of so-called volunteer corps—really private armies. Successful defiance will mean the League's control of the Punjab. A similar movement has already begun in the adjoining Northwestern Frontier Province, which is separated from Afghanistan by the Khyber Pass. Jinnah doubtless reckons that these efforts may bring all northwestern India from Karachi to Peshawar, including four provinces, under the League. What he has not considered is that the Hindus and Sikhs inhabiting this area will not meekly accept Moslem rule. So far the Punjab has escaped the horrors of large-scale riots like those that took place in Behar and Bengal. There is no guaranty that this immunity will continue if the Moslem League's direct-action campaign proves effective.

For the moment, however, Attlee has averted a major crisis in India by dropping Lord Wavell and fixing the date for British withdrawal. Congress leaders, including Nehru, will give Mountbatten time to formulate plans for that event. They expect him to recede into the background and gradually shed the autocratic powers of the Viceroy. They hope that the interim government will function effectively under Nehru's leadership. At present, owing to internal strains and frictions, grave social and economic problems do not receive the prompt and energetic attention they deserve.

Mountbatten must act quickly and boldly when he replaces Wavell in order to insure what Nehru calls "peaceful and cooperative transition." He must treat Nehru's government as if India were a full-fledged dominion preparing to leave the British Commonwealth next year.

IN ONE EAR

BY LOU FRANKEL

THE Public Affairs Committee is, as most people know, a non-profit, educational organization devoted to providing the "facts" on just about everything in the field of economics and sociology. One of its more effective activities is publishing a series of "Public Affairs Pamphlets," at 10 cents each. And one of the better of these pamphlets (No. 121) is "Radio Is Yours" by Jerome H. Spingarn, formerly an attorney on the staff of the Federal Communications Commission, a man who knows more than a little about radio and who has written on it for The Nation. "Radio Is Yours," to the great pain of commercial broadcasters, proves that radio is no gift from the industry to the public. It says:

The public spent $25 for receiving equipment to every $1 which the broadcasters spent for transmitting equipment. The listeners' upkeep bill, too, was larger than the advertiser's. He spent 3 cents a day per receiver to the advertiser's 2 cents.

And if you've been hearing some of those awful spots about "advertising being essential to your job" that have been cluttering the air, or if you've been reading what broadcasters have been saying about the FCC, you'll be interested in this remark made by Herbert Hoover when he was Secretary of Commerce, quoted by Mr. Spingarn:

It is inconceivable that we should allow so great a possibility for service, for news, for entertainment, for education, and for vital commercial purposes to be drowned in advertising chatter.

In thirty-one tightly written pages "Radio Is Yours" gives an excellent review of commercial radio, soap operas, and the famous FCC "Blue Book" of last year. It points out that as far back as 1928 the Federal Radio Commission, which later became the FCC, made it clear that "listeners are given no protection unless it is given to them by this commission."

A lucid account of the discussion of public issues on the radio defines the FCC's responsibility:

Thus the responsibility for managing a station and for observing and enforcing the principles of free speech rests upon the shoulders, not of the government, but of the station licensee. If he fails to give fair play, recourse can be had to the FCC, which makes an over-all review of the station's public service. It cannot order a station to give time to such and such a person or to put such and such a program on the air. It can, however, revoke a license or deny a renewal.

Illuminating paragraphs on the radio lobby describe the political and network pressures applied. Here is an interesting item:

Radio broadcasting is one of the most profitable industries in the country. In 1945 the four major and five regional networks . . . realized a broadcast income of $20,842,506 on an original investment of $14,531,288.

There is information on newspapers and radio, on FM, on the rights of the listener to good programs, on the activities of listeners' groups and radio councils, and there is a fairly detailed account of the operation of the fabulously successful Community Radio Council in Winston-Salem, North Carolina.

Finally there are these important words:

When groups or individuals feel that their local radio stations have failed to live up to their obligations to the public, they have a weapon that few of them realize is at hand. They can ask the FCC to hold a hearing on the station's application for renewal and appear as witnesses. Recently the FCC has held a few of its hearings in the field. If this practice is continued it will serve to encourage greater popular interest in radio administration.

But probably the chief reason why the radio industry dislikes "Radio Is Yours" is that Mr. Spingarn, in a recommended bibliography, lists "The Hucksters."

For copies of "Radio Is Yours" write the Public Affairs Committee, 22 East Thirty-eighth Street, New York 16, New York.

Prelude to Moscow, a special program giving background information about the Moscow conference of the Big Four Foreign Ministers, will be aired by the CBS Documentary Unit on Sunday, March 9, at 1 p.m., E.S.T. This is the unit that last week presented The Eagle's Brood, about juvenile delinquency, and in October dealt with domestic fascism in a program called The Empty Noose.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Where's That Buyers' Market?

AROUND the turn of the year there was a great hullabaloo, particularly in the business and financial press, about the approaching end of inflation. Big headlines were used to play up small price cuts; impressive articles assured us that the mounting tide of production was about to force down the cost of living; post-holiday department-store sales were hailed as evidence of the end of the sellers' market.

Here are a few specimens of price trend-spotting culled from many in my files:

Storm signals are blinking along the price shoals. This could be the beginning of the "readjustment" which people have been talking about.—Business Week, January 4.

That dollar in Mr. Consumer's pocket is about to get stronger and more self-respecting. Pretty soon it will be buying a lot more things than now.—Wall Street Journal, January 16.

There is mounting evidence in the files of the Washington fact-finders that prices generally have passed their peak, or certainly are approaching very close to the top level that may be expected.—Charles Hurd in the New York Times, January 12.

Toward the end of 1946 there was, it is true, a definite setback in food prices and almost sensational breaks in a few luxury items such as diamonds and furs. But simultaneous sharp increases in quotations for many industrial raw materials as well as numerous upward revisions in prices of finished goods made these cheery forecasts seem rather wishful. Very probably they were inspired in part at least by the desire to head off demands for higher wages. Their implied message to the workers was: Be patient, stay on the job, don't insist on more pay, and you will find the purchasing power of your dollars growing.

The workers have been showing a great deal of patience, but the bright hopes of lower living costs that were offered to them are fading. On January 15 the Bureau of Labor Statistics retail food index showed a decline of 1.1 per cent from the December 15, 1946, level. In the last five weeks, however, the trend has been all the other way, and the pressure on the housewife's purse will be still more severe when retail prices fully reflect the new highs established in wholesale markets. Just in the past week, between February 19 and 26, the Journal of Commerce index of thirty sensitive commodities has risen from 274.7 to 282.1, a new high. On November 19, 1946, it was 264.9.

There has been no lack of explanations for many of the price increases. The $30 quotation for hogs in Chicago, which has attracted so much attention, is attributed to the reduced pig crop in the spring of 1936. A box-car shortage and increased government buying for relief, because of deteriorating food conditions in Europe, are held responsible for the rise in wheat. Cold weather in the Midwest is blamed for the sharp rebound in butter prices, frosts in Florida for the recovery in citrus juices and tomatoes. However, "commodity analysts" quoted by the Journal of Commerce declare that although special reasons can be cited for recent price increases of individual commodities, "the explosive nature of the current burst in commodity prices can hardly be attributed to these factors alone." We must, they suggest, seek an explanation in "psychological factors." Toward the end of last year the air was filled with talk of an early recession, with the result that buyers became more cautious. Weeks passed, and no confirmatory evidence of a business setback appeared. Retail sales, railroad traffic, employment, and production, all stayed at high levels, and as a result business sentiment began to swing violently the other way.

The revival of inflationary psychology is particularly well illustrated in the textile field, where output is at record height, margins between costs and selling prices unusually wide, and earnings spectacular. With the growing availability of hard goods there was every reason to suppose that consumer appetites for soft goods would diminish, and many observers expected that textile prices would be among the first to be readjusted. Nevertheless, in the past few weeks we have seen cotton fibers, yarns and gray cloth, rayon yarns, and worsted fabrics all moving upward.

Commenting on the new highs hit by most commodity price indices, Business Week of February 22 complained: "That isn't what was supposed to happen with returning competition, and it's the opposite of what is needed for continuing good business. . . . Much healthier now would be the continuance of the shaking down that characterized December and early January. Booming business would cushion a good bit of readjustment without our really feeling it." It is also true that profits in most lines are now at levels which would permit price cutting and still leave stockholders some distance from the poorhouse. But while there is cream to be skimmed, business men are apt to forget about the plain-milk trade on which ultimately their fortunes must depend. So long as customers can be found at present prices, they instinctively resist "readjustment."

There is very little doubt that consumer resistance is increasing. The volume of retail sales is barely keeping up to last year's level, despite the much greater availability of goods, and the service and luxury trades have experienced a decided setback. These are warning signals that the leaders of business will ignore at their, and our, peril.

In a recent speech Dr. John D. Clark of the Presidential Board of Economic Advisers pointed out that while consumer incomes are not likely to increase this year, industrial production is expected to rise by 10 per cent. The main question, he said, is how to take the extra ten billion dollars of goods off the market. "If prices are not reduced and these goods pile up and business slackens, the price reductions will then take place but at the risk of a recession which, once started, might slip beyond our control." In other words, it is high time for business executives, particularly in those industries where price is determined by policy rather than by the interplay of market forces, to look for a safe path down from the inflationary heights. If they wait too long they may find the easy ways blocked and be forced to make a very precipitous descent.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Balzac in Limbo

BALZAC. By Stefan Zweig. Viking Press. $3.75.

THERE is still no good life of Balzac in English. For the sake of one, I wish I could convey the nature of my disappointment with Stefan Zweig's attempt. The book has been praised for qualities which it undoubtedly possesses: it is a straightforward and well-ordered story; it springs from genuine sympathy with its subject; it has dignity and judgment; and its fulness of detail is flawed by very few lapses in accuracy. And yet I feel that the work is a superficial, almost an empty book, which leaves Balzac strangely unknown—a book which, stranger still, leaves one's curiosity unaroused.

Superficial works on Balzac are not new; they began with the reminiscences of contemporaries, Léon Gozlan and others; and factual studies, friendly or unfriendly, fill many volumes. But fair or foul, they all succeed in testifying to a greater, or at least a denser, reality than Zweig's more balanced account. I cannot render my impression better than by saying that in Zweig's book we seem to be looking through an inverted opera glass. Costumed figures bestir themselves intelligibly, miniature objects show up in clear enough light, but the scene fails to move us because of the distance—a distance which in nature would prevent our seeing anything, and which is here overcome only by an optical device.

The device is perhaps the simple technique of modern biography, which Stefan Zweig himself did much to make universal. I mean the willingness to explain all about a man's invisible insides while leaving mystery and incoherence to pile up around his works and deeds. Zweig tells us several times that Balzac was the greatest writer of his age, but no less often that his "language and style remained irredeemably defective." At the same time we hear that Balzac carved "his plastic prose" by endless revisions in galley proof. These contradictions might conceivably stand, and might enlighten us, if we could examine with the biographer a sample of Balzac's work. But we are never given the chance. We hear of Balzac's wit, but are not offered a single morsel. In fact, I defy any reader of the book to remember anything that Balzac said—or even thought—on any but trivial subjects. For this great man has been somehow stripped into a case. To be sure, it is a case presented without malice or arrogance, but this negative merit does not raise the presentment to what Zweig intended or we hoped for—an illustrious life.

We know Zweig's intention from his clear and early statement of the "Balzac theme": his hero "will subordinate everything to the despotic sovereignty of his creative will." Brave words and very likely true, but requiring proof. The first bit of evidence put before us is unfortunate, for it is nothing more than Balzac's pretense to noble birth—a pretense common to French writers as far back as Racine and Voltaire, and which sprang rather from social compulsion than from the creative will. Later on we see will-power keeping Balzac at his desk and accomplishing the superhuman labors that finally killed him, but nowhere does Zweig come to grips with Balzac's own idea of the will. Calling it "grandiose" and "Promethean" does not help. It would have been better to tell us something about the psychiatric idéologues whom Balzac read, and to show us the difference between the doggedness that scribbles and the energy that creates. The prophetic fiction in which Balzac clothed both his conception and his feeling about will, "La Peau de chagrin," receives but casual mention, as do in fact most of Balzac's "imperishable masterpieces."

The biographer obviously assumes that everybody reads or has read Balzac. Nothing could be more mistaken. Zweig and literary Vienna, stirred up by Hugo von Hofmannsthal forty years ago, may have read Balzac for a time; novelists here and there, if they know French and if they are good enough critics to agree with Henry James that all the roads of modern fiction lead back to Balzac, will remain devotees; but in spite of a great reputation and a supposedly accessible and exciting "realism," Balzac is anything but a popular author.

For one thing, he belongs to the category of fruit that have a bitter rind: his opening chapters are almost invariably repellent. The great machine which will shortly carry you along lumbers at the start. Then the substance of his novels is scarcely what it seems or what these oppressive introductions suggest. You think you are plowing through a sociologist's report or an interior decorator's catalogue, while in fact you are being hypnotized into sharing a metaphysical sensation—the author's hatred of matter, of trade, of the cumbersomeness of human living. There is, indeed, genuine sensuality in Balzac, but it is the sensuality of a wit like Rabelais, not of a hotel manager like Arnold Bennett. That is why Zweig is much righter when he calls Balzac a peasant than when he inconsistently dubs him a bourgeois. But class names are opprobrious and misleading; we should say rather that it is not so much observation that constitutes Balzac's great gift: it is fantasy—verging sometimes on melodrama—which uses the real, or better, the commonplace, in order to make you fear and despise it. He himself said, "After all, one invents what turns out true," and the novelists he wanted to surpass were Scott and Hoffmann.

That Balzac's vision turns out to resemble the "panorama of an age" is all to the good, but if we read the "Comédie humaine" as literally as a textbook we falsify history. The justification for paraphrasing Dante's title lies in the vision. In both men it is intellectual passion that sweeps along, irresistibly, the factual rubbish and the reader too. And it is Balzac's passionate vision that we do not once glimpse through Stefan Zweig's pages. What we see is a laborious hack in misery, in love, in debt. His great capacity for folly, financial and amorous, is minutely though gently described; yet we never learn why his sound perceptions produced such colossal disasters. It was neglect of detail, of course, lack of real interest in money, intrigue, and people—the very objects Balzac is supposed to pursue. He absorbed them, which is a different thing, and we accordingly ask: Where in this "Life" is Balzac's devouring imagination, where is the world of ideas—his own and others'—where is the uniqueness of his "disciplined artistic intelligence"?

Should we not be told what the romanticists meant by the real, the terrible, the fantastic, and why Balzac admired Hoffmann? The latter's "Tales" have just been reprinted (edited by Christopher Lazare, illustrated by Richard Lindner; Wyn, $7.50) with illustrations that show we do not understand what fantastic means; we make it pale and mawkish, or confuse it with the grotesque. Should we not also be made to recognize in the Gothic structure of the "Comédie humaine" the fact that Balzac's inspiration came through plot, character, or idea, since it has been found nearly impossible to arrange the separate novels in historical or biological order? The latest attempt by the veteran Balzac bibliographer, W. H. Royce ("Balzac as He Should Be Read," New York, Auguste Giraldi), is worth consulting, though it is marred in the first edition by too many typographical and other slips. There was need, moreover, for a discussion of Balzac's political ideas—even though unflattering to democracy—for they were a main concern in his life and a driving force in his writings.

In short, whether we start from Balzac's self-revelation or from the conventional view of the "Comédie" as an abstract of the times, we end up with a critical problem which Zweig's book leaves untouched. It is quite possible that Zweig, as a novelist manqué, had compelling reasons for not seeing it. He can hardly have thought that Balzac as a natural man was sufficiently interesting to warrant four hundred pages of text.

In the touching Postscript added by a friend we discover that in Zweig's earlier drafts there were parts when the biographer had been "tempted by his theme to sing an aria." These were cut out, on various advices which I deplore. For what we have now is recitativo secco, a dry recital which calls for, and makes us perpetually expect, a music that fails to resound.

JACQUES BARZUN

Our Native Fascists

THE PLOTTERS. By John Roy Carlson. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.50.

UNDER COVER" and now "The Plotters" are two reference volumes that should be in the library of every American anti-fascist, for they are invaluable guidebooks through the morasses of native fascist movements in this country. Congressional committees of inquiry appointed to investigate these movements have so conspicuously failed to discharge their assignment that Mr. Carlson's work is about our only source of accurate information. As a good reporter, he is particularly careful and painstaking about names, dates, and persons present; and as a sincere and devoted anti-fascist, he avoids the common mistake of dismissing as insignificant the crackpot manifestations of fascist thinking. With these volumes at hand, one can readily identify the individuals and the various "front" organizations which make up the native fascist network in America. Since this is a major accomplishment in itself, Mr. Carlson is obviously justified in the feeling of satisfaction in his own work which he never bothers to conceal.

While gratefully acknowledging Carlson's merits as a sleuth and watch dog, one can still be somewhat dismayed by his lack of a theoretical understanding of some of the issues which he discusses with such an annoying show of omniscience. One should always be grateful for good reporting in any field, but for good reporting to be raised to the level of social analysis, it should be informed by some framework of sound theory. It is here that Carlson's work falls far short of its goal and is, indeed, actually misleading. Not only is "The Plotters" devoid of ideas, but many of the opinions expressed are highly dubious. For example, Mr. Carlson cites "four main underlying causes" of the rise of native fascist movements in America—the rise of labor as a powerful voice in national and world affairs, the social advances of the New Deal which have aroused antagonism in certain quarters, the upsurge of the U. S. S. R., and "the gross treatment by the U. S. S. R. of religious values and church dogmas." This type of analysis is based, or might well be based, upon what the native fascists themselves advance as reasons for their actions. One looks in vain for a suggestion that the concentration of economic power in the United States and the economic pressures brought to bear upon the lower and middle classes might have some relevance to the problem.

This same uncertainty of analysis is shown in Carlson's amusingly vague definition of his own ideological position. He is "a voting, fighting, thinking, forward-looking, middle-road American," who adheres to what might be called the "for-all-its-faults" theory of capitalist society. "All factors considered, including its failings," he still believes, and expresses the belief with some vehemence, in the capitalist order, quoting, as the words of an oracle, some fancy phrases of Eric Johnston. Then, in a fine burst of theory, he proceeds to specify the objectives which must be attained if the threat of native fascism is to be overcome. These include the elimination of slums, full benefits "to all who produce our economic wealth," jobs for all, industrial peace, the determination of "a fair and not an exorbitant profit on all business enterprise," and the decentralization of financial power. If these are the "musts" in a program to combat fascism, one can only marvel at Carlson's naivete in assuming that such objectives can be attained within the framework of the capitalist order.

As further evidence of a similar boyish ideological exuberance, I will quote one of Carlson's strictures on the race question. Anti-fascists are urged to stop "the cry of 'social-equality' propaganda," it being "more important for the Southern Negro and underprivileged white Americans to eat three well-balanced meals a day than to eat in a 'white' restaurant." Implicit in such a careless appraisal is the assumption that segregation has no bearing on the question of three well-balanced meals a day. To dismiss the fight against segregation as "social-equality propaganda" is, again, to follow the line of Gerald L. K. Smith. The plain truth is, and it has been demonstrated repeatedly in the social sciences, that the factors Carlson has in mind when using such a phrase as "social equality" cannot be divorced from a consideration of what he calls "job, educational, recreational, and political opportunities."

While I intend to keep "The Plot-ter's" close at hand and have already had occasion to consult it frequently, I must say, to use General Marshall's phrase, that it is a most ineptly organized book. It has neither beginning nor end; and it is obviously padded. The removal of several long passages, and even of a chapter or two, would have sharpened the impact and clarified the meaning of the book as a whole. The long chapter on the American Communist Party is so much fustian, obviously included to certify the author as a middle-roader. The Communist Party may be the most dangerous subversive organization in America, but if it is, evidence of the fact is not to be found in this chapter.

One can only hope that Mr. Carlson will continue to ferret out the native fascists, of all hues and varieties, and that he will give us, every year or so, a volume based on his findings.

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

The Airy and the Earth-Bound

SLOW MUSIC. By Genevieve Taggard. Harper and Brothers, $2.

THE EARTH-BOUND, 1924-1944. By Janet Lewis. The Wells College Press. $4.50.

MISS TAGGARD'S specialty is a peculiar kind of lyric, very frail, clear, disembodied; lark-song descending from way up high in the pure sky, or coming down from above the cloud. This is a difficult genre to sustain, or repeat; aiming at effects of innocence, of being "natural," Miss Taggard overdoes it a little. For example, her use of a La-la-la refrain is incongruous in the Hymn to Yellow, with its more literate vocabulary—corona, flange, ritual, exuberance, ideal, sluice, calyx, vibration; the disparate elements do not fuse. Nor is the same attempt in the Dialogue on Cider attended with any happier result; there it has the effect of reducing what already sounds childish enough to an even simpler level. Sophistication is flimsy stuff, to be sure, with which to compose, but a false assumption of its lack can also lead to bathos. It is very, very hard to be simple and innocent; to seem so is even harder: and at what point must one give up being natural in order to avoid being careless? Miss Taggard knows too much about technique and texture, about color and sound, to spoil as many poems as she does with lapses into the flatly declarative—"travail of lost person always hunted for" (in The Weed), "asserting your nature, priceless and feminine" (in Demeter), or the gauche rhyme, "spirit—hear it" (Gilfeather, Again), or (I do not think this is meant to be funny) "dews-chartreuse" (Problem of Evil into Cocoon). There are so many poems in Miss Taggard's collection that are almost quite lovely. I think she would also do well not to write so much about poetry, poems, and poets: this can so easily invite accusations of self-consciousness, as if the writer were saying to the reader, "See! Look! I am one." No such accusation could be brought, for instance, against the author of the first stanza of Gilfeather, Again; but there are too many times when Miss Taggard seems to be giving herself airs, not receiving, or transmitting them, from the spirit.

Miss Lewis is a less ambitious, and more uniformly successful, poet. Less traveled than Miss Taggard, she reports only that which she has observed from her house, door yard, and the fields nearby. The statement is simple, the tone quiet; there is emotion, warmth, a richness that comes from concreteness of the imagery, and a subtlety in the modulation of the cadences. No fancy business, no spectacular wind-up, but ease of delivery, timing, control. Two poems, one of early, one of late, day, Remembered Morning and Going Home from the Party, on facing pages, invite, and reward, considerable study of their metrical patterns: there may be space enough to offer samples, the first stanza of the first poem, and the last of the latter:

The ax rings in the wood,
And the children come,
Laughing and wet from the river;
And all goes on as it should.
I hear the murmur and hum
Of their morning forever.

* * *

I heard the deft passing
Of small creatures tracing
Night paths and erasing
Day paths from the ground,
And the silence, deep-massing
In low-lying sound.

But may I venture one suggestion about Remembered Morning, Miss Lewis? You don't have to rhyme on heart at the end of the second stanza; why not get rid of that "parcel and part" business? You could, by repeating or varying the effect with which you end the lovely Baby Goat poem, bring down the same line, shortened, or lengthened a little—"The little noise of the clock/ goes on and on in my heart/on and on in my heart." There is nothing like a reviewer's arrogance.

Miss Lewis's book is beautifully made—set, printed, and bound by hand, its 47 pages issued in an edition limited to 300 copies, 40 of which have been signed by the author. Ten cents a page does not seem a very high price to pay for these poems; still, one might wish for the author a wider circulation, and more royalties. The question has been asked before, What is the matter with American publishers?

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

A Roxborough Pastoral

SMALL TOWN. By Granville Hicks. The Macmillan Company. $3.

THE small town versus the city has reached the dizzy levels of Town Meeting of the Air debates, and voices of doom over microphones in the neighborhood of Times Square inform us that the city is obsolete. This perennial subject of controversy—"The devil made the small town," "I wouldn't live in New York if you gave me Park Avenue"—has inspired a wealth of interesting reading, with "Main Street" and "Middletown," Simeon Strunsky's Topics of the Times and the New Yorker's The Talk of the Town presenting the pros and cons of where to hang your hat.

Now comes Granville Hicks to tell us what it is like for an intellectual living in a small, upstate New York town. He calls his town "Roxborough"—though the bright young men of Time instantly ferreted out its real name, admits that it is a sort of suburb of Troy, and writes an honest and altogether readable book about his daily rounds as a fire commissioner, a director of the Community League, a member of the P. T. A., and a general getter-up of square dances, skits, and Christmas-present funds for good causes. For this he had a thorough training as a member of the Communist Party, whose lifeblood flows by way of plenums (meetings to you), caucuses, and agitpropping ("agitational propaganda" to you).

Though he has long since abandoned the hope of getting the Wooden Horse of the Communists past the walls of his neighboring Troy, and has definitely come out from among the comrades, there remains with Mr. Hicks a laudable Dale Carnegie determination to make friends however boresome they may be, and influence some of the duller set of people confined within any town limits. At least so we gather from "Small Town."

As a native New Yorker who never ventured much west of the Hudson until he was well into his thirties but who has since then spent many delightful winters in small towns on Martha's Vineyard, and many gruesome ones in small towns in Illinois and Oklahoma, this reviewer can't see what all the shooting's for. You simply can't generalize. An intellectual like Mr. Hicks can find in one election district in Manhattan all the outlets for his community interests that he can find in Roxborough, except possibly the fire department, and at that he can be a buff like Evans Clark.

When Colonel Robert Ingersoll visited Belleville, Illinois, the radical editor of the Belleville Democrat took him up to a high place for a view of the town. "How many people have you got here?" asked the old agnostic. "About ten thousand," replied the editor. "I mean real people," said the Colonel. "Oh, them," said the editor, "about ten."

Though Mr. Hicks can come up with no such proportion, his book is always readable, even if you don't regard square dancing and P. T. A. meetings as the height of democratic hilarity. Throughout it he worries aloud because, despite all his efforts, he doesn't seem to be popular in Roxborough. Don't be concerned, Mr. Hicks. When the majority of the people of Roxborough begin to like you and your ideas, then is the time to worry. For you will discover that, through a mysterious process of small-town osmosis, they will have infiltrated (remember that word?) into your intellectual preserves, and you will begin to think that American legionnaires and other droopy small-town characters are pretty good fellers after all.

MCALISTER COLEMAN

The Argument from Design

HUMAN DESTINY. By Lecomte du Noüy. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.50.

THERE are several varieties of scientists. One variety holds that science and religion do not mix; among them are fervent believers, and others not so fervent. Then there is a group which discovers religion by studying the "facts" of science. Lecomte du Noüy, a French biophysicist with American affiliations, belongs to the latter. He tells us that a critical examination of the scientific "capital" accumulated by man "leads inevitably to the idea of God." Faith, therefore, is no longer just a matter of belief—an emotional reaction of man to his Maker—but rests solidly upon a scientific foundation. This view, Noüy declares, is in violent conflict with that which states that skepticism, destructive materialism, and atheism are consequences of a scientific interpretation of nature.

What is the leitmotif running through the book? Certain "facts" stand out in the course of evolution which still await explanation: the beginning of life; the evolution of life; the appearance of man and the human brain; the birth of thought and the development of moral and spiritual ideas. Since science offers no explanation, at present, of these "facts," Noüy comes forward with his "tele-finalist" theory of evolution, which states that it is impossible to attribute the birth of life, its evolution, and the manifestation of cerebral activity to a "simple play of chance"—the "chance" which dominates the activities of the inorganic world. Therefore it is necessary to introduce a "transcendent, extra-earthly force . . . evolution is comprehensible if we admit that it is dominated by a finality, a precise and distant goal . . ."; and so we reach the superforce, the God.

This "God" idea is strengthened by the following reasoning: evolution has reached a point where future progress rests upon the further development of one single organ, the brain. This means that what had been "physical" development is now replaced by "psychological" development; and "psychological" evolution means an improvement in moral and spiritual ideas. Opposition to "psychological" evolution is contrary to a "directing will" and represents "absolute evil." On the other hand, that which makes man evolve spiritually is "good."

String these pieces together and they make words, words of the type one finds in the writings of the alchemists, but with this difference—that Noüy garnishes his metaphysics with the sauce of science.

What is obvious is that "life" and "evolution" need much more "explaining"; what is not obvious—to me—is that Noüy's hypothesis "explains" anything at all. Skeptics will not be convinced; believers need no convincing; and the clergy will seize upon this work of a scientist to lend added support to their preachings.

BENJAMIN HARROW

Soviet Statistics

A GUIDE TO THE SOVIET UNION.

By William Mandel. Dial Press. $5.

THIS book contains a great deal of factual information on many aspects of the U. S. S. R., from medicine to foreign policy, from geography to architecture. Like all informational compendiums it is designed not for steady reading but as a sourcebook for the student of Russia eager to get at facts and figures. The author, who speaks Russian and has worked in the Soviet Union, has served as research associate of the American-Russian Institute and as Russian expert for the United Press, and is at present Hoover Institute Fellow in Slavic Studies at Stanford University. He is therefore well equipped by training and by knowledge of the Russian language—a qualification all too rare among those who write on Russian affairs—to prepare a handbook of this type based on Russian sources.

His volume, however, would have been far more useful for the general reader if he had, in fact, made it a compilation of information and not attempted at the same time to offer a running analysis of conditions in the Soviet Union. As it is, he does not present sufficient analytical material to interest those who want to find thoughtful interpretation; and yet—because, in a commendable attempt to be objective, he has filled his pages with the views of various commentators on Russia—the facts and figures a busy person would like to get at quickly are sometimes buried in a mass of quotations from writers on Russia and excerpts from various documents. In spite of this technical complication, Mr. Mandel's volume, which is written in a spirit friendly to the U. S. S. R., should usefully fill a niche on all reference shelves, all the more because it contains a detailed index and helpful end maps.

VERA MICHELES DEAN

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

A GREAT critic once maintained that the best way for a novice to make the acquaintance of Shakespeare was to read him straight through without pausing to seek explanations and without pondering difficulties. Let such a one, he said, "read on through brightness and obscurity, through integrity and corruption" and only "when the pleasures of novelty have ceased" pause to read the commentators or attempt to solve problems. Whether Johnson would have argued that something could be said for acting the plays in a similar manner I do not know, but the visiting company headed by Donald Wolfitt, now established at the Century Theater, seems to approach its task in that spirit. Mr. Wolfitt thinks nothing of playing Lear two nights in succession, then appearing twice the next day as Touchstone, and returning to Lear again the following evening. He and his companions plunge headlong through scenes which more finicky performers would not approach without months of fasting and prayer. To them the old question whether "King Lear" can be acted is answered as the man who was once asked whether or not he believed in adult baptism answered that question. "Do I believe in it?" he exclaimed. "Why, man, I've seen it done." Mr. Wolfitt simply acts "King Lear," and that is that.

In the daily press the enterprise has received a pretty chilly reception, and anyone who expects either the spruceness and care of, say, the Theater Guild's "Winter's Tale" or the relative lavishness and the virtuosity of the Old Vic company is sure to be disappointed. According to the program, the present company has for years been playing Shakespeare up and down England with occasional visits to London, where during the height of the blitz it managed to keep open the only legitimate theater then in operation by offering hour-long programs of excerpts advertised as "Lunch-Time Shakespeare." The costumes and the scenery look as though they might date from that time, and the direction, as well as the performances, is rather rough and ready. The leading lady, Rosalind Iden, has a pleasing stage presence and a clear, expressive speaking voice—as well as legs which fill her namesake's hose very agreeably. Just how good an actor Mr. Wolfitt would seem in a part to which he had devoted the whole of his attention is difficult to say, and under the present circumstances it is evident only that he is a valiant war horse who does the impossible better than most could do it. The members of the supporting company vary from the pretty good—for example, John Wynyard as Jacques—to the pretty awful—example not given.

Obviously a reviewer needs to be careful to whom he recommends performances like these. They are certainly not for those who tend to regard Shakespeare as a bore who can be rendered tolerable only when some well-known theatrical personality chooses to contribute the interest of his presence. Neither, on the other hand, are they for the connoisseurs who assert a proprietary interest in the sacred text, who resent any rough hands laid upon it, and who will tolerate a performance only if it affords an opportunity to debate fine points. But there are others who think Shakespeare an interesting writer, who can read or see him performed without being perpetually on the qui vive to be sure that neither they nor anyone else is missing anything. I count myself among these last, and for such as us there is something to be said for the opportunity to witness a performance of a play as seldom acted as "King Lear" or even to see again one of the more familiar works which our grandfathers saw a great deal more often than we shall ever see it.

Take the case of "As You Like It." It happened to go on the night of the blizzard, and there have been few occasions during the course of my life when the Bard's contention that the winter wind is not half so unkind as man's ingratitude seemed more open to question. The curtain had only to rise to reveal the fact that one was not to expect anything elaborate in the matter of scenery, though the childishly simple device of turning around a few screens to indicate a change from the Duke's court to the Forest of Arden actually worked well enough. Not much more time had to elapse before it was equally evident that no new interpretations were to be looked for. But I soon discovered that I need only relax comfortably in my seat to pass a very agreeable evening listening to some of the simplest, gentlest, and sunniest words ever written by mortal man. What is more, I got also, in due time, the reward which I seldom fail to receive from any performance of even the most familiar of the plays—namely, bits of dialogue as new to me as though I had never heard Shakespeare. This time one of them was a sentence spoken to the obdurate Phoebe, who has just refused once more the advances of her faithful shepherd. Says Rosalind, leaning confidentially toward her, "Sell while you can; you are not for all markets." Now that is not what is commonly called Shakespearean. It is, however, something even better. The special tone of playful, mocking cynicism is precisely Rosalind's own. Somebody other than Shakespeare might have written it. Only she could have said it.

The announced repertory of Mr. Wolfitt's company includes, in addition

SPECIAL FOOD PARCEL FOR OVERSEAS

No. 57 — $6.95

INCL. POSTAGE, PACKING, INSURANCE

This parcel specially made up of items frequently requested from overseas

- 12 oz. meat loaf (beef)
- 1/2 lb. sweet cocoa milk
- 1 lb. honey
- 3/4 lb. vegetable fat
- 1 lb. dried prunes
- 1/2 lb. chocolate
- 1 lb. coffee
- 1/4 lb. egg powder
- 1/2 lb. milk powder
- 4 oz. soap

Write for prices and further information on parcels made up to order.

J. KOHLS

PERSONAL PARCEL SERVICE

315 WEST 102nd ST. NEW YORK 25, N. Y.

Academy 2-3844

to the plays already mentioned, "The Merchant of Venice," "Hamlet," and Ben Jonson's "Volpone." The last has certainly not been seen here for many years except in the translation of a German rewriting given many seasons ago by the Theater Guild.

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

THE more ambitious and serious of the youngest generation of American painters live south of Twenty-third Street, are shown now and then on Fifty-seventh Street (at Art of This Century, Betty Parsons Gallery, the Egan Gallery, and one or two other places), but never figure in the big annual group shows and get almost no publicity. They are all more or less abstract in mode, betray the influence of Picasso, Matisse, Miró, or Klee, and half or more come out of Hans Hofmann's school on West Eighth Street. A group of these young painters, the year before this, used to show regularly at the Jane Street Gallery just off Eighth Avenue. After that gallery—which was something of a cooperative enterprise—closed, they remained known as the Jane Street Group, and they are now receiving a show at the small new Gallery Neuf (342 East Seventy-ninth Street), which is run by a young writer from New Orleans, Kenneth Lawrence Beaudoin. Mr. Beaudoin also publishes a little magazine, Iconograph, and has a wife, Gertrude Barrer, who is one of the most promising young painters in the country.

The members of the Jane Street Group are Nell Blaine, Frances Eckstein, Ken Ervin, Ida Fischer, Albert Kresch, Sterling Poin Dexter, Judith Rothschild, and Hyde Solomon. None of these artists—not even Nell Blaine, the most developed of them—is anywhere near fulfillment as yet, and it would be unfair to attempt to draw up a critical balance sheet of their individual accomplishments. Suffice it to say that except for Miss Eckstein, who paints nice but irrelevant flower pieces, they are all ambitious and serious, and seem uncompromisingly determined to prolong and widen the path marked out by Matisse, the cubists, Arp, and Mondrian. My one provisional criticism, founded on a short acquaintance with their work, is that they have perhaps too narrow and too sectarian a conception of what being an artist involves.

The Gallery Neuf itself is the center of a tendency quite different from that represented by the Jane Street Group. This tendency, first made known by Steve Wheeler, takes its point of departure from Northwestern Indian art—more specifically that of the Haidas. Most of the work produced under this inspiration is still too literal in its dependence, too imitative of the influence itself, and too mechanical in execution. And it is, moreover, a style that lends itself to the fabrication of pastiches of Klee, who was himself considerably influenced by primitive or barbaric art.

Gertrude Barrer, who had her first show at the Gallery Neuf last month, is however, one artist who succeeds in assimilating Klee and Haida art to her own personality. In Miss Barrer's hands Klee's influence serves admirably to expand the absolutely flat and formal patterns of Northwestern Indian art and render them permeable to contemporary feeling. A more delicate linearism breaks up and softens the stiff, stylized patterns, and floating washes of brownish-grayish color assert the picture plane without permitting that frozen, flat decorativeness which usually results when Haida or South Sea art is transposed too directly into easel painting. Miss Barrer is not a large and heroic talent; her effects are still minor at best and somewhat restricted—as must needs be the case with anyone who goes to school with Klee. But her gift is as indisputable as the physical presence itself of her pictures. One can only hope that she escapes those social and cultural handicaps that have in the past generally combined to frustrate female talent in the plastic arts.

Rufino Tamayo's recent show, at the Valentine Gallery, only repeated the point previously made by his painting. This painting, while of the highest seriousness and awareness, and compounded of the best ingredients in the way of paint quality, format, and even inventiveness, fails to come off except in isolated single pictures. Thus a Tamayo "problem" arises. Though Picasso's massive example has formed his design and dictated his brush-handling, Tamayo's originality is beyond question, especially on the score of color, over which he has thrown a typically hot, dark Mexican cast. And he remains always an interesting and seemingly powerful painter. But interest is not enough, and power is only relative, and the appearance of it can be obtained sometimes at the cost of its substance.

I believe Tamayo's error to be the same as that made so frequently by Picasso since 1930—an error which seems to have been established as canon by the latest generation of French painters. That error consists in pursuing expressiveness and emotional emphasis beyond the coherence of style. It has led Tamayo and the younger French into an academic trap: emotion is not only expressed, it is illustrated. That it is denoted, instead of being embodied. Instead of dissolving his emotion into the abstract elements of style—which is what the old masters and Delacroix did just as much as the cubists—and renouncing any part of feeling, that his style cannot order and unify Tamayo, like Picasso in his weaker moments, localizes the excess emotion—the emotion that his artistic means cannot yet large or strong enough to digest—in gestures, the grimace on a face, the swelling calf of a leg, in anatomical distortions that have no relation to the premises upon which the rest of the picture has been built. This amounts in the last analysis to an attempt to avoid the problems of plastic unity by appealing directly, in a different language from that of painting, to the spectator's susceptibility to literature, which includes stage effects.

If Tamayo were not as good a painter as he is, one would not bother to point all this out. But since he is such a good painter, at least in potentiality, one not only points all this out—one also concludes that if so good a painter can make so crude a mistake, then painting in general has lost confidence in itself. In the face of current events painting feels, apparently, that it must be more than itself: it must be epic poetry, it must be theater, it must be rhetoric, it must be an atomic bomb, it must be the Rights of Man. But the greatest painter of our time, Matisse, preeminently demonstrated the sincerity and penetration that go with the kind of greatness particular to twentieth-century painting by saying that he wanted his art to be an armchair for the tired business man.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

OLIN DOWNES'S first article on the New York Philharmonic crisis, in which he evaded the issues, was bad enough; but even worse was his second article, in which he dealt

MOTION PICTURES

DARRYL F. ZANUCK Presents

DANA ANDREWS
in BOOMERANG

with
JANE WYATT • LEE J. COBB

—PLUS BIG STAGE SHOW—

KATHERINE DUNHAM and Her Dancers
ERNESTO LECUONA

Extra Added Attraction • Special
SID CAESER • PHIL REGAN

Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th Street

PAULETTE GODDARD

FRED MacMURRAY in

'SUDDENLY IT'S SPRING'

with MACDONALD CAREY • ARLEEN WHELAN
A MITCHELL LEISEN Production • A PARAMOUNT Picture

—IN PERSON—

JOHNNY LONG & HIS ORCHESTRA
JOAN EDWARDS

PLUS EXTRA ADDED ATTRACTION

LEWIS & VAN • BUDDY LESTER

DON RAKEF AT THE ORGAN

Doors Open
at 8:15 A. M.
55¢
TO 1 P. M.
(Tax. Incl.)
Mon. to Fri.
Inclusive

NOW
TIMES SQUARE

PARAMOUNT

Midnight
Feature
Nightly

STAGE PLAYS

"A smash hit of enormous proportions." —
Ward More-
house, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way. CH 4-4256
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wednesday & Saturday 2:40.

RODGERS & HAMMERSTEIN Present

In association with JOSHUA LOGAN

"A REWARDING COMEDY." —Barnes, Her. Trib.

JOHN LOVES MARY

A New Comedy by NORMAN KRASNA

Directed by MR. LOGAN

BOOTH Theatre, 45th St., West of B'way
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40

"A HAPPY HIT." —Coleman, Mirror

HELEN HAYES in
HAPPY BIRTHDAY

A New Comedy by ANITA LOOS

Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN

BROADHURST, 44th St., West of B'way
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40

"BULL'S-EYE." —Barnes, Herald Tribune

ETHEL MERMAN

In the Musical Smash

ANNIE GET YOUR GUN

Music and Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN

Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS

with RAY MIDDLETON Directed by Joshua Logan
IMPERIAL Thea., 45th St., West of B'way
Eves. 8:30 Sharp. Mat. Wed. & Sat. 2:30 Sharp

TO PLACE AN ADVERTISEMENT
CALL Barclay 7-1066

MOTION PICTURES

MANHATTAN

ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st St.
86th St.
86th St.
86th St.
86th St.
86th St.
86th St.
86th St.

BROOKLYN

CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE
HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

WESTCHESTER

MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

"BIG BOUNCING MUSICAL." —New York Herald Tribune

DENNIS MORGAN
JACK CARSON

'THE TIME
THE PLACE AND THE GIRL'

IN TECHNICOLOR

JANIS PAGE • MATTHA VICKERS • E. Z. SAKALL

—AND—

'THE FALCON'S ADVENTURE'
TOM CONWAY • MADGE MEREDITH

BROOKLYN

BUSHWICK
DYKER GREENPOINT
KENNEDY
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island

QUEENS

MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

MANHATTAN

COLONIAL
B'way & 62 St.

"EXCITING SPY STORY." —N. Y. World-Telegram

JAMES CAGNEY

'13 Rue Madeleine'

ANNABELLA • RICHARD CONTE

—AND—

'SWEETHEART OF SIGMA CHI'
PHIL REGAN • ELYSE KNOX

CONCERT

CARNEGIE HALL, SUN., MARCH 9 at 8:30

SIMON BARERE

"...one recalls Busoni and Paderewski."

TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE

—New York Times

Buy Your Books Through THE NATION

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price post-free if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D. No C. O. D.'s outside the United States. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible. Make checks payable to The Nation.

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION

The NATION

20 VESEY STREET

NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

with them with beclouding indirection and evasion.

Thus he began with a hullabaloo about the misbehavior of Rodzinski, who had had "ample time to make any complaints, public or private . . . at the appropriate moment and in the most effective way," but whose "suddenly proffered resignation" had "resulted in forcing the Philharmonic-Symphony on the spur of the moment to choose its conductors for the balance of this season and next with a haste that . . . cannot be for the best good of the famous artistic organization which Dr. Rodzinski professes to love so much." One must suppose Rodzinski had done a lot of complaining before the point when he was offered a new contract that he had either to accept or refuse; and actually it was the Philharmonic that created the emergency Mr. Downes described, by dismissing Rodzinski immediately when he resigned as of next October.

Next Mr. Downes devoted a couple of paragraphs to Rodzinski's complaints and to doubts of their accuracy or justification, before conceding that "the permanent conductor must be engaged on the basis of his abilities, then given undisputed authority in purely artistic matters, and held responsible for the results"—and only to add: "But there must be flexible cooperation and practical adjustment all around," and "The conductor's ascendancy with his board will always depend largely upon his acumen, personal force, and public power." Which brought him to "the question of paramount importance . . . the one of the double-barreled managerial relation of Mr. Judson and the orchestra."

On this question Thomson had been forthright and clear: "Arthur Judson is unsuited by the nature and magnitude of his business interests to manage with the necessary self-effacement a major intellectual institution doing business with his other interests." But Mr. Downes found it necessary to begin with an explanation of how natural it had been for the Philharmonic, twenty-five years ago, to engage as its manager a man who "was already the manager of another orchestra—the Philadelphia—and of a number of individual artists," since "it was the period of big combinations in business, finance, railroading, and all the rest of it." Now, however, that period is near its end, "business and politics are changing their methods," and besides "there is not too close a comparison between a manager who had half a dozen artists and a great orchestra under his control . . . and the manager who controls hundreds of artists with one hand . . . and directs . . . the affairs of a leading American orchestra with the other." In this roundabout way Mr. Downes arrived at a shadowy hint that Mr. Judson should no longer be manager of the Philharmonic; and it was also a way for Mr. Downes to say that Mr. Judson should go but the Philharmonic directors had not done wrong in engaging him originally.

Then Mr. Downes completed his maneuver by continuing: "Every director of the Philharmonic-Symphony whom we know . . . commends Mr. Judson's management. His transactions in all details that affect the Philharmonic-Symphony, including the soloists and conductors . . . their fees, commissions . . . go down on paper and are submitted each season to the careful scrutiny of the . . . board. Mr. Judson's counsel is sought by the members of that board and by many other orchestras who seek his advice as well as his collaboration in their affairs. . . ." That is, Mr. Judson should go but not because of anything wrong he had done as manager.

And the rest was more of same. "In the light of all these things, the subject of his relations with the Philharmonic-Symphony is open to reconsideration." This carried implications which were at once denied: "There is no doubt of the practical effectiveness of the present arrangements but they can be open to criticism in principle. The policies and procedure of an orchestra such as the Philharmonic-Symphony," Mr. Downes elaborated in a deathless sentence, "must be as remote from the slightest suspicion of outside influence or interest as Caesar's wife." This again carried implications that were at once denied: "The situation is not of any individual's making, or of anyone's ability or integrity. It is one occasioned by the development of social and musical conditions of today." And so on.

If in his first article Mr. Downes wrote as the critic of a conservative paper, in his second he carried this to the point of acting virtually as a Philharmonic mouthpiece. His statement about the fees and commissions for Columbia Concerts Corporation conductors and soloists all being set down on the Philharmonic books was similar to the statement by Mr. Charles Triller of the Philharmonic board, who in addition revealed how small the amounts paid to Columbia Concerts were. Perhaps Mr. Triller and Mr. Downes really thought these amounts were Mr. Judson's entire stake in his Philharmonic managership; but you may be sure Mr. Judson himself knew better. What he is concerned with—in the appearances of Columbia Concerts artists with the Philharmonic—is not the few thousands that Columbia Concerts makes on these appearances, but the many thousands it makes on the increased number of engagements and the higher fees which these artists get all over the country as a result of their Philharmonic appearances. And the objection to the head of Columbia Concerts being manager of the Philharmonic is, as I pointed out, the possibility this creates of his using appearances with the orchestra to build up the prestige and commercial value of the artists he manages.

Mr. Downes wrote that other orchestras "seek his advice as well as his collaboration in their affairs." More correctly, Mr. Judson has influence over other orchestras because of his control of certain soloists whom they need as box-office attractions—influence which he can use to make them engage other soloists whom they don't care about. He exercises additional influence on some of these orchestras through their conductors, who are under his management and owe their posts to him. And here again his control of the New York Philharmonic is valuable to him, since he can dangle before them the possibilities of guest appearances with that orchestra.

Mr. Judson can afford, then, to donate his commissions from the Philharmonic to the orchestra's pension fund. He could afford to give up the salary he gets as manager. More important, he could relinquish the managership itself, and he would continue to exercise control through his conductors, through the Philharmonic board members who seek his counsel, and above all through the highly influential board member who is the lawyer of Columbia Broadcasting System, Columbia Recording Corporation, and Columbia Concerts Corporation (the Philharmonic's prestige is commercially valuable to Columbia Broadcasting and Columbia Recording, and Philharmonic appearances are a means of building up the prestige and commercial values of the recording company's artists).

To liberate the Philharmonic from Mr. Judson one would have to liberate it from those through whom he could control it.

Letters to the Editors

A Bund Offshoot?

Dear Sirs: The letter which Cecil Hourani, secretary of the Arab Office, contributed to your January 11 issue would have been more informative had Mr. Hourani seen fit to say a few words concerning the origin and background of the Arab Office.

Nation readers would be interested in knowing, for example, that the Arab News Bulletin published by Mr. Hourani's office, in a late 1946 issue, described the Arab quisling-in-chief, Amin el Hussein, the so-called Grand Mufti, as "a single-minded and courageous patriot."

This "single-minded and courageous patriot" is the same man who advised Himmler as to the best methods to use in executing Jews, who helped Hitler form his Arab Legion, who worked as the trusted associate of the Nazis during the war, and who addressed American soldiers of Near Eastern extraction over the Axis short-wave radio advising them to desert. . . .

Americans will also be interested to learn that Mr. Hourani's office, a propaganda agency representing an alien master, has been ready to use its extensive resources in making common cause with the evil forces that are bent upon stirring up religious and racial dissension here in our own country. Last spring the Anti-Nazi League exposed a typical instance in a series of newspaper advertisements quoting a letter from a notorious "nationalistic" anti-Semitic agitator, one H. L. Smith of Philadelphia—who also served as local chairman for Gerald L. K. Smith's activities—in which he requested the Arab Office to send a speaker to his propaganda group. The letter of invitation left no doubt whatever as to the kind of group involved, for in it Smith wrote that "democracy is nothing but Jewocracy" and went on to refer to the Jews of Philadelphia as "kikes." Anwar Nashashibi, most prominent spokesman for the Arab Office, accepted Smith's invitation with alacrity.

Although Nashashibi was later summarily recalled from Washington, Mr. Hourani has been quite ready to assist the same divisive elements in America, and the Anti-Nazi League possesses documentary evidence of at least one outstanding effort of Mr. Hourani's along these lines.

There can be little doubt, despite the splendid Oxford phrases which Mr. Hourani has learned to write, that it is part of the purpose and intention of the Arab Office in America to assist anti-Semitic and anti-democratic movements, wherever such assistance will help accomplish the Arab purposes. In this respect the methods and propaganda of the Arab Office and its related "indigenous" agencies are not dissimilar to some of those of the late unlamented German American Bund.

JAMES H. SHELDON,
Administrative Chairman,
Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League
New York, February 18

To Resolve a Discord

[Reports of the deportations of Hungarians from Slovakia and of the strained relations between Czechoslovakia and Hungary provided the occasion for this exchange of letters. Rustem Vambery is a leading Hungarian liberal, formerly professor of law at the University of Budapest. Jan Masaryk is Foreign Minister of Czechoslovakia.]

Dear Mr. Masaryk: Whatever the antagonism between your Premyslids and our Arpad dynasty when both died out at the beginning of the fourteenth century, or between George of Podiebrad and Matthias Corvinus, King of Hungary, at the end of the fifteenth, sincere friendly relations between Czechoslovakia and Hungary are extremely desirable at present, both from the point of view of our two countries and from that of Europe as a whole. . . .

It cannot be denied that the relationship between Slovaks and Magyars is now far from satisfactory, quite aside from the dispute over the exchange of populations. I am familiar with the methods that have been used to revive a hectic nationalism in most countries of Europe, and I am sure that the reports of atrocities have been exaggerated, but I cannot dismiss certain facts that cloud the horizon.

I am sure that as a true representative of that humanitarianism which is a component of the Czechoslovak national ideology you will agree with me that every effort should be made to eliminate the roots of this deplorable conflict. Being aware of the intrinsically views of the Slovak National Council, I realize how delicately the Czechoslovak government has to handle this problem. I do not close my eyes to the Hungarian government's indiscriminate expulsion of the German minority or dare to assert that the revisionist mentality fostered by the twenty-five-year Horthy regime has turned democratic overnight. . . .

Five years ago democratic Hungarians living in this country formed a Committee for a New Democratic Hungary, of which I became chairman. Sincere friendship with countries adjacent to Hungary was paramount in our political program. Should we fail to achieve this end, our adversaries, the Hungarian reactionaries and revisionists, would triumph by stressing the futility of our efforts. I do not think I need to convince you, the indefatigable champion of the democratic spirit of Czechoslovakia, that only a truly democratic and friendly Hungary can assure the safety and economic prosperity of your republic.

Prompted by these motives, though lacking any official capacity, I venture to ask you, when you return to your native land, to use your political wisdom and authority to convince the government of the Czechoslovak Republic of the necessity of paving the way for an understanding between the Slovak and the Magyar people. Only by viewing the problem from both sides, without emotional bias or political prejudice, can any progress be made toward resolving this unfortunate discord.

RUSTEM VAMBERY
New York, December 20

Dear Mr. Vambery: I appreciated your letter of December 20, and I agree with its contents. You know that for a long time I have tried and failed to find a safe path toward a lasting understanding between our two nations. I do not hesitate to say that unnecessary obstacles have sometimes been placed on it from both sides. A friendly, democratic Hungary is a condition sine qua non for a calm period of political weather in Central Europe. How I wish it would come now and be lasting! I will talk with President Benes when I get back, and, believe me, I will not give up, as long as I live, trying in my humble way to bring into being the ideals without which life is not very satisfactory.

JAN MASARYK
Lake Success, January 16

Crossword Puzzle No. 202

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 He's just a nipper (4 & 5)
- 6 O. K. son, they are out of the way
- 9 Nice zoo of comparatively later date
- 10 Apple that begins as Eve began
- 11 English poet (1552-1599)
- 12 Details (anag.)
- 13 Opposite direction to N. N. W.
- 15 Put pep in a marionette
- 17 Wooden breakwater
- 18 It's not the center of the target, Daisy
- 19 Not cut, fortunately, one night in ancient Rome
- 22 Science, in short, splits the atom. That's lucky for us!
- 25 Florence probably hates to be called this
- 27 "What's - - - - -? That which we call a rose. By any other name would smell as sweet" (2, 1, 4)
- 28 Old body with a house in Washington
- 30 "An inner keel placed right over the outer keel" (dictionary)
- 31 An impressive type
- 32 Port of the dissipated one?
- 33 Not necessarily peers of the realm

DOWN

- 1 A Captain of Horse Marines
- 2 Feature of the movies which suggests difficulty in approaching the cathedral
- 3 So flies to Florence
- 4 Happens

- 5 Diatribe
- 6 Run, Abel (anag.)
- 7 Some do their welcome
- 8 Presumed state of Rabbi ben Ezra
- 14 It would need magic to teach some people to
- 15 He won't be in to a meal
- 16 Point on which the ballet dancer excels
- 17 The stone of "purest ray serene," as the poet put it
- 20 Ha! tea in this may have been taken by our troops in France
- 21 Bond of union
- 23 Everybody welcome! (3 & 4)
- 24 Row over a cat? Just the reverse
- 25 Flower called "ragged lady"
- 26 Choice mixed potion
- 29 Of interest to actors, anglers and gamblers

□-□-□-□

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 201

ACROSS:—1 BURGUNDY; 5 WRITHE; 10 COLLUDE; 11 WINDSOR; 12 EYELET; 14 INFIDELS; 16 LOUNGED; 17 ESHER; 18 ASIA; 20 STREETS; 22 LEES; 24 HABIT; 26 SLATHER; 29 FRESHERS; 30 RAVAGE; 32 UTOPIAN; 33 OPALINE; 34 SLEDGE; 35 SHADIEST.

DOWN:—1 BUCKET; 2 ROLLERS; 3 UKULELES; 4 DEER; 6 RANCID; 7 TASSELS; 8 EURASIAN; 9 TWANG; 13 TORTILE; 14 INVESTS; 15 FEATHER; 19 ALL FOURS; 21 SARABAND; 23 EYESORE; 25 IMAGINE; 26 SHYING; 27 ARENA; 28 BEREFT; 31 MOTH.

CONTRIBUTORS

JACQUES BARZUN, professor of history at Columbia University, is the author of "The Teacher in America," "Darwin, Marx, Wagner," "Romanticism and the Modern Ego," and other books.

CAREY McWILLIAMS, staff contributor to The Nation, is the author of "Southern California Country," "Brothers Under the Skin," and other books.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES is the author of several books of verse, including "The Summer Landscape" and "Out of the Jewel." He has published a translation of Lorca's poems and edited the Spanish Loyalist anthology "And Spain Sings."

McALISTER COLEMAN, a liberal journalist, is the author of "Men and Coal."

BENJAMIN HARROW is professor of biochemistry at the College of the City of New York.

VERA MICHELES DEAN, research director of the Foreign Policy Association, is the author of "The Four Cornerstones of Peace" and "Europe in Retreat." A new book, "Russia: Menace or Promise," will be published this month.

Advertising Rates

GENERAL ADVERTISING per page—$300

PUBLISHERS' AND LOCAL per page—$240

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY per inch—$7.39

CLASSIFIED
74¢ a line (six words)

minimum three lines

Call or write the Advertising Department
for Discounts and Deadlines!

THE Nation
TWENTY VESEY STREET
New York 7, New York
BARclay 7-1066

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 164

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 15, 1947

NUMBER 11

The Shape of Things

BLINDLY, WITHOUT GENERAL PUBLIC understanding or consent, without even a clear picture of what lies at the end, the United States takes its first steps along the road of big-power politics. That "help" for starving Greece also means financial support for the Greek government in its war against the guerrilla forces is taken for granted. The probability that it will also lead to similar support of the Turkish government is also unofficially admitted. But the full meaning of these facts is blurred; first, no doubt, by a desire to keep the fat out of the fire during the Moscow meetings; second, by traditional State Department reluctance to explain complicated and threatening situations to the American public. The tendency is to use homeopathic methods of enlightenment. First the people are offered a little pellet named "relief for starving people"; then a dose of "economic support for the Greek government"; then a suggestion that the Communist threat in the Balkans is behind it all. But much more is involved. Propping up a rotten, reactionary oligarchy in Greece is an act that makes sense only in terms of very large strategic purposes. Surely we do not propose to take over what are euphemistically described as "Britain's obligations" out of love of the ruling group in Greece. We do it as part of a broad plan to contain Russia within its present area of influence. What will this plan involve in Turkey—in Palestine, and the rest of the Middle East—in North Africa? What effect will it have on the revolutionary changes that today threaten the corrupt and decadent groups in power in those areas? What influence will it have on our policy in Germany; on our relations with the near-socialist governments of Western Europe? What will such a plan do to the United Nations and the hope of using that body as a means of establishing and guarding international security? These are a few of the questions Americans should ask their representatives and officials in Washington before—not after—the die is finally cast in Greece.

✱

IN HIS HOUSE OF COMMONS SPEECH OF March 6, Winston Churchill again exposed the insincerity of the Tory case against the government's decision to leave India in 1948. Oppressed by the fact, and unable to deny its truth, that Britain lacks both the force and the desire to govern India against its will, Mr. Churchill could only plead Britain's sacred duty of protecting minorities, presumably in the hope that morality would overcome discretion. To judge by his proposal to call upon the United Nations for "aid or advice," it was a despairing hope. The Tory leader's logic is curious and revealing. Reduced to its essentials it runs as follows: By announcing Britain's early withdrawal from India the Labor Party has wrecked the chances of unity in India, upon which the right to liberty depends. Therefore the United Nations should attempt to bring the Indian parties together. For what purpose? The question is a pertinent one, for if the United Nations succeeded in creating unity, Britain would then be able to keep its promise, which is the last thing Mr. Churchill desires. The war-time leader once declared that he had not become Prime Minister in order to liquidate the Empire, but in the pinch of absolute necessity he would permit Britain to become the client of the Trusteeship Council. After all, a mandate to govern India after the Palestine model might put off the evil day of departure for another fifteen or twenty years and frustrate British socialism into the bargain.

✱

IF THE NEWSPRINT SHORTAGE BECAME SO severe that American periodicals were forced to suspend operation, would the New York Times offer a full page, once a week, to The Nation, for such use as we might make of it? We are inclined to wonder. There is no need to wonder about the fellowship of the press in Britain, however, for when the fuel crisis forced the government to ban all magazines, including weekly journals of opinion, at least five daily newspapers, themselves curtailed by restrictions, immediately offered the hospitality of their pages to the New Statesman and Nation, a publication somewhat comparable to The Nation in America. A recent edition of the News Chronicle carrying a page turned over to the New Statesman's editors has reached America. As the editor of the New Statesman's "London Diary" wrote in the News Chronicle that day, we "are not sure that anything of this kind could happen in any other country. Here is proof . . . that the special function of the political weeklies is fully appreciated" in England.

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	289
The Lewis Case	291
Andrei Contra Mundum	292

CARTOON by Schloss	293
--------------------	-----

ARTICLES

Must Politics Control Housing? by Charles Abrams	293
Moscow Overture by Alexander Werth	294
As a Frenchman Sees Us by Bertrand de la Salle	296
How Deep Is Britain's Crisis? by Aylmer Vallance	297
The German Cartels and AMG by George Lobbenberg	299
Is Your Name Gonzales? by Carey McWilliams	302
In One Ear by Low Frankel	304
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	305

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Scientist and Society by Hans Reichenbach	306
Uncle! Uncle! by R. P. Blackmur	307
Varick Street A Poem by Elizabeth Bishop	308
Boring from Within by Albert Guérard	309
Haydn—The Life and Works by Charles B. Farrell	310
The Misanthrope by Harold Rosenberg	311
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch	312
Music by B. H. Haggin	313

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS	315
------------------------	-----

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 203 by Jack Barrett	316
---	-----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor Literary Editor
J. King Gordon Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 818 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is Indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

ARCHBISHOP McINTYRE'S DENUNCIATION OF the Austin-Mahoney anti-discrimination bill as "formed after a communistic pattern" is surely one of the most fantastic charges ever made against this or any similar measure. Quite as astonishing is the argument upon which it rests. According to the Archbishop, "The bill states that education is the function of the state. Education is not the function of the state. Education is the function of the parent. If the statement that education is a state function is written into the law it will permit future encroachments on the parental function of education. That is what we mean by the infiltration of communistic ideas." And if public education administered by the state is what the Archbishop means by communism, then as a high official of his church he is taking a stand against a basic principle of our democratic system. We wish to state our vigorous twentieth-century belief in the wisdom of our Founding Fathers in charging the state with the responsibility of education. Moreover, we believe that it is the collective duty of citizens to see that no discrimination on account of race, color, or religion deprives their children of what they can rightfully claim from the state. In our view the sponsors of the Austin-Mahoney bill are trying to fulfil that duty. We only wish they had not agreed to water down its provisions in deference to the archaic and bigoted views of the Archbishop and his confreres.

★

FRAGMENT OF A SCENARIO FROM A MOVIE that Leo McCarey will probably never make: Spike of Brooklyn—"Oh, Fadder, I have sinned." Low Baritone Voice—"What have you done, my son?" Spike—"Fadder, I went tuh see duh Dodgeuhs play duh Cahds." Low Baritone Voice—"My son, that was a very grave sin. You knew that the Catholic Youth Organization of Brooklyn had withdrawn its membership from the Dodger Knot-Hole Club as long as Mr. Durocher is allowed to manage the team." Spike—"I know, Fadder. I used tuh get tuh see duh Dodgeuhs t'ree times a year for free. Now it cost me a buck ten tuh see dem bums." Low Baritone Voice—"You know, Spike, that Father Vincent J. Powell, director of our Brooklyn C. Y. O., has disapproved of Mr. Durocher's recent . . . uh . . . marriage to a lady with a . . . a sort of Mexican divorce. This has convinced us, as Father Powell said, that Mr. Durocher's example will be a powerful force for undermining the spiritual training of our young boys." Spike—"I know, Fadder. I am sorry I sinned." Low Baritone Voice—"You must do penance, my son. You must make five . . . five, that is . . . ah . . . five . . . what did you say the score was, my son?"

★

AS A FOOTNOTE TO KEITH HUTCHISON'S article on page 305, we recommend to readers a glance at the annual report of E. I. du Pont de Nemours and Company. Sales of the colossus of the chemical world reached a new high last year, and profits were commensurate. Du Pont boasts that the index of sales prices of its products is unchanged from the 1939 level despite a 64 per cent rise in material costs and a 57 per cent increase in average hour wages. Nevertheless, it is able to show a net operating profit before federal taxes of 22 cents on the sales dollar—a figure that suggests a decline in unit costs compared to pre-war times that might well be reflected in lower prices.

The Lewis Case

THE Supreme Court's majority decision upholding the conviction of John L. Lewis and the United Mine Workers for contempt of court has inevitably revived Mr. Dooley's gibe about the court following the election returns. In our view this is too simple and cynical an interpretation and one that fails to explain why some of the most liberal justices were in the majority, while some of the more conservative supported the defendants' case in whole or in part. The fact is that both the legal and social issues involved were extremely complex, leaving plenty of room for honest differences of opinion.

Here are the major questions which the court was required to answer:

1. Was the government barred by the Clayton and Norris-LaGuardia acts from seeking an injunction in a labor dispute? Five justices—Vinson, Black, Reed, Douglas, and Burton—argued that it was not, after combing the records to discover what was the intent of Congress. But such questions of intent are nearly always debatable and other justices were able to argue with equal cogency that Congress had not meant to leave in the hands of government a legal weapon whose use it was denying to private employers. On this point we are inclined to agree with the minority, especially as the Smith-Connally act, while providing for government seizure of struck properties, specifically omitted, as Justice Rutledge pointed out, "resort to injunctive relief."

2. Assuming that the Norris-LaGuardia act does not apply to the government, was the government in fact the employer of the coal-miners? The defendants claimed it was not since the benefits and liabilities of ownership continued to accrue to private persons. However, the United Mine Workers had, in fact, signed a contract with Secretary Krug, who represented the government, providing the miners with substantial improvements in conditions. It was therefore in a contractual employee-employer relation with the government.

3. Had the District Court the right to issue a restraining order to secure the status quo pending determination of its authority to act on the government's application for an injunction? Justices Rutledge and Murphy claim that such an order was jurisdictionally invalid and hence its violation was not sufficient cause for sustaining the conviction for contempt. On this point, however, we feel that Justice Frankfurter was right in declaring: "When in a real controversy, such as is now here, an appeal is made to law, the issue must not be left to the personal judgment of one of the parties." It was in attempting to set himself above the courts that Lewis made his fatal error. By ignoring the initial restraining order he in effect delivered himself and his union into the hands of the government, which was able to contend that, regardless of the applicability of the Norris-LaGuardia act, the defendants were in contempt.

In view of Lewis's behavior it is difficult not to agree with the seven justices who upheld the conviction while reducing the fine imposed on the United Mine Workers by Judge Goldsborough. But the issues at stake are bigger than Mr. Lewis, and the decision has implications which have led some commentators—Max Lerner in PM, for example—to talk of "labor's Dred Scott case."

We think this may prove to be too tragic a view. Nevertheless the danger, suggested by Justice Murphy in his dissenting opinion, that government seizure of plants and facilities may be used "as a subterfuge for breaking any and all strikes in private industries" cannot be altogether ignored. In Washington, as in Moscow and Albany, the doctrine that public servants cannot be allowed to strike under any circumstances is acquiring the force of dogma. And if this doctrine were to be regularly enforced by injunction on unions whose members had theoretically become government employees through use of the seizure power, the rights of labor certainly would be drastically reduced.

However, the power of seizure rests on the War Labor Disputes Act, which expires July 1. Will Congress reenact it in permanent form, as the President is said to desire and as some influential papers suggest? That seems to us improbable, if only because most employers recognize that it would lead to the socialization of labor relations and, in the not so long run, to the socialization of key industries too. For the government cannot undertake to bail out industries which fail to come to terms with their workers unless it is prepared to negotiate labor contracts and enforce them on both sides. At the very least, the seizure technique means compulsory arbitration, which management likes as little as the unions. We suspect, therefore, that business men will oppose renewal of the War Labor Disputes Act in any form while continuing to press for debilitation of the Wagner act, a ban on the closed shop, and prohibition of industry-wide bargaining. It is such measures, rather than government by injunction, which are still the greatest danger facing labor.

Andrei Contra Mundum

IF ANDREI GROMYKO does not receive the N. A. M.'s free-enterprise medal it is only because the custodians of that august body's destinies are not following the current debates on atomic energy in the U. N. Security Council. For last Wednesday old pokerface lashed out in a vicious attack on the central thesis of the American plan, the proposal that the United States abandon its present private monopoly of the world's greatest source of power and place it in the safekeeping of a public international body. Senator McKellar has already taken his stand against this astonishing concept that challenges the basic tenets of American capitalism—"I pray God we will never have the agreement." Other Senators, standing guard over our sacred cows, will soon be alerted to repel the enemy. It is ironical to hear Soviet representative Gromyko so convincingly sounding the alarm.

The first and last sections of Gromyko's speech added little to his former contributions on the subject. Russia wants first of all a convention outlawing atomic weapons; Russia wants finally the control system set up within the authority of the Security Council and subject to its veto. But the new attack was squarely aimed at the powers of the Atomic Development Authority, which constitutes the very heart and guts of the American proposal. Mr. Gromyko left little unsaid in his criticism. Asserting at the outset that the Soviet Union would yield to no state in its insistence that "strict international control and inspection should be established," he proceeded to chisel away at the scheme that has been under consideration for nine months until nothing was left but a frail and shaky skeleton through which the tempests of international discord blew with chilling blast. The Baruch plan represented "the desire of one country to impose its will in questions of atomic control on other countries regardless of their legitimate interests." Brushing aside the Atomic Energy Commission's proviso that "there should be as little interference as may be with the economic plans and present private, corporate relationships in the several countries involved," Gromyko insisted that the ADA's "unlimited" powers of inspection would mean "a crude interference in the internal affairs of states." Handing over the ownership and management of atomic-energy installations to the ADA would result in a gigantic world cartel under American dominance, hogtying the economic life of the nations of the world and particularly that of the Soviet Union. "Only people who have lost the sense of reality can seriously believe in the possibility of creating such arrangements."

And that was that. No wonder gloom hangs low over Lake Success and some cynics are beginning to wonder when the Sperry plant will revert to its former functions.

Now, there are two aspects of Mr. Gromyko's attack that are worth considering. In the first place, in building his case he made great use of a statement issued by the Council of British Atomic Scientists on January 20, 1947. This statement was a frank attempt to bring together the American and the Russian positions. It admitted that certain measures in the Baruch plan "may be construed as maintaining the dominance of the United States in the field of atomic energy." It agreed that a convention outlawing atomic weapons might be a good thing. It suggested that limitations on the powers of inspection of the ADA might usefully be defined. It had several proposals for freeing scientific research and promoting the peaceful application of nuclear discoveries. But it also stressed—stressed with such firmness that Mr. Gromyko could not possibly have overlooked it—that in the scientists' opinion the Atomic Development Authority had to have full powers of ownership and management over nuclear fuel installation. It is worth while quoting one paragraph in the British statement in full on this point:

An alternative and less ambitious suggestion is to limit the function of ADA to the inspection of plants and control over the distribution of products. In this connection we are impressed with the strength of the case made in the Lilienthal report for giving to ADA positive responsibility for production and ownership and with the difficulties outlined there of maintaining an effective inspection under any conditions. There is considerable doubt as to whether a control scheme not containing this feature would offer sufficient security.

In the second place, as late as February 18 Mr. Gromyko himself seemed to be inclined to this position, for on that date, in an amendment to the interim report of the Atomic Energy Commission, he proposed that, immediately after an appropriate convention or conventions should be put into effect, "inspection, supervision, and management on the part of an international organ [be] applied in regard to all existing plants for the production of final atomic materials (nuclear fuel)."

What is significantly lacking in the latest Gromyko statement is a positive outline of the Russian concept of an international control and inspection scheme. By implication, what he appears to suggest is an arrangement that rests mainly on the good faith of the contracting powers—not only the benign intentions of the great powers but also the dubious good-will of Spain and Argentina. We cannot think that Russia, which of all nations would benefit least from the prolongation of the present armed truce, wishes to let matters rest here.

The next step is clearly to resume discussions within the Atomic Energy Commission. Russia will have the chance there of stating its case not only negatively but positively. We believe there is a common ground that can be found. And assuredly it is to no one's advantage to give up the search at this point.

Must Politics Control Housing?

BY CHARLES ABRAMS

THE attempt by Mayor O'Dwyer to get control of the New York City Housing Authority, if it is successful, may deal a deathblow to the cause of decent housing in the United States.

The New York City Housing Authority was the first to function in the country, and the laws of forty states now follow its legislative formula. Eight hundred housing authorities operate under that formula today. It was fashioned on the principle that a local political body vested with the power of landlord over more than a third of a city's people should be above suspicion. The mayor who dominates a housing authority dominates the political destiny of a city. The power to select localities for slum clearance is the power to demolish blocks where hostile voters are too numerous and to re-tenant the section with persons who vote right. Giving away apartments to the underprivileged is a most effective way of gaining political support.

Public policy from the beginning has sought to erect buffers against political interference with housing by the local administration, although admitting that authority members must be sufficiently responsible to the city to enable the mayor to remove them for incompetence. The five members of the board set up in New York had staggered terms of office so that no one administration would control the whole membership. Another safeguard was that not more than one city official could be a member. This gave the city representation without the chance to dominate. A third safeguard was that members were to receive no compensation; appointments were intended to go to persons of established position rather than to political worthies. Money, according to the formula, was to be borrowed from private sources, and one of the main factors assuring the availability of private funds was the guaranty of freedom from political influence.

While an argument might be made for having a paid chairman, this item in the Mayor's proposal is irrelevant in the present controversy. The main issue is the Mayor's insistence that the housing authority is a municipal agency and should be under his control. But since housing concerns the general health and welfare, it is also a responsibility of the state and federal governments. In fact, the subsidies paid by the federal government and the state of New York are larger than the subsidies so far contributed by the city. The authority is authorized to be a federal agent and has acted in that capacity in the building of war-housing projects. It is for this reason that it has been given independent powers—to borrow money, select its own counsel, condemn property, and issue bonds.

"I'll take over from here, John."

The Mayor desires to control the authority, first, because he believes that, as Mayor, he should bear the responsibility for housing, get the credit for the performance or take the blame for its failure; and, second, because he claims that the housing authority has not performed its functions properly. In the first regard, what does the Mayor's bill propose? It would end the present members' terms of office and give the present Mayor the right to appoint one member for six years, one for four years, and one for two; thereafter all terms would be for six years. This means that the present Mayor would control all the appointments during his own administration but that neither his successor nor any future mayor would be similarly privileged. The legislation amounts therefore to vesting power in the present Mayor without so changing the formula that future mayors would have similar responsibility.

As for the second contention on which the demand for legislation is based, namely, that the housing authority has not performed its functions properly, anyone who has read the record must conclude that this is simply not true. The New York City Housing Authority has turned in one of the finest performances in the history of public operations. Its construction costs compare favorably with private enterprise, an achievement in itself for a public body. The willingness of financial houses to provide funds at as little as 1.5 per cent a year when less than ten years ago no lender was willing to lend an authority money at any price attests to public confidence in the agency. It has kept free of politics—which is perhaps the main reason in some quarters for the present effort to scuttle it.

Moscow Overture

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Moscow, March 7

BY THE time this issue of The Nation reaches the bookstalls, readers will have undoubtedly read more than enough about Marshall's first words on landing at Moscow, Bevin's fur boots, Bidault's hat, and a variety of other items concerning this twentieth-century Congress of Vienna. Le Congrès s'amuse. But one somehow doubts that there is going to be much real gaiety. For one thing, the setting is not very conducive to a happy-go-lucky blend of work and entertainment. The weather is awful. A blizzard has been raging for days, and March so far has been more winter-like than the earlier months of a relatively mild Moscow winter. Nearly everyone has a cold or the influenza. One or two of the Allied correspondents arrived wrapped in picturesque fur garments suitable for the Arctic; perhaps they were right in not banking on the early coming of spring, but the Russians thought their clothes were funny. Snow plows are now clearing the main streets of a non-stop accumulation of snow, but the sidewalks are still icebound and slippery, and delegates who want to go sightseeing on foot had better learn the characteristic Moscow "winter shuffle."

In the four main hotels—the Moskva, normally reserved for Russians, the Metropole, the National, and the Savoy, where mostly foreigners stay—there has been feverish activity by scores of painters, cleaners, paperhangers, electricians, and plumbers to make everything smart and comfortable for the delegates and incoming newspapermen. No doubt some of them will write plenty of dirt anyway about what they saw "behind the iron curtain" once the conference is over, but Moscow is nevertheless making an effort to smarten up and make a good impression. In the British, American, and French embassies, too, there has been much shifting of beds and office furniture, and five plane loads of State Department files are said to have been landed at the Moscow airfield yesterday, rather to the surprise of the Russians, who knew the conference would be complicated but did not think it would be quite so complicated as all that.

Moscow will have more foreign correspondents than ever before in its history. In addition to the resident correspondents there will be thirty-six Americans, twenty British, and a sprinkling of French and others. The Moscow telegraph promises to cope with all their copy adequately. But there is going to be a problem of transportation, for distances are great between the various places where the reporters will live and the ministers will meet, between where the ministers will live and the press conferences will be held; and in Moscow you don't just hop into a taxi.

What other countries apart from the Big Four will send diplomats to Moscow nobody knows. In Prague, for example, they haven't the vaguest idea who will go to Moscow and when. "It is all a question of procedure," they say. Nor does anyone know to what extent or in what capacity the small powers will be associated with the conference. That will be one of the first things for the Foreign Ministers to settle, and it may take days before this and other procedural questions are decided. And then there will be all the rest to discuss and agree upon. "It will take a year," some Allied diplomats say resignedly. This conference, it is generally thought, will be only the opening phase, and delegates are already wondering whether stages two, three, four, etc., will take place in Moscow or somewhere else.

ALEXANDER WERTH is special correspondent in Moscow for The Nation, the Manchester Guardian, and the British Broadcasting Corporation.

To the Russians it was important for political reasons that at least the first phase of the peace conference on Germany should be held here. Stalin will want to keep in closest touch with the conference's decisions, and the Soviet delegation, probably more than any other, will want to refer all major decisions to their government. Stalin's resignation of his post as Minister of the Armed Forces is widely considered an indication that he will devote even more time than hitherto to foreign affairs, which he clearly recognizes as Russia's chief problem. Those who interpret the move in this manner consider it a good sign, for Stalin has shown realism and flexibility in dealing with foreign countries, a gift for compromise, and a capacity for pouring oil on waters whenever these begin to be too troubled. On such occasions he has come out with emphatic statements to the effect that ideological differences must not interfere with the practical unity among the Big Four so necessary for building the post-war world.

The Russians are certainly most anxious to make the conference a success; a breakdown would be a calamity that no one cares to think about. No doubt there will be plenty of difficult moments, and the press abroad will from time to time have banner headlines announcing an imminent breakdown. But the Russians are confident that this will not happen. The settlement of the German problem is vitally important to Russia, though as one Russian soldier remarked to me the other day, "It isn't everything. Maybe our average citizen isn't very Far East conscious, but we aren't forgetting that after Germany there's still Japan, and we don't like the way things have been shaping up there."

One has the impression that on the eve of the conference the Russians are anxious to be reasonable and frank on a great number of questions. Take the former Japanese Pacific islands, for example. Better still, take the new agreement with Poland, which seems to say: Here's your answer Mr. Acheson. Would an aggressive, expanding Russia calmly make all these concessions to Poland, cutting down by half Poland's coal deliveries and above all letting the Poles put the Krakow-Kattowice-

Przemysl railway back on European gauge when Russian gauge would be so valuable to an aggressive, expanding Russia? The agreement with Poland will greatly heighten the prestige and authority of the Polish government both inside and outside Poland, and will tend to cancel out much of the criticism that has piled up abroad in connection with the Polish elections. Clearly the agreement is not just for the moral effect. It presupposes continued, close cooperation between the two countries and the fullest Russian support to Poland on the question of Poland's western border.

But the main question at the conference will still be Germany, and while on a number of points the Russians have not yet stated their position clearly—to what extent, for example, will they support the latest French scheme for the Ruhr?—it is interesting that in the last few weeks numerous serious articles and official pronouncements, notably Marshal Sokolovsky's, have concentrated on the state of affairs in western Germany. Without dwelling on the reasons which led to the economic fusion of the British and American zones, the Russians see in this fusion a danger signal. The spectacular charges are sufficiently familiar to need no repeating here: that Anglo-American capitalism is so eager to turn western Germany into an industrial citadel for the Western European economic bloc that it is resuscitating German capitalist trusts, combines, and cartels and taking little or no notice of the problems of democratization and denazification. In all this scheming to make Germany a capitalist country largely dominated by American capital—to which the British seem resigned—the Russians allege that the demilitarization goal is being pushed into the background.

Generally in the Soviet press no clear distinction is made in this matter between the British and the Americans, but a question which is greatly interesting the Russians is this: To what extent, if at all, have the British got an independent policy—independent of America? Do the British want nationalization of the Ruhr industries; do they want a democratic or at least a Social Democratic Germany? And if they want it, will they press for it or do as America tells them? In other words, the question whether Britain is evolving a policy of its own is considered an extremely important one, to which the conference should give an answer.

There have been indications of a tentative rapprochement with England—first, the Bevin-Stalin exchange of messages with a view to revising the Anglo-Soviet alliance, then the three columns a day for two days running given to Bevin's speech in the Russian press, together with a full presentation of the British case in Palestine. It is felt here that certain American ideas—for example, those of Dulles on western Germany—are not entirely palatable to Labor England, and it is hoped that some common ground may be found with England for the settlement of the German problem. Incidentally, the British fuel crisis, although it has been given little space in the Russian press, has not been dismissed simply as one of those messes into which capitalist countries always get themselves but has been regarded as an indication that England, far from being tied to America in all things, is on the contrary sharing many of Europe's economic troubles.

England's position in relation to America and "England's choice" between Big Two and Big Three or Big Four policies is engaging a great deal of the attention of Russian political observers. This question has begun to interest them particularly since the last American election. For example, in the last issue of the Russian Academy of Science's serious political monthly, World Politics and Economy, three long articles, taking up more than half of the issue, were devoted to various aspects of future Anglo-American relations. One main subject of discussion in these articles was the extent to which England is dependent on America and the extent to which it is a political and economic rival of America. Will England and America always be on the same side of the fence? Probably not. And where does France come in?

Altogether the pattern of this conference is likely to be a good deal more complicated and interesting than the pattern of the 1946 discussions.

As a Frenchman Sees Us

BY BERTRAND DE LA SALLE

WHEN I arrived in the United States, the question of Franco-American relations was uppermost in my mind. On this subject my visit has been most enlightening, enabling me to revise a mistaken impression. Before I came I believed that Americans had lost much of their traditional sympathy for France. The official policy of this country since the war seemed to reflect a growing indifference to our needs and even to our opinions on international problems.

It was during my tour of the Middle West that I came to appreciate the abiding quality of American friendship for France; New York and Washington are too cosmopolitan to serve as a gauge of American feeling. Frenchmen often suspect the Middle West of isolationism, but from what I was able to observe, its isolationist days are over. Many Midwesterners manifest an almost sentimental friendship for France.

I could not help wondering why the American people's sympathy for France finds so little expression in official policy. Millions of Americans are contributing generously through private channels to the reconstruction of our devastated cities, but when the French government applies for a loan from the United States, it receives barely a fraction of what is needed to set France on its feet again. I came to the conclusion that public opinion has not much influence on American foreign policy. Domestic policy is closely geared to public opinion; the average citizen feels that his views play a role in determining the conduct of public affairs. But international relations are carried on over his head.

Most Americans believe it is enough to have repudiated isolationism. They do not seem to realize that in coming out from isolationism they have entered the world community and must now grapple with world problems, choose between different solutions, weigh opposing policies. If they do realize it, their tendency is to say, "Well, that's what we have a government for." The people show a docility about foreign policy that one would never find, I think, among the French or even the English.

By tradition and temperament Americans seem to me anti-imperialist and inclined to regard with suspicion the colonial empires of France and Britain. Their response to events abroad is defensive, even though the United States has emerged from the war as the dominant world power. The rest of the world, however, clearly sees that America's line of defense is now far outside its borders. One might even say that the new eastern frontier of the United States is at the Dardanelles. In point of fact, boundary lines have lost their importance: disorder in any part of the world has immediate repercussions in Washington.

America's problem today is the same that has preoccupied England and France since the sixteenth century—to keep the trade routes open. Freedom of the seas, a freedom guaranteed by the British fleet, was a vital factor in the development of the country. Freedom of the skies must now be established. The United States produces and operates more planes than any other nation; it must be assured that they can land in friendly territory. This depends not on the open ports and commercial agreements that made England and France colonial powers but on acceptance of the idea of "one world" and collective security. That idea can never be made a fact unless the United States becomes its guarantor.

At present I feel there is a danger that the American crusade for "one world" may be deflected from its course. One world must be based on those universally valid civilized ideas which should be common to all humanity. It cannot and should not be an American world; it would be absurd to expect Russians or Moslems to behave like Americans. Yet people in the United States tend to think that the economic system which created their prosperity is an integral part of civilization, as indispensable as guaranties of individual liberty.

BERTRAND DE LA SALLE is a French lawyer and writer who has been lecturing in the United States.

I was astonished to discover how passionately Americans of all social strata still uphold the capitalist system. There is the unquestioning, almost religious faith that might have characterized a disciple of Adam Smith at the turn of the nineteenth century. But perhaps an even more astonishing thing was my own astonishment. Twenty years ago a young Frenchman just out of the Ecole des Sciences Politiques would hardly have been surprised to discover this attitude among Americans. It is we Europeans who have changed.

All this was made very plain to me by the election campaign. For years Europeans have been accustomed to think of America as the country of Roosevelt and the New Deal. But the America to which I came was campaigning vigorously for a return to the laissez faire doctrine of the Manchester School. Not many people in Europe imagine they can rebuild their country by applying the comfortable theory of laissez faire. I could not but reflect that the rich Americans are indulging a whim, buying a luxury item, as it were. Yet one man said to me, "How can you French afford the luxury of socialism when you are all but bankrupt?" And another remarked, "At least in France you are sensible enough to tolerate the black market, which is a free market; the English are too shortsighted to allow even that."

Despite their apparent confidence, however, the Americans are obsessed by the fear of another economic crisis. I understand their uneasiness, for should a depression come, they would lose not only their life savings but, more important, their faith. They would have less cause for fear if they did not associate the concepts of democracy and capitalism. Americans think that any blow to capitalism is a blow to democracy; while in Western Europe it is thought that democratic principles can be upheld whatever economic system is adopted.

I have never been able to accept the Marxist theory that a country's economic system determines its form of government and its culture. That is why I regret to see the United States try to make friendly peoples conform to its own economic beliefs. I don't think that we shall ever achieve the goal of one world by insisting that it be a capitalist world. Nor do I think that the existence of diverse economic regimes is an obstacle to the building of a peaceful, unified world, provided the great principles of civilization are respected.

How Deep Is Britain's Crisis?

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

London, March 1

WHAT the British people wanted is not in doubt. They wanted a plan, a blueprint for action, a set of clear, decisive orders for Operation Crisis. What they have got, in the eagerly awaited White Paper issued last week-end, is a masterly analysis of the situation couched in language more appropriate for readers of the Economist than for the man in the street and ending with a list of goals whose attainment, so far as governmental policy is concerned, is left largely a matter of pious aspiration. On certain assumptions, it is argued, catastrophe can be avoided. Some things are essential; many are desirable. Action to pursue the objectives set is to be promoted by conferences between Ministers and the representatives of employers and employed in all the main industries—a procedure followed last spring with significantly meager results. But for the moment all that the government has done is to present a framework within which, it is hoped, a Benthamite nation supposedly intent on self-preservation is expected to respond to the spur of hard, not to say menacing, facts.

Is the framework itself realistic? The key to the crisis is, by general consent, Britain's balance of foreign payments. In 1947, it is estimated, there will have to be an increase of £350,000,000 in the cost of imports, for which foreign exchange must be found. Since last year's imports were barely 70 per cent of the 1938 volume, and since we ran down our inventories of raw materials to the tune of at least £60,000,000, this estimate is almost certainly conservative—especially as (according to the White Paper) no steps are to be taken to restrict the intake of tobacco, petroleum products, or consumers' goods. Indeed, the figure of £60,000,000 provided for the purchase of machinery and equipment (including ships) from abroad seems very small if sufficient headway is to be made in the essential retooling of British industry. It will surely be necessary to increase this sum.

AYLMER VALLANCE is The Nation's London correspondent and one of its staff contributors.

Let it be assumed, however, that outgoings on account of imports will in fact not exceed the £1,450,000,000 postulated. The other large item calling for foreign exchange is net government expenditure abroad. This, it is forecast, will fall from £300,000,000 in 1946 to £175,000,000 in 1947. How this reduction is to be effected when the White Paper on Defense, published ten days ago, provides for a relatively insignificant reduction in the strength of the armed forces is not made clear, and seems to contain a large element of wishful thinking. Equally optimistic is the forecast that the value of exports and reexports will rise to £1,200,000,000 in 1947, as compared with £900,000,000 in 1946, and that there will be an increase of £25,000,000 in "invisible" net receipts from abroad. The effects of the present paralysis of industry caused by the disruption of the electricity supply are bound to extend over several months and to limit seriously delivery of goods for export. Outside government circles the opinion is general that we shall do well in 1947 if we succeed in maintaining the rate of exports reached in the last quarter of 1946; that would give a figure for 1947 which would be about £100,000,000 less than the rate predicted by the White Paper.

The arithmetic can be summed up in the following table, which gives the realized results for 1946 and two sets of estimates for 1947—A and B. A is the estimate of the White Paper; B is a more pessimistic but probably not less realistic estimate.

	£ Millions
	1946	1947 A	B
Outgoings
Imports	1,100	1,450	1,450
Government expenditure abroad (net)	300	175	250
Total	1,400	1,625	1,700
Income
Exports and reexports	900	1,200	1,100
"Invisibles"	50	75	50
Total	950	1,275	1,150
Deficit	450	350	550

The difference between estimates A and B is that in the one case there is a deficit of £350,000,000 in the balance of foreign payments and in the other a deficit of £550,000,000. In both cases the figure underestimates the amounts which will have to be drawn on the United States and Canadian dollar loans, since, apart from the added strain which "convertibility" will impose on sterling next July, the direction of Britain's post-war foreign trade is resulting in a disproportionately large unfavorable balance with the "hard-currency" countries.

On the basis of the White Paper estimates, our dollar credits may last until the summer of 1948. If less optimistic forecasts are accepted, the exhaustion point will be in sight at the end of this year.

This being the diagnosis, the treatment prescribed is sadly lacking in precision. The cure is naturally seen to lie in increased production, particularly in the basic industries—coal, electric power, steel, transport, and agriculture. The coal industry is asked to produce in 1947 a total of 200,000,000 tons of coal, deep-mined and open-cast; and to make this possible it is hoped that by the end of the year the mining labor force will rise from 695,000 to 730,000. To promote this increase, underground miners will be exempt from conscription for the next five years, and the White Paper refers to the possibility of securing, after training, the employment of some Polish and other foreign labor. But is this coal target high enough? To insure against the danger of repetition of this winter's disaster we shall have to set aside for inventories at least 12,000,000 tons of coal next summer—three times last year's rate of seasonal accumulation. It seems doubtful, therefore, whether the postulated increase in coal output will be sufficient to sustain full employment in coal-consuming industries unless there is not merely a drastic rationing of domestic consumption of fuel and power but also the enforcement of a ruthless system of priorities in favor of essential and against luxury and non-essential industry.

How drastically the government intends to act in this direction no one yet knows; nor is it clear how the hoped-for increase of production in other basic industries is to be obtained without direction of labor—a policy which the government explicitly discards. On the assumption that there will be some intake (no figure is specified) of foreign workers, that some women can be induced (by means again unspecified) to enter or reenter industry, and that the figure of unemployment can be kept down throughout the year to 400,000, it is hoped that in the course of 1947 the numbers in civilian employment will rise from 18,100,000 to 18,400,000; but it is admitted that this increase is likely to be spread over a wide range of occupations, essential and unessential. Moreover, in notoriously undermanned industries such as textiles, where an increase of 70,000 is postulated, no hint is given as to the means whereby this additional labor is to be recruited. There is no clear-cut wage policy that will attract workers, no precise plan for incentives.

The White Paper, in short, suffers from one fundamental defect—the absence of priorities. Defense is not to be neglected—"the fruits of the war must not be jettisoned"; and so we are to carry 1,600,000 men and women in the armed forces and in munitions. Social well-being must not be jeopardized; so we are to continue, if timber supplies allow, our program of domestic house-building, we are to raise the school-leaving age, and we are to import not merely enough food but sufficient tobacco, films, and marginal luxuries to keep up the public morale. Finally, at one and the same time we are asked to recognize that on a long-term view disaster stares us in the face unless the immense arrears of reequipment in industry and transport are made good. In what order of importance does the government place its three objectives? The White Paper will be searched in vain for a precise answer. But that reequipment is not given a high priority must, I fear, be inferred not only from the small part played by machinery in the coming year's import program but from the fact that the proposed allocation of our resources for industrial maintenance and retooling is put only 15 per cent higher than in a normal pre-war year. It looks, in fact, as if reequipment has been relegated to the position of a residual item after what are conceived to be the minimum demands of defense, consumption, and social betterment have been met.

"In our determination to avoid the waste of unemployment, we must not destroy the essential flexibility of our economic life." In this magisterial sentence the White Paper admits that it has found no solution to the problem which has faced the Labor government ever since it took office—how to carry out effective planning without measures of compulsion repugnant to its conception of political democracy. Over the four-fifths of British industry which is still controlled by private enterprise it has little power: it can exhort but it cannot command; and if it decides that it cannot secure more intensive effort by labor without imposing, through special taxes or a "stop" on profits, equal sacrifices on the capitalist, then the whole "flexibility" of private enterprise may be destroyed.

There is no question now of the British people underestimating the gravity of the situation in which the country is placed. The present stoppage of production due to a month of arctic weather and the depletion of coal stocks has brought home strikingly to the man in the street the cold, hard fact that full employment cannot be obtained by acts of Parliament or by "cheap money" but is dependent ultimately on physical resources. The White Paper has made it painfully clear that unless we can put our balance of payments into better shape during the next twelve months, there is likely to be a physical shortage not only of food but of raw materials to keep the factory wheels turning. What the public has learned from the White Paper is the alarming extent to which Britain is "over-committed"—in foreign policy, in consumption of basic coal and steel, and in the pursuit of social welfare. What it wanted was to be told quite simply how its coat must be cut to fit the cloth, and how the cloth itself can be stretched. To neither of those questions has it been given a very clear answer.

The German Cartels and AMG

BY GEORGE LOBBENBERG

OUT of the haze of argumentation and speculation which has obscured American economic policy in Germany for the past twenty months a pattern familiar to observers of the American scene is gradually emerging. Our administrators in Berlin, unwilling to face the fact that a socialization program cannot be coordinated with the stimulation of free enterprise, are trying piously to reconcile the principles of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act with the practice of making billion-dollar loans to German industry. This curious gap between theory and reality is simply a reflection of the situation in the United States, where we have on the one hand a few large corporations dominating key fields in industry and finance and on the other a set of laws, as well as the necessary administrators in Washington, which are supposed to see that a few large corporations do not dominate these fields.

In conformity with the pattern, we have put at the head of our Berlin Economics Division a business man whose principal aim is to get the German industrial machine in working order as soon as possible. Brigadier General William H. Draper describes himself in "Who's Who" as an "investment banker and army officer." He began his banking career with the National City Bank, later became assistant treasurer of the Bankers' Trust Company of New York, and in 1927 joined Dillon, Read and Company. Ten years later he was made a vice-president of that firm. Since 1940 General Draper has been on leave of absence for duty with the army's General Staff. (It is interesting to recall that Dillon, Read acted as principal underwriter for the bonds floated in GEORGE LOBBENBERG, after serving with the Third Army in Normandy and the Rhineland, spent eighteen months investigating I. G. Farben and the Ruhr steel industries. He is now in business in New York and writing on current economic subjects.

the United States by the Vereinigte Stahlwerke Aktiengesellschaft of Düsseldorf, Germany's and Europe's largest steel trust. From 1925 to 1928 Vereinigte Stahlwerke and its subsidiaries obtained loans here amounting to $122,815,000. This money was used to modernize and expand the Ruhr industries in preparation for a German rearmament program which started full operation in 1933—the year the bonds defaulted in New York, on orders of a German Nazi government financed with Ruhr money.)

Caricature by Sellgson
General Draper

But while the appointment of General Draper served our practical purposes, we had to make obeisance, too, to the anti-trust ideas that have been ingrained in American economic thought since the 1890's. In consequence we also sent to Germany a group of trust-busters and cartel investigators, being careful, however, to subordinate them to the business man and general in charge of the Economics Division. This second group is headed by James S. Martin, chief proponent of the much-debated decartelization law which was simultaneously proclaimed, in versions differing slightly in content, in the American and British zones in the middle of February. Martin, an energetic and hard-working former professor of economics, took over the remains of the once proud Division of Investigation of Cartels and External Assets, which was shorn of most of its powers after the Treasury's defeat in a clash with the War and State departments over German policy in 1945. Today Martin's section is only one of many in General Draper's division.

This arrangement would have done no serious harm—except the loss of face which such legal and economic shenanigans cause Americans to suffer in the eyes of pragmatic Europeans—had it not been for two circumstances. The first was the catastrophic economic situation of post-war Germany, which was aggravated by the creation of new zonal borders and by the absence of a strong, centralized governmental system. The second was the continuing conflict with representatives of the three other occupying powers caused by the divergent economic theories which our administrators tried to apply in Germany. In meetings of the Allied Control Council and other inter-Allied bodies the British, French, and Russian negotiators soon realized that while one group of Americans demanded the destruction of German trusts and cartels—which, by the way, are not at all the same thing—another group sought the best means of reviving them, wanting above all else to put German industry back on its feet.

It should not be forgotten that while we “dissolved” the huge I. G. Farben combine even before the proclamation of the decartelization law, the company still exists in its component parts, which are, of course, scattered through the four zones. To illustrate this in a somewhat simplified manner, we said in effect to the Interessengemeinschaft Farbenindustrie A. G. in the American zone: “Henceforward you will be four companies—Interessen A. G.; Gemeinschaft, Inc.; Farben Corporation; and Industrie, Ltd. Now go ahead and compete like good boys!” Under the pressure of public opinion in the United States and Allied countries we purged the Nazi directors and managers, but we still overlooked the basic fact that I. G. was in the main a vertically integrated trust, with each group of companies geared to mesh its operations with those of another group. Since such integration is absolutely essential for production under the post-war economic conditions of Germany and Europe, the remaining I. G. firms will have to continue de facto co-ordination, though de jure, of course, they are no longer a group, at least as long as the law remains in its present form.

In the New York Herald Tribune of last January 2 the Alsops asserted that General Draper realized this need for planned industrial co-ordination. “German poverty,” they said, “is such that German reconstruction cannot be accomplished without what amounts to bold socialistic planning. On this all who know the facts are agreed, including Clay’s brilliant economic adviser, Brigadier General William Draper, a former partner in the decidedly non-socialist banking house of Dillon, Read.” Yet Generals Clay and Draper are among the foremost proponents of the plan of the Anglo-American Economic Board to pour almost three billion dollars’ worth of raw materials and supplies into Germany in order to make the country “self-sufficient.” This plan, as reported by the New York Times of January 1 under the headline “U. S. and Britain to Prime Pump of German Industry,” calls for the shipment of $1,042,000,000 worth of supplies to Germany in 1947 alone. German exports are expected to reach $350,000,000 this year. The Times report continued:

These imports, whose costs will be advanced through loans by the occupying powers, are expected to be continued annually so that, by 1950, $2,952,000,000 will have been poured into German industry to put the merged zones on a self-sustaining basis. Since the profits from exports are immediately taken to pay for imports, the ultimate cost to the two powers at the end of that period is expected to be at least $1,025,000,000.

The plan has already received the blessing of Messrs. Dulles and Vandenberg and has been included in Mr. Hoover’s first report on the German economic situation.

It would seem to be a well-devised scheme—except that in figuring out the ultimate cost to the occupying powers it neglects to take into account the item of competing products. German exports are already offering some competition—in toys and cameras—to United States and British firms, and this will certainly increase in the future if the foregoing figures can be taken seriously. In an international sellers' market the effect of such competition on American and British home industries is negligible, but by 1950 key members of the National Association of Manufacturers may be surprised at the way their program of German reindustrialization is beginning to backfire in South American and European markets.

Neither the scheme itself, however, nor the recent proposal of Assistant Secretary of War Petersen that American banks participate in the refinancing of German industries would seem to bear out the Alsops' hopeful prophecy of "bold socialistic planning" under War Department sponsorship.

In the British zone also we find traces of economic double-talk. Foreign Minister Bevin has definitely committed the British government to the socialization of German heavy industry, that is, iron, coal, steel, and machinery, all of which have been placed under British controllers. Yet the former German coal and steel cartels have so far remained in full operation in the Ruhr, if under Military Government supervision. Being designed to coordinate production, price, and marketing policies, cartels form an ideal transition to industrial nationalization. Centralizing policy-making as they do, they provide the logical framework for the imposition of over-all controls.

But both Mr. Chambers, the head of the British Military Government's Finance Division, and his assistant, Colonel Kellam, shrewd and skilful counterpart of our own decartelizer, Mr. Martin, realize the repugnance of some Americans to the word "cartel." Therefore the simultaneous proclamation of the decartelization law in the United States and British zones came as no surprise to informed observers. As long as the machinery remains available for future use, neither Chambers nor Kellam considers it important whether it is called a cartel or a board—and if the American public is made happy by hearing that German cartels are now "smashed once and for all," so much the better.

As if in confirmation of these suspicions, J. K. Galbraith, an editor of Fortune, who until recently was in charge of the State Department's Division for Economic Affairs of Occupied Countries, wrote in Fortune's January issue that "German cartels and combines could again, with a little rejuvenation, assume their former positions of power." In anticipation apparently of Mr. Hoover's report he indicated that the American public will have to be prepared for a program of large-scale German industrial "rejuvenation," a program already being sold under the label of "pump-priming." Fortune's Ruhr report (December, 1946), which contained a remarkably frank analysis of United States foreign policy, noted that "two years ago anyone who predicted that the United States and Britain would be striving to rebuild the heart of industrial Germany would have had the Secret Service on his tail. Now there simply isn't any other course. . . . We must stay in Germany, attack the colossal task of watching and reforming, reconstruct currency, help rebuild, stimulate free enterprise, see that the country is fed more." Humane as this statement may be, it reveals with painful clarity the contradictions underlying the economic farce that has been going on in Germany for the past year and a half.

Advocates of the stimulation of free enterprise abroad seem to overlook one of the primary economic facts of life: that free competition is a very nice and desirable thing—provided a country is rich enough in resources, man-power, and capital to afford it. Thus while we may "advance" sufficient sums to Germany to start up certain "chosen-instrument" industrial firms, no commercial banker or government economist will ever be visionary enough to demand the refinancing of all the German companies that must be resuscitated in order to obtain a working competitive system. Pump-priming will inevitably result in the revival of the old German industrial combines, under one name or another. Only a policy of socialization of German industry can safely satisfy the urgent need for goods of Germany and Europe. Unless we adopt such a policy, we shall run the double risk of reviving a system that has been the backbone of German nationalism for over a hundred years and of reinstating many Nazi managers and industrialists in their former positions of power.

Courtesy of Aufbau

Is Your Name Gonzales?

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

Los Angeles, March 5

IN THE Westminster and El Modeno school districts of Orange County, California, there live about 5,000 persons of Mexican descent, most of them citizens of the United States. The children of these families are segregated in school, as are children of Mexican descent in most of the other school districts of "the citrus belt." In some localities segregation has been accomplished by a fancy gerrymandering of districts, but the more common practice has been simply to assign all children with Spanish or Mexican names to a separate school. Occasionally the school authorities inspect the children so that the offspring of a Mexican mother whose name may be O'Shaughnessy will not slip into the wrong school. The period of segregation has varied somewhat from district to district, but usually it extends from the first through the sixth or eighth grade.

Curiously enough, this practice has never been sanctioned by California law. The School Code authorizes separate schools for Indian children and children of Chinese, Japanese, or "Mongolian" parentage but is conspicuously silent on the subject of Negro and Mexican children. In fact, many years ago the Supreme Court of the state held that a local school board could not refuse admission to a Negro student.

On March 21, 1945, Judge Paul J. McCormick of the federal District Court handed down a notable decision in a suit brought by a number of Mexican American parents in Westminster challenging the constitutionality of segregation. Judge McCormick ruled that segregation of Mexican youngsters found no justification in the laws of California and, furthermore, was a clear denial of the "equal-protection" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. To the contention of the school authorities that Mexican children were segregated because of a language handicap, Judge McCormick replied that if these children were retarded in English it was because of the conditions under which they were taught. He went on to point out that segregation prevented children of Mexican descent from "deriving a common cultural attitude, . . . which is imperative for the perpetuation of American institutions and ideals," and tended "to foster antagonism" by suggesting an inferiority which in fact did not exist. The school districts promptly appealed the decision, and on December 10, 1946, the case was argued before the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals. If it finally reaches the United States Supreme Court, the decision may sound the death knell of Jim Crow in education.

For a number of reasons the Westminster case is a perfect one for testing the constitutionality of segregated schools. Although the school districts at first contended that Mexicans were a distinct, and by implication an "inferior," race, they finally felt obliged to say that race was not a factor in their policy. With the "racial issue" not directly involved, the court will be compelled to examine the social and educational consequences of segregated schools in a realistic manner.

The Westminster case was carefully prepared and ably tried. For perhaps the first time in a test case of this sort expert social scientists were called as witnesses. A number of distinguished anthropologists from the University of California completely demolished the "racial" argument, and nationally known educators exposed the fallacy of the "language handicap." Since the school districts elected to appeal on the judgment issue alone, Judge McCormick's finding as to the facts will have to be accepted. When the case reached the Circuit Court, the American Jewish Congress, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the National Lawyers' Guild, the American Civil Liberties Union, and the Japanese American Citizens' League promptly filed amicus curiae briefs, and Robert W. Kenny as Attorney General filed one in which he took the same position. Only a refusal by the school districts to appeal from an adverse decision by the Ninth Circuit Court or an extremely narrow interpretation of the issues in the Supreme Court can prevent this case from making judicial and social history.

The brief filed by the American Jewish Congress, which I understand was largely the work of the late Alexander H. Pekelis, is a brilliant and devastating analysis of the social effects and the unconstitutionality of segregation. Since the Supreme Court's decision in the case of Plessy vs. Ferguson (1896) the constitutionality of most segregation devices has rested upon the familiar "separate but equal" contention. This assumes, the brief points out, that the provision of identical physical facilities constitutes equality of treatment (not even these so-called identical facilities are ever really so). The American Jewish Congress has effectively scotched this argument by asserting that equality is determined not by the physical identity of things or facilities furnished, but by the identity or substantial similarity of their values—in short, by the community judgment attached to them. There can be no question that the segregated school has a very low value in the eyes of the community.

CAREY McWILLIAMS, a staff contributor of The Nation, is the author of a number of books on racial minorities in the United States.

The doctrine of segregation as developed in the Plessy case and similar decisions has also been supported by the assumption that "the law follows the mores," that, in the threadbare phrase, "since the law did not create the prejudice, it is powerless to correct it." The brief of the American Jewish Congress exposes this ancient but enduring fallacy. It shows that the actual chain of social causation is somewhat as follows: (a) a pre-existing social inequality finds (b) legislative or judicial declaration, which in turn leads (c) to the assignment of separate, and hence inferior, facilities. At this point the legal sanctions for segregation become not effects but causes. "When a more or less inarticulate social feeling of racial superiority," to quote from the brief, "is clothed with the dignity of an official law, that feeling acquires a concreteness and assertiveness which it did not possess before. The stricter the law or discriminatory segregation the stronger and the more articulate the feeling of social distance. And the stronger that feeling the stricter the law and the more difficult its amendment or repeal. In such setting the very roots of democratic processes are threatened, and no reliance can be placed on their correcting effect."

It is precisely this aspect of segregation that Justice Harlan condemned so vigorously in his memorable dissenting opinions in the Plessy and Civil Rights cases. It is also what Chief Justice Stone had in mind when he suggested that "legislation which restricts those political processes which can ordinarily be expected to bring about repeal of undesirable legislation" should be subjected to "a more exacting scrutiny under the general prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment than are most other types of legislation."

The rationalization that the law merely follows the mores and hence does not play a causative role in shaping social attitudes and relationships certainly relegates the law to a curiously degraded function in modern society. Presumably if the mores sanctioned head-hunting, the Supreme Court would still bow to local custom. This ostrich-like attitude on the part of the judiciary comes in for a sound lashing in the brief of the American Jewish Congress. "When . . . government officials follow the lowest level of community thinking, they betray their function of political leadership. Where prejudice is legalized, where bigotry is given official sanction, where prestige of law is lent to bias, there ignorance, narrow-mindedness, and hatred assert themselves openly and operate as a right. An official action based on a discriminatory classification breeds in turn more inequality and more prejudice." The truth of this assertion was brought out in the Westminster trial when the superintendent of schools testified that Mexican children were "dirty"; that they had lice, impetigo, dirty hands, face, neck, and ears; that they were generally inferior to the white children in personal hygiene.

Drawing by Dobros

The Supreme Court, if the Westminster case reaches it, will be asked to pass upon a question that is certain to be raised again and again in cases involving racial discrimination. Article 55-c of the United Nations Charter, ratified as a treaty by the Senate, provides that "the United Nations shall promote . . . universal respect for, and observance of, human rights, and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, and religion." The Act of Chapultepec, March 6, 1945, goes farther and provides that the nation signing the agreement shall "make every effort to prevent in their respective countries all acts which may provoke discrimination among individuals because of race or religion." Since treaty provisions prevail over inconsistent state enactments, declarations of this type are binding upon the states as well as upon the federal government.

The Westminster case has historical as well as social significance. In 1907 the Department of Justice at the request of Theodore Roosevelt filed suit in the federal courts of California to prevent the San Francisco school board from carrying into effect an ordinance requiring the segregation of Japanese students in the public schools of the city. The moment this suit was filed, the Southern bourgeois in Congress were up in arms, for they recognized that if segregated schools could be proscribed in California, they could be proscribed in Mississippi. President Roosevelt's efforts were defeated at that time by a coalition of Western and Southern representatives in Congress. Today this coalition has been completely disrupted. A glance at the vote of Western Senators and Representatives on such measures as the poll tax and the FEPC will show that the West is nowadays asserting national leadership in the fight against discrimination. It is not surprising, therefore, that the case which gives promise of vindicating Justice Harlan's famous contention that "the Constitution is color-blind" should have arisen in California.

The Westminster case is but one of many current indications that the Mexican minority throughout the Southwest has begun to attain real social and political maturity. The suit was not "rigged," "inspired," or "promoted" by any cause committee. It was filed because rank-and-file citizens of Mexican descent in Southern California realized that they had long since "had enough."

IN ONE EAR

BY LOU FRANKEL

LISTENERS who heard the Columbia Broadcasting System's production of "The Eagle's Brood" ten days ago and the same network's "Prelude to Moscow" on Sunday last, and who remember "The Empty Noose" broadcast of last October, may well wonder why CBS is sticking its neck out to do documentaries about such controversial—especially to radio—topics as domestic fascism, juvenile delinquency, and the background of the Moscow conference. These programs provide information so complete as to tend to mold listener opinion and reaction. And as almost everyone knows, the radio industry has not been notable for providing such leadership.

The explanation lies in the tall, thin, and immaculate Ed Murrow and the not so tall, or so thin, Bill Paley. Murrow is known as the war-time chief of bureau in Europe for CBS, the newscaster from London with the consistently liberal approach and the flair for the "little man's" side of the news. Paley is chairman of the board of CBS—the boss of the network.

While covering fascism in Europe, Murrow saw first hand how unprepared were the "little men" to cope with national problems. Paley got much the same view, during the war, in the radio section of the Psychological Warfare Division at SHAEF. In addition, both men had the opportunity to learn all about the fine documentary work being done by the British Broadcasting System. When Paley returned to CBS late in 1945, he began to crack the whip over its program operation. This he split into two sections: all programming except public affairs and news he placed under Davidson Taylor, who had been with Paley at SHAEF. To head the public-affairs and news section he brought Murrow back from London.

Given a free hand, Murrow set out to build a radio version of the documentary film. He wanted to get such an effect as Pare Lorentz, for one, got in "The River" and "The Plow That Broke the Plains." He also wanted to solve the distribution problem, which kept socially important documentaries from reaching mass audiences, and at the same time to avoid the regularly scheduled broadcast, with its looming deadlines and its inevitable stultifying of the most able writers and producers.

Documentaries, of course, were not new to radio. The "March of Time" broadcasts included much excellent commentary, though the problem presented was rarely solved for the listener. Norman Corwin did a fine documentary series, "People to People," until the weekly deadline broke his health. Indeed, radio aired so many documentary shows during the war that the industry in general has been coasting ever since. Murrow's documentary unit is different in using every trick in the kit-bag of commercial radio, plus a few that are beyond the ledger mentalities of sponsors.

There are no deadlines: writers, producers, and researchers take all the time they need. A mass audience is assured by the simple device of canceling popular night-time commercial programs and taking this time for the documentary. Impact is obtained through "big-name" players and the "dramatization" format. Quality is insured by the use of top-drawer writers and producers. And efficiency is constantly tested and checked by the devices of the research department. (As simple a factor as the title of a program is decided only after the slide-rule specialists have tried every tentative title on their listener panels.)

The canceling of a commercial immediately convinces affiliated stations that the program is important and that they should carry it—165 out of a possible 168 stations aired "The Eagle's Brood." Ample coverage is made doubly sure by the use of network promotion brochures and the simple trick of giving advance notice to the national officers of organizations interested in the problem to be treated. These organizations in turn advise their local branches, and the manager of the local station gets calls from listeners asking when the documentary in question is to be heard.

The cost to CBS of these programs is considerable, obviously. Production is not stinted, and in addition the sponsor of the canceled commercial must have his expenses refunded. But they make for what Ed Murrow calls "the right kind of radio journalism." In presenting them, radio, through CBS, reveals its awareness that it cannot escape responsibility by farming out the time to advertisers.

In the past radio has been like the printer—putting words on the air, as the printer sets them in type, for anyone that comes along. Now for the first time radio is taking over the functions of the publisher, exercising judgment on subject matter and treatment. In this business of reporting and analyzing the key issues of the day in the public interest, CBS is even going beyond the average newspaper publisher, for it is grinding no ax of its own.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Are Profits Too High?

LAST year the chroniclers of the chambers of commerce pictured Mr. American Business struggling like Christian in the Slough of Despond. Beset by Trade Union Demons, hindered at every step by Bureaucracy's Thorny Entanglements, stripped in the Robber's Cave of Internal Revenue, he seemed doomed to end in the fell clutches of Giant Despair. But now that the poor Pilgrim has reckoned the profits and losses of his 1946 wanderings, it appears that he did make Progress after all and is sitting very pretty on a Delectable Mountain of Profit.

The most complete evidence of this statement yet to hand is the March Letter of the National City Bank of New York. "Annual reports so far published for 1946," this excellent authority declares, "show that American business in the aggregate had a substantially higher net income than in 1945 . . . and that it realized returns on sales and net worth which made 1946 one of the better years in its checkered history." It was indeed. The 840 manufacturing corporations whose accounts are summarized by the bank earned an average return of 11.9 per cent on their net worth, a record surpassed in only two years since 1925. All but three of the twenty-three industrial groups for which particulars are given enjoyed higher profits than in 1945, the exceptions being agricultural implements—down 4.6 per cent; electrical equipment and radio—down 41.1 per cent; and transportation equipment—down 51 per cent. The following table shows results for other important industries:

Companies in Group	Net Income After Taxes	Percentage of Increase over 1945	Percentage Return on Net Worth
15 meat packing	$ 67,857,000	96.7	19.9
39 beverage	154,841,000	109.6	32.9
36 cotton goods	62,622,000	208.3	23.8
49 other textile	116,527,000	148.4	24.7
17 rubber products . . .	123,290,000	99.7	20.5
33 pulp and paper . . .	89,387,000	135.0	13.7
38 chemical	189,099,000	46.1	13.6
16 petroleum	76,334,000	19.0	9.8
30 iron and steel . . .	236,190,000	47.0	7.3

Profit figures such as these, however much pleasure they may afford to investors, are probably more than a little embarrassing to a good many corporation executives. Three months ago, when Robert Nathan presented the C. I. O. with his study of profit trends, it was possible—though not entirely wise—for his critics to suggest that he was guessing wildly. In the first six months of 1946 profits of leading corporations as reported by the National City Bank had been appreciably below those for the first half of 1945. For the first nine months, as the New York Sun happily pointed out on December 11, net income of 250 corporations was only one per cent higher than in the corresponding period of 1945. But Mr. Nathan had correctly gauged the strength of the rising tide, and in the final quarter of 1946 the incoming flood of profits brought the total for the twelve months high above the previous year's mark. There is every indication that this tide has not yet begun to recede.

With events tending to bear out Mr. Nathan's estimates, the apologists for big business have begun to hunt for alibis. In an editorial entitled Explaining Larger Profits, the Journal of Commerce of February 21 claimed that "currently reported profits . . . grossly exaggerate the true earning power of many businesses. Because of the 80 per cent rise in the commodity price level that has occurred, conventional accounting practices too often overstate profits." This statement hardly does justice to modern corporation accountancy, which tends to understate rather than overstate earnings. A great many companies, for instance, have adopted the "Lifo" (last in, first out) method of dealing with inventories, which largely eliminates speculative profits in times of rising material prices while guarding against losses in periods of recession. In addition it will be found that a great many corporations have set aside, out of profits, large reserves against a fall in prices.

Another commentator, Edward H. Collins, who writes a regular column for the New York Times, does not attempt to explain away high profits but seeks to justify them as self-evidently beneficial to the community. In support of his position he quotes the London Economist: "High profits and high wages are—inflation apart—both of them signs of high activity. They are at once the means to, and the product of, a high standard of living." Accepting the truth of this statement, does it follow that the greater the return earned by capital the greater the general prosperity? I suggest that it is very possible for profits to be too high both for the good of the community and for the good of business itself. According to the National City Bank, the highest average rate of return on net worth for leading corporations since 1925 was the 12.8 per cent scored in 1929. Was it just a coincidence that the greatest crash of all time followed immediately? Even conservative economists now admit that among the causes of that débâcle was the fact that the benefits of increasing productivity were not being adequately distributed in the form either of higher wages or lower prices and that consequently too large a share of the national income was accruing to the owners of capital.

There is danger, I think, that this mistake will be repeated in 1947 unless, as I suggested last week, business men take early steps to adjust prices, as they can well afford to do in view of the profit figures quoted above. In this opinion I appear to have the unexpected but welcome support of the International Harvester Company, which has just announced a series of price cuts estimated to save customers $20,000,000 a year. "We believe strongly," says Fowler McCormick, chairman of the company, "that the best way to distribute the gains of rising productivity is through lowering prices. We are cutting now, although there is every promise that we can sell everything we can make this year and next at present prices." This move parallels that made by Ford recently and is definitely in the right direction. But we have yet to see whether these two price cutters are lone pioneers, or leaders of a procession along the highway to sustained prosperity.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Scientist and Society

EINSTEIN: HIS LIFE AND TIMES.

By Philipp Frank. Alfred A. Knopf.
$4.50.

THE recognition of the scientist is usually restricted to his social group. Great discoveries, particularly if they concern mathematical theories, remain unknown to the public even when they change the foundations of a science and supply the material of work for a generation of scientists. The public responds to practical applications, not to theoretical constructions. There are a few exceptions to this rule: for instance, the world hypothesis of Copernicus has stirred up the imagination of the intellectual world ever since its first publication. The scientific event of our time in the field of theoretical science was Einstein's discovery of the theory of relativity.

The analogy with Copernicus is more than a parallelism of public fame. Einstein's theory refers to the same subject matter as the doctrine of Copernicus; in fact, it discards Copernicus's theory as far as it is meant to represent a unique truth. What Copernicus claimed was to have disproved the conception of Ptolemy, according to which the earth is at rest and the celestial bodies in motion around it, and to have demonstrated the opposite conception, according to which the earth moves around the sun along with the other planets. Einstein showed that this absolutism is untenable, that both Ptolemy and Copernicus are right in what they assert but mistaken in what they attack. Motion is relative; it can only be described relative to a system of reference, and though a celestial motion described with respect to the earth as an immovable system of reference is of a rather involved nature, it is as real as a motion referred to the sun as an immovable center. Seldom has Hegel's and Marx's dialectical law found so striking a verification. The thesis of Ptolemy was refuted by the antithesis of Copernicus; Einstein's synthesis shows both thesis and antithesis to be of a limited validity and unites the truth of both conceptions on a higher level.

The author of the revolution on a higher level has found his biographer in Philipp Frank. No other writer could have been as competent for this task as Frank. Himself a theoretical physicist, he has followed the development of Einstein's theories from the early days when they were known only to a small group of experts; and his personal contacts with Einstein date from 1910, when Einstein, then professor in the University of Prague, recommended Frank as his successor to the chair of theoretical physics. Frank has always combined with his work in physics an interest in the philosophical aspects of this science, and has become a leading man in the field of philosophy of science.

Frank's book presents an account of Einstein's life within the frame of a description of the philosophical situation of physics. The older conceptions which led to the difficulties overcome by Einstein's theory are well presented, and in a form easily understandable to the layman. It would have been interesting to go from this historical background to a description of the implications of Einstein's theory for modern scientific philosophy; the theory of relativity is not in itself a philosophy, but requires a philosophical interpretation. While Frank criticizes successfully some of the wrong interpretations, he does not discuss the better ones, presumably because it would have made the book too technical.

The presentation of Einstein's life is an interesting one; many little anecdotes illustrate the account and help to convey a vivid picture of this great personality to the reader. One would have liked to know a little more about the early childhood of the genius, and furthermore, to have some psychological account of the origin of his discoveries. But that is hard to get, since the subject of the account has always been rather taciturn about the ways that led him to his discoveries.

Frank devotes much attention to the development which made the author of abstract theories a public figure. This part of the book is particularly well done. One begins to understand how it happened that a man whose intellectual life centered in mathematical theories was drawn into the focus of public attention and thus compelled to participate in public life. There is a tragedy in this development. His deeply rooted feeling of social responsibility induced Einstein to join many a group that fought for the right of the underprivileged classes, in particular the Zionist movement, while on the other hand the innate individualism of this great man deterred him from any more active association with political groups. The desire to be left alone, to have the time for intensive concentration on his work, has often torn Einstein away from associations which in the beginning he had the good-will to follow through. The interplay of these two tendencies, of the will to help others and the need for isolation, explains the discrepancy between his great achievements in the intellectual field and his sketchy and disrupted contributions in the political area.

This tension was made much greater when the implication of Einstein's theory led to a technical application of an unheard-of kind—to the construction of the atom bomb. The equivalence of mass and energy was an early result of the theory of relativity; that it might lead to technical applications was obvious from the beginning. That its first practical utilization was to be an atom bomb, however, was a tragic fate which nobody had imagined might befall the successor of Copernicus. The pacifist who had opposed war as the greatest social evil was compelled by social conditions to supply the most destructive weapon of warfare; and we learn from Frank's book that Einstein even took an active part in promoting the research that led to the construction of the bomb. The Nazis had concentrated on Einstein all their hatred of purely intellectual achievements; they had besmirched him with all the filth they were so capable of producing; they had attacked him as a Jew, as a liberal, and as the author of the greatest theoretical construction of modern physics. His answer was to induce the nations that fought the Nazis to develop a weapon which he knew the Nazis were looking for and which in their hands would have exterminated liberty all over the world. Logical as this answer is, it will forever be the symbol of the tragic conflict into which the scientist is drawn in a socially disorganized world.

Frank's book supplies an excellent account of all these developments; its analysis goes back to the time around 1920 when Einstein was attacked by a group of advocates of a "common-sense physics," who were unable to understand the theory of relativity and called it a logical absurdity. At the same time the leading scientists of the world had recognized Einstein's theory in all its significance; and during a trip around the world Einstein had the occasion to explain his ideas to the public and the men of science in various countries. Seen before this background, the personality of the man becomes particularly attractive; his natural kindness, his simplicity and modesty, the unpretentious style of his life constitute a striking contrast to the fame of his scientific ideas. Frank's book will be welcomed by all those who would like to read a complete account of the work and the life of a man who has been so much talked about and whose achievements so few understand.

HANS REICHENBACH

Uncle! Uncle!

THE RIME OF THE ANCIENT MARINER. By Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Illustrated by Alexander Calder. With an Essay by Robert Penn Warren. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.75.

HERE is a text of Coleridge's poem, a set of pictures which illustrate nothing so little as the text, a critical and scholarly essay on the poem by Mr. Warren of some twenty thousand words, and a set of notes to the essay. There is no index. The book is expensive.

It is a book full of shocks. The first is the dedicatory drawing, of Malcolm Cowley, amiable to the point of life, looking out of Mr. Calder's front window. Like a good visitor, Mr. Cowley shows no signs of wondering what he is doing there, and I suppose we ought not to wonder either, for we are visitors too; but just the same I suspect Mr.

Cowley is really the Prodigal Son putting his best possible face on the discovery that he has returned to the wrong parents. Inside, he is crying, Uncle! Uncle!

This is very shocking, Mr. Calder's dedication of Coleridge to Mr. Cowley. The next shock is the wide-open big print of the poem where all the human figures, the three gallants, all the sailors, the pilot, the boy, the hermit, and the old fellow himself, are nudely naked, with a singular effect of being fresh out of the scrotum-tightening sea. The lonesome Spirit from the South Pole seems in this respect a little more at home in the water; but as to his companion daemons you cannot tell, for you see only their heads, which look like radiator-cap sculpture in 1934, or late exiles returning. The Albatross is in a hurry to be a sitting duck, and succeeds. The water-snakes are doing charades in honor of the Gila monster. Visually and in its ambience Coleridge's poem has become puerile; and puerility, when it comes at the end of a cycle, follows sterility. I do not know whether I make myself plain. Mr. Calder's art is all right when you can blow life or fun into it, but it can do nothing as wind harp to a great poem but be childish and driveling.

Drivel is always shocking; it is the breakdown of mature speech; but it is no more shocking than the stench of the dead horse which Mr. Warren drags over the first half of his fifty-seven-page essay, and entirely through his notes. The dead horse is bad scholarship and stultified criticism. Mr. Warren is a good poet, perhaps the best novelist we have, and an unusually able interpretative critic. What in the name of all the muses is he doing with dead horse in high and public forum? The stench is precisely what Coleridge's poem survives; and what we want from a critic of Mr. Warren's talent is the elucidation of what is living; our senses are only distracted and our sensibility disordered when Mr. Warren brings us to his elucidation through a vast amount of other people's misapprehension, misjudgment, and belittlement of everything that makes possible either the writing or the reading of great poetry. As a professor, Mr. Warren must instruct his students in clearing away dead scholarship; as a critic, he should use what is

In the current issue of PARTISAN REVIEW

•
ARTHUR KOESTLER

London Letter

•
JAMES BURNHAM

Observations on Kafka

•
GRANVILLE HICKS

The Future of Socialism

•
OTHER FEATURES:

SIEGFRIED KRACAUER

Caligari and Hitler

ISAAC ROSENFELD

The Brigadier (a story)

MARY MCCARTHY

Theatre Chronicle

DELMORE SCHWARTZ

The Good, the True, and the Beautiful

WILLIAM BARRETT

Dialogue on Anxiety

JAMES JOHNSON SWEENEY

Henry Moore

•
CONTRIBUTIONS BY:

R. P. Blackmur, Gertrude Buckman, Richard Chase, Louis Clair, Elizabeth Hardwick, Barbara Howes, Wylie Sypher, Peter Viereck

PARTISAN REVIEW
45 Astor Place, New York 3, N. Y.

I enclose ☐ three dollars for one year ☐ five dollars for two years of PARTISAN REVIEW, beginning with the issue. (Add 60¢ a year for Canadian and foreign postage.)

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

CITY.....

ZONE..... STATE.....

VARICK STREET

At night the factories struggle awake,
wretched uneasy buildings veined with pipes attempt their work.
Trying to breathe
the elongated nostrils haired with spikes
give off such stench, too.
And I shall sell you sell you sell you of course, my dear, and you'll sell me.

On certain floors
certain wonders.
Pale dirty light,
some captured iceberg being prevented from melting.
See the mechanical moons, sick, being made to wax and wane
at somebody's instigation.
And I shall sell you sell you sell you of course, my dear, and you'll sell me.

Lights music of love work on. The presses print calendars
I suppose, the moons make medicine or confectionery. Our bed shrinks from the soot and hapless odors hold us close.
And I shall sell you sell you sell you of course, my dear, and you'll sell me.

ELIZABETH BISHOP

living scholarship on living poetry and ignore—in the face of criticism—the rest. It is only in this way that scholarship gains from criticism its contingent discipline; and it is from such scholarship that criticism gains, if ever, its provisional certainty—by which I mean, gains direction, relevance, and the power to discover through attacking real problems something of what actually happens in the poetry being criticized. To rehearse artificial problems—problems of error no longer vital—is to issue in that kind of drivel which is the breakdown not so much of speech as of thought itself.

The shocking thing is that in the free institution of literature as we have it our scholars and critics seem self-committed by some rule of manners not gentlemanly to carry along with them an almost suicidal burden of known error in fact and proved incompetence in response. Mr. Warren wobbles under the burden of Griggs and Lowes and many others and even when he throws it off he never quite recovers; his left shoulder remains a little lower than his right. The result of this institutional game is not unlike that of football as a school for life—a warping of emphasis and a disproportion of the muscles. To drag dead horse becomes an obsessive temptation.

But literature is a free institution, and to play the burdensome game is no part of its dogma: it does nothing to express its vital purpose; and Mr. Warren, after, and even while, giving a long and technically competent example of how to play the game, proceeds with his own shining purpose. We see his good works, and they glorify that version of the heaven of man's mind which is poetry. He shows us the glory and the horror—and all the mighty hunting of whole human adventure—which live and move like inertia itself in "The Ancient Mariner." He makes the renewing act of full response; he uses the poem; and the use, by the contagion of momentous participation in an act which Coleridge did not begin but discovered and which is not now done but goes on, is open to continuous discovery. That is, Mr. Warren elucidates the symbols—of light and dark, wind and sea, moon and storm, crime and punishment, man and imagination—by which the poem moves as fully created

Puerto Rican Paradox

By VINCENZO PETRULLO

Scenic splendor hiding hunger; American citizens denied the right to vote; alien customs superimposed on a Spanish heritage—these are the contradictions of this over-populated, restless island. An unbiased picture of Puerto Rico today, major colonial problem of the United States. $3.00

Your bookstore or UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA PRESS • Philadelphia 4, Pa.

and thereby inexhaustible. We see how it is that the stress and the tensions between the symbols interanimate the words beyond any force of narrative or allegory and give the whole poem "expressive integration" and a kind of absolute momentum of its own. Perhaps Mr. Warren does this by bringing to the poem things not previously there; but the poem called for them, as it calls again in fresh readings; and we see that they are now there, and that if, as I believe, Mr. Warren's citations of Coleridge's prose are justly chosen, Coleridge would have accepted them as a further imaginative revelation of the truth: implicit in the great symbolic stress of the actual already there.

Thus—and this is the most shocking thing of all, the shock of delight—Mr. Warren redeems his heavy pawn. Let us see along what lines he does so. There is the line of what he calls the primary theme of the poem—the sacramental vision of life, which he believes Coleridge only indicated in the fable of the poem, the bare narrative of the voyage out, the murder, the punishment, the dark night, and the voyage back. It is the characteristic fable of the saint's life; it is how we understand the source of compassion and the power of charity; we recognize in it an element of ourselves which as we do not dare to imitate its ordeal we cannot hope to attain. It is the sacrament we know by the small refusal. This is the theological theme which we get around by psychological means because we cannot reach it by symbolic means. Mr. Warren is right to discuss the aesthetics of that failure; it is a primary failure in the approach of mass education to the arts; but it is a pity he had to discuss it in terms of the record of bad readings of Coleridge's poem. Only good readings bring him home.

Home is in his second line, which is nearer at hand. This is what he calls the secondary theme of the poem: the poet hunting down his imagination, and the imagination, so to speak, hunting down the poet who has evoked it; with the booty quarried everywhere and nowhere, created in the hunt, haunting the hunter and the hunt in the full reversal of roles, the symbolic life of the poem itself: what all the parts participate in and draw on. This is the theme of purpose and being, of vitality and identity, the theme of the unacknowledgeable role—not the unacknowledged legislation—of the poet's calling. Again, Mr. Warren is right to discuss this theme, and especially in terms of "The Ancient Mariner," for Coleridge gave that theme its richest and most mature expression in English, and so left behind him very potent symbols of his calling.

We are a race that lives so little in the actual that we need constantly to be reminded by great symbols of what business we are about. It is Mr. Warren's exemplary task to make us bring with us the right equipment to see what the great symbols in Coleridge's poems affect in ourselves. It is not his task, and no way exemplary—it is never the critic's task—to blow into the momentary and artificial life of controversy the dead—however contemporary, it is still dead—history of the misapprehensions and stupidities which prevent access to the symbols at all. Great poetry remains fresh; but criticism must be made fresh each time. If Mr. Warren did not so evidently know this I could not say it aloud but only, like Mr. Cowley, cry silently, Uncle! Uncle!

R. P. BLACKMUR

Boring from Within

RELIGION IN PUBLIC EDUCATION. By V. T. Thayer. The Viking Press. $2.75.

IN 1848, when he heard the rumbling of social and democratic changes, the "liberal" and "Voltairean" Adolphe Thiers exclaimed, "Let us rush to the feet of the bishops!" There is something of this feeling in many minds today. A religion is good for the people. If we

AT LAST— A practical program against discrimination and for community unity ACTION FOR UNITY by GOODWIN WATSON

Professor of Education, Teachers College, Columbia University

"PROFESSOR WATSON, together with other social scientists, has conducted a searching analysis of the anti-discrimination movements under the sponsorship of the American Jewish Congress. His findings are published in a lively little book, ACTION FOR UNITY, that could be read with profit by every adult American with a stake in that movement. The book is not only an absorbing analytical narrative of the current battle against bigotry; it is a useful weapon in that battle."—Albert Deutsch in PM

$2.00 at your bookstore or from

HARPER & BROTHERS, 49 E. 33rd St., New York 16

want to save the good old ways, there is no better means than the old-time religion.

Hence an insidious and ubiquitous effort to establish closer cooperation between religion, that is, the churches, and public education. It is this trend that Dr. V. T. Thayer studies and denounces. In his eyes, it is a danger, for ever since the Bill of Rights "the American Way" has implied the complete separation of church and state, and the common school as the matrix of the commonwealth.

The peril may not seem pressing, but "eternal vigilance" is a wise rule, and the churches are the most formidable of all lobbies. The entering wedge is religious instruction given in "released time." The second move is the half-concealed subsidizing of parochial schools—free textbooks or, in California, free school buses. Then come open subsidies; finally we are heading for the regime that prevailed in Alsace under German rule, and which the French felt bound to respect: all state schools to be sectarian, in proportion to the numbers of each denomination.

This, to Dr. Thayer, is sheer clericalism, and an abomination. He too stands for "the good old ways," the eternal verities as revealed to the Founding Fathers. He has the eighteenth-century belief that everyone should be allowed to seek salvation according to his own law. That belief was not really pluralistic. It implied that under the historical variety of sects there was a common law, the natural law. The sects would ultimately fade away. Their traditional tenets and ceremonies had nothing to do with morality, anyway. Dr. Thayer quotes Dr. Negley K. Teeters to the effect that in twenty-nine penitentiaries 71.8 per cent of the inmates were affiliated with some religion, as against 46.6 per cent of the population as a whole.

Perhaps we should go back to the "good old days," the old-time religion of Franklin, Washington, Jefferson, and Tom Paine, "Common Sense for the Common School." Perhaps on the contrary we should recognize pluralism more fully, and give up the thought of making undogmatic Christianity—the faith of the Savoyard Vicar—the basic religion of the state. In this little book Dr. Thayer raises many problems. He does so quietly, modestly, perhaps a little reticently. He still seems to feel that it is "un-American" to indulge in religious controversy. The secularists, whom he defends, are officially in possession. But they shall not hold their advantage very long, or deserve to hold it, unless they are ready to offer positive reasons for their historical privilege.

ALBERT GUERARD

Haydn—The Life and Works

HAYDN: A Creative Life in Music.

By Karl Geiringer. W. W. Norton and Company. $5.

DR. KARL GEIRINGER'S new biography of Haydn is frequently a good and useful book, but it somehow evades being the really valuable book it deserved to be. The biographical section is well done—as a short, summary life; but short, summary biographies, even though more summary than the present one, are all we have ever had in English; it is time, and Dr. Geiringer is the necessary scholar, for a less terse account. Most of the actual facts and anecdotes seem to have got into Dr.

Geiringer's story, but the corroborative detail intended to lend artistic verisimilitude is frequently left out. For example, we are again retold from Griesinger that Haydn wrote 768 pages of music during his London visits, but we must still turn to Botstiber (Pohl, III, 91-2) to discover what compositions they contained; similarly none of the extant programs of the London concerts are given. More serious is Dr. Geiringer's frequent habit of paraphrasing rather than quoting much of even the most interesting of the correspondence: such a letter as that of January 8, 1791, to Frau von Genzinger describing the first arrival in London—it is the source of information about that event—deserves being printed rather than merely utilized.

However, the treatment of background material, particularly for the exciting first English trip, may be taken as a model of informative and unobtrusive excellence, and it is this, together with the fuller account of Haydn's ancestry, which forms the bulk of the new biographical material appearing in English. Dr. Geiringer, doubtless assuming knowledge of his indebtedness to Pohl-Botstiber, and beyond them to Dies, Griesinger, and the other early sources, has lightly documented his biography. I suggest this to be essentially a mistake, since it must always be helpful to the student without access to these books to have reliable knowledge of the primary sources. And sometimes Dr. Geiringer is led to make statements that seem to require corroborating where none is forthcoming, as the following: "Leaving England, and this time he knew it was for good, was by no means easy. . . . His English admirers were not aware of Haydn's inner struggles; to them the matter had a different aspect. The King had invited Haydn to take up his residence in England and the master had refused. . . ." Dr. Geiringer's reasons for this conclusion are probably sound; but I for one am curious to know what they are.

For one accomplishment Dr. Geiringer deserves special credit. He is the one transplanted German musicologist known to the reviewer who in writing a book for the general American public has shown any really intelligent signs of adapting his material to the requirements of that public. Except for one

New worlds for the mind

Nature

AND Man

By PAUL WEISS

Professor of Philosophy,
Yale University

■ A study of ethical theory which radically revises such basic concepts as causation, determinism, freedom, individuality, life, man and the self. Richly rewarding for everyone interested in ethics, psychology, medicine, metaphysics, or the philosophy of contemporary thought. $3.50 unnecessary jab at Dr. Kuhac—who incorrectly claimed Haydn as a Croat—the book is entirely free from offensive pan-Germanism, and the English, though not distinguished, is clear and precise—and it is English, for a wonder, and not transliterated German (Drs. Einstein, Sachs, Apel, Schrader, and Lang should take note).

Unfortunately, the musical section of the book is much less good than the biographical section. Any discussion of Haydn's music must inevitably bear comparison with Tovey; and Dr. Geiringer's study cannot compare. Tovey, even where his data were incomplete, had a remarkable genius for striking directly at first—and consequently illuminating—principles, and this is the one thing Dr. Geiringer fails to achieve. Dr. Geiringer knows intimately, and discusses in some detail much music not treated before in English, but at the best he conducts a sort of Cook's tour of interesting data without ever getting at the meat of Haydn's mental processes, and at times this inability to penetrate the surface traps him into being actually misleading. For example, German musicology has two convenient eighteenth-century pigeonholes: contrapuntal music is "Baroque" and "learned"; homophonic music "rococo" and "galant." These labels have a certain specious reasonableness when applied to secondary composers; however, for Mozart, and Haydn, black and white categories simply break down. But when Dr. Geiringer discovers Haydn writing fugal finales in his Op. 20 quartets, automatically he slaps on the "learned" label and makes the expected contrast with "rococo," despite the fact that twenty years ago Tovey convincingly demonstrated in his article in Cobbett's "Cyclopedic Survey of Chamber Music"—which must remain the classic examination of Haydn's musical development—that these fugues are anything but a return to the past. Again, Tovey was greatly concerned about the evolution, which he lacked the material to trace, of Haydn's orchestral technique in the "lost" middle-period symphonies. The critical edition breaks off after the first fifty, and Haydn's symphonies vanish from view, exhibiting very crude tutti combined with fantastic solo passages; and they only reappear, in accessible modern editions, with the Paris symphonies of a dozen years later, exhibiting Haydn's mature and flexible tutti-writing combined with infinite caution over exposed solos. But Dr. Geiringer is so little aware of this matter that in discussing all the latter symphonies he has practically nothing to say about orchestral technique. Although the musical section contains much information not otherwise readily available, the absence of a large perspective reduces it all to secondary value; and the kindest light in which to view the section is as a useful supplement to Tovey's various Haydn essays.

The absence of a catalogue of Haydn's works is a serious flaw; but Dr. Geiringer has supplied a chapter on the difficulties involved in making one—they are indeed formidable—and has explained privately to a friend of the reviewer that at present, with most of the materials for such a catalogue isolated in Europe, he did not feel prepared to attempt one. The catalogue appended to his article in Thompson's "International Cyclopaedia of Music and Musicians" was not compiled by him but by Thompson, which is presumably why it was not reprinted.

CHARLES B. FARRELL

The Misanthrope

THE COLLECTED WRITINGS OF AMBROSE BIERCE. The Citadel Press. $4.

THE vogue among publishers for low-priced one-volume Collected Works which is currently contributing to American literary education also has its drawbacks. For the effect of reading everything an author has written is by no means always to make us know him better than we did when he was identified for us by a few works which had come to represent his special signature. Every author, no matter how original, by the inescapable process of learning his art from others and by the residue of those others and of the raw and accidental in his art, is at times estranged in his creation from that unique, ever-expanding Word which marks him off from his fellow-artists and from the mere craftsman. It is the function of criticism, a form of myth-making, to restore him to himself, to reveal and define the limits of his identity, that which he does not have in common with anyone else, and not always with himself, that Whole, unveiled only at intervals, which is incommensurable with the sum of his life and his labors. Collected Works—except for the critic, who discards as he reads—far from heightening the image provided by criticism, or replacing it with a more faithful one, tend to spread and blur it by bringing into focus the foreign material which the artist absorbed.

It is especially for a writer like Ambrose Bierce, a "mysterious figure" in the popular sense, a semi-littérateur and journalist, impure in artistic motivation, practicing his profession on the borderline of the featureless magazine thriller and the columnist's human-interest story, a Western American without formal education but spontaneously drawn to the themes and gestures of the most extreme European aestheticism: death, terror, fantasy and the incommunicable, the evocation of entranced states, black humor, deliberate cruelty, aristocratic pose, elegance—it is

REAL UNITED STATES MONEY

THE BOOKER T. WASHINGTON
MEMORIAL HALF DOLLAR

"A SYMBOL OF DEMOCRACY"

This coin should be in every American Home. The life story of Booker T. Washington inscribed on the reverse side. Philadelphia and San Francisco Coins, $1.00 each. Denver Coins, $1.50 each. Add 10c Postage for each coin up to 3 coins; 1c to each coin thereafter.

Proceeds to be used in establishing an INDUSTRIAL TRAINING PROGRAM FOR NEGRO YOUTH.

SEND YOUR ORDER TODAY!
BOOKER T. WASHINGTON
BIRTHPLACE MEMORIAL
ROCKY MOUNT, VA.
Send reply to Dept. N.

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

especially for such a genuine literary dragon and valuable adulterated American mixture, upon whom few modernist literary masks would fit, or fail to fit, that we need critical work done and a critical edition.

Here we have, if not all of Bierce, at least too much, more than 800 pages: the tales of the Civil War and other violent deaths of "In the Midst of Life," the narratives of the supernatural of "Can Such Things Be?" and "Negligible Tales," the slapstick sadistic farces of "The Parenticide Club," the wise-cracks in prose and verse of "The Devil's Dictionary," and the ironical inventions of the "Fantastic Fables," among whose short paragraphs are some of the only perfect things Bierce wrote—for instance, the fable of the sad encounter between the Moral Principle and the Material Interest. "The Monk and the Hangman's Daughter," of which Bierce was not the author, is also included, for the rather odd reason "that a good part of Bierce's literary reputation is based on this tale"—a fact convenient to show how accurate a myth can be, since this Gothic tale of sin and madness sums up Bierce's moods and literary affiliation better than any single piece he did write.

Along with Poe, Bierce was one of those rare birds in American literature—a Dandy, in Baudelaire's sense of the term. The Dandy opposes to society, and to the human world generally, not some principle but himself, his temperament, his dreamed-of depths, his talent for shocking, hoaxing, and dizzying his readers. An aesthetic Enemy of the People, Bierce exploited whatever was most questionable in his personality, dramatizing his sense of guilt and perdition in theatrical horrors and a costume of malice. What appear to be genuine pathological states often give a sharpened realism to the spectacles of hangings, suicides, and deaths from fright which entertained his imagination. Movement suddenly stops dead in his scenes; his victim's mind splits in two, so that he watches his fate with the detachment of a spectator; a horse and rider hang suspended in space; armies crawl in nightmare silences through blood-coated forests—curious waxwork dioramas clotted in the vertigo of fear.

Out there in his West Coast newspaper office Bierce was somehow seized by that hypnosis of evil and that defiance that have inspired so much of modern literature from symbolism to Dada and surrealism. Probably because of his provincialism, however, his work lacks conscious relations with what was going on both in contemporaneous literary movements and in the spirit of man. As a result it shows no internal development and falls short of aesthetic conviction. His misanthropy, which Clifton Fadiman features in an introduction, often satisfies itself with mere bladder-whacking of greed and social folly. As if he doubted his ability to convey his sensations of menace and ruin, Bierce repeatedly overdoes his effects—the horrors of war are not enough; he must work it out so that the soldier slays his own father or his wife and child—and mauls his reader with trick endings, punch lines, and strained rhetoric. Again and again everything turns on passages like: "So horrible a cry I had never heard nor conceived; it utterly unnerved me; I was conscious for a moment of nothing but my own terror." Soon monotony begins to rise like a gas out of this bulk of pages.

Yet behind Bierce's overstuffed prose, inflexible reiteration, Chamber of Horrors showmanship, and hand-cranked plot machinery, there do lie genuine poetic intuitions, as in "The Death of Halpin Frayser," authentic sensations of mystery and ancestral doom, and occasional daring perceptions of human nature. One is bound to try to imagine what Bierce might have achieved had he lived in a milieu where it was possible to take literature seriously.

HAROLD ROSENBERG

IN THE early nineteen-thirties various established American playwrights searched their consciences anew and came forth with plays different from anything they had previously attempted and intended as answers to the demand of critics for socially conscious drama. Sidney Howard's contribution was "Yellow Jack," a chronicle history of the work of Walter Reed and his associates on the yellow-fever mosquito, written in collaboration with Paul de Kruif and first produced in 1934. The dramatic method, which calls for a nearly bare stage with a good deal of flashing on and off of lights, is pretty close to that of the Living Newspaper except that frankly didactic lectures directed straight at the audience are avoided, and inevitably this method seems a bit old-fashioned in the revival which the American Repertory Theater has just undertaken. I am, moreover, inclined to suspect that history is about to repeat itself. Several at least of the reviewers greeted the new production with precisely those exclamations of modified rapture which they usually reserve for a performance they do not really like as much as they think they should, and I shall have to enter a minority report.

The truth of the matter is that no one has ever discovered, so far at least, a very satisfactory method of conveying information in dramatic form. Any reasonably mature reader can learn more about either yellow fever or the scientific method by devoting fifteen minutes to reading a competent exposition of the subject than he can by an evening in the theater, and he will spare himself the inevitable tediousness resulting from all the lost motion involved in the attempt to put into dialogue form material which is never actually spoken as dialogue. People who favor this sort of thing generally think that they are demonstrating the essential seriousness of their minds, but the man who wants to get his history, his economics, his politics, and his science from novels and plays is not serious but frivolous, and unless we wish to develop a society in which no one ever consents to learn anything except by the radio or the movies, the sort of thing that "Yellow Jack" represents ought to be frowned upon rather than encouraged. In the good old days when the shelves of Sunday School libraries groaned under asst. public relations director with strong magazine and newspaper experience seeks position with aggressive organization.

SITUATION WANTED (MALE)

EX-PAC

Box 1690, c/o The Nation
20 Vesey St., New York 7

The AMERICAN RED CROSS

Carries On!

+ Give Gladly +

the weight of cautionary tales and instructive dialogues, in which every subject under the sun was reduced to a form supposed to be palatable to the young, no one ever supposed that such works were great or were intended for any except the temporarily or permanently immature.

Mr. Howard may not have been a great dramatist. He could, however, certainly create believable situations and write believable dialogue. No one who knew only the present play would ever believe that he was capable of either. Writing in any other form he would, I am sure, never have employed the maid with a duster to explain that it was just ten years ago today that the old master went away, but his lounging statements who talk in stilted colloquialisms about who died yesterday are not a whit more convincing, and the humor thrown in sounds like the jocosity of a Sunday School superintendent. Who can really believe that scientists working on a great problem spend half their time telling one another in words of one syllable what scientific method is? Or that young assistants, while the big boss is peering absently into a microscope, sketch for his benefit the early history of his specialty? And if anyone does believe that they spend half their time in such employments as these, does he also believe that they spend the other half striking stained-glass attitudes whenever some experiment comes off?

Adult theater" is what a certain kind of critic habitually calls this sort of thing, but the word which obviously fits is "childish."

The production of "Yellow Jack" marks a change in policy for the organization responsible for it, and it will be offered for a limited run uninterrupted by other items in the repertory. I am told that new financial arrangements seem to guarantee the survival of the company at least to the end of this season, and I should like to call the attention of those who are planning next year's activities to certain matters which involve both the choice of plays and the approach to a possible public. No one would maintain that "Henry VIII" is, Shakespeare at his best; few, I think, that "John Gabriel Borkman" is the best of Ibsen or that "What Every Woman Knows" is the best of Barrie. Undoubtedly good plays of the second rank deserve a hearing, but the present company seems to have made a sort of cult of the worthy second best. Could we not have more often plays of brilliance and passion and power, and does not their absence tend cumulatively to suggest a tepidness which threatens to grow merely dreary? A successful repertory company ought to aim at being something more than the well-meaning producer of well-meaning plays, but unfortunately the appeal from Miss La Gallienne which has been inserted into the program of "Yellow Jack" tends to stress exclusively the duty of New Yorkers to patronize so well-meaning an enterprise. Never before in history has the citizen been so insistently called on to support so many worthy causes. Every newspaper and every morning's mail urges upon him the duty of joining this, or subscribing to that. Inescapably, in most cases, the appeal is the only appeal which it is possible to make. But does a theater really need to present itself as merely one more obligation which the harassed citizen must assume? Is he really likely to go to the theater because he thinks he ought to? Would it not be better simply to promise him delights?

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

IN RECOGNITION of Koussevitzky's service to American composers they gave him a testimonial dinner a year ago, and more recently the League of Composers gave a concert in his honor which provided him with the opportunity for some of the portentous pronouncements that he loves to make and that tend to get out of control—like "The supreme goal of the composer is to conquer time—to be in the past, in the present, and in the future, to convey the infinity of thought, emotion, and ideal, symbolizing eternity."

A little closer to earth was his contention that "no matter how much is done for the composer—it is not enough! Because the composer is the ever-living source, the life-giving oxygen without which music cannot exist." And his statement later on that "in music a score completed at the desk of the composer is only the beginning of the work to be accomplished; its fulfillment demands the cooperation of an auxiliary energy and a body of active and organized forces." The two statements complement each other: the composer is the source of what is brought to fulfillment by an auxiliary energy. And this means more than it appears to mean.

Its meaning is revealed by a letter from a musician who was able to listen to Koussevitzky's recording of Copland's "Appalachian Spring" with the score, and who is indignant about "the cuts (disgraceful), the bad playing (surprising), and the conductor's liberties with the score: at one place the music races twice as fast as the composer indicates. . . . To thousands of listeners that music will sound as Koussevitzky plays it, not as Copland conceived it." Koussevitzky once characterized a critic who had demanded obedience to the composer's score as a man who "doesn't want the music to be alive"; and from his changes of slow to fast (and fast to slow, also) in Copland's "Appalachian Spring" it is evident that he means those words about the music of living as well as dead composers. One cannot do enough for the composer; and the conductor doesn't do enough for him when he merely plays his music: Koussevitzky's own "cooperation" in its "fulfillment" has been imposition of changes in the shape of the work and its character and meaning that the composer has had to accept if he wanted it performed.

Did Mr. Copland, in his speech at that testimonial dinner he helped to

A NEWS ENCYCLOPEDIA That Grows Every Day "INDISPENSABLE."—William L. Shirer

■ The only weekly news service which grows into an encyclopedia. This unique news service digests and cross indexes without bias all the important news of 70 newspapers, 10 magazines and hundreds of Government releases into just 25 minutes of reading a week.

- Completely news indexed
- Find any fact of the last 6 years in seconds
- Edited weekly
- Presents facts only—without bias
- Covers 70 newspapers, 10 magazines and hundreds of news releases
- Only 25 minutes a week to read all the domestic and international news

NO BIAS—JUST FACTS

At a glance you can tell what happened in every important international situation, you can read the facts of every industrial, political and domestic news event without any editorial coloring whatsoever.

COMPLETELY CROSS INDEXED

FACTS ON FILE cross indexes every major topic for future reference and grows into an annual encyclopedia of news history.

story. You can keep informed without stacks of magazines and clippings. Weekly news and index service, $35.00 a year. Bound volumes are available from 1941 through 1944. $20.00 each. Send for fully descriptive free booklet today.

FACTS ON FILE

Dept. 103, 516 Fifth Avenue, New York 18, N. Y.

MOTION PICTURES

MANHATTAN

ALHAMBRA
COL SEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
59th ST.
Bet. LEX. & 3rd
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENCY
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

BRONX

CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

WESTCHESTER

MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

"REAL AND EXCITING."—PM

HENRY FONDA
VICTOR MATURE
LINDA DARNELL

'MY DARLING CLEMENTINE'

Adapted from STUART M. LAKE'S Book

—AND—

'WAKE UP AND DREAM'

J'NE HAYER • JOHN PAYNE

Based on ROBERT NATHAN'S Novel

BROOKLYN

BUSHWICK
DYKER GREENPOINT
KIPPORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island

QUEENS

MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

MANHATTAN

COLONIAL
5'way & 62 St.

"BIG BOUNCING MUSICAL."—New York Herald Tribune

DENNIS MORGAN
JACK CARSON

'THE TIME THE PLACE AND THE GIRL'

IN TECHNICOLOR

JANIS PAGE • MARTHA VICKERS • S. Z. SAKALL

—AND—

'THE FALCON'S ADVENTURE'

TOM CONWAY • MADGE MEREDITH

MOTION PICTURE

PAULETTE GODDARD

FRED MacMURRAY in

'SUDDENLY IT'S SPRING'

with MACDONALD CAREY • ARLEN WHelan
A MITCHELL LEISEN Production • A PARAMOUNT Picture

—IN PERSON—

JOHNNY LONG & HIS ORCHESTRA
JOAN EDWARDS

PLUS EXTRA ADDED ATTRACTION

LEWIS & VAN BUDDY LESTER

DON BAKER AT THE ORGAN

Doors Open
at 8:30 A.M.
55¢
TO 1 P.M.
(Tax Incl.)
Mon. to Fri.
Inclusive

NOW
TIMES SQUARE

PARAMOUNT

Midnight
Feature
Nightly

STAGE PLAYS

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way. CH 4-4250
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wednesday & Saturday 2:40.

MAX GORDON presents

MARCH ELDREDGE "YEARS AGO"

The New Smash Hit by RUTH GORDON
Directed by Garson Kanin
MANFIELD THEA., 47th St. W. of B'way. CI 9-8050
Eve. 8:40. Wed. & Sat. at 2:40

MELVYN DOUGLAS & HERMAN LEVIN present

"CALL ME MISTER"

THE NATIONS TOP MUSICAL REVIEW

Songs by Harold Rome • Sketches by Arnold Auerbach • Staged by Robert Gordon

New York: NATIONAL Thea.—with Jane KEAN
Buffalo: ERLANGER Thea.—with Betty KEAN

"BROADWAY'S BIGGEST REVUE HIT"—Life Magazine

MONEY-SAVING MAGAZINE COMBINATIONS

For Your Convenience

The NATION

☐ with Harper's Magazine . . $8.50 You Save $2.50

☐ with Consumers Union . . $9.25 You Save $1.25

☐ with Harper's Magazine

and Consumers Union . $11.75 You Save $3.75

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses.

THE NATION by itself:

☐ One Year $6 ☐ Two Years $10 ☐ Three Years $14

☐ Servicemen's Rate $4 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage $1 a year extra

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed.

☐ Bill me.

NAME _____

STREET _____

CITY _____

ZONE _____

STATE _____

8-16-47

RODGERS & HAMMERSTEIN Present

In association with JOSHUA LOGAN

"DEFINITELY A HIT"—Marches, Sun

JOHN LOVES MARY

A New Comedy by NORMAN KRASNA

Directed by MR. LOGAN

105TH Theatre, 45th St., West of B'way
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40
Moves to MUSIC BOX Monday, March 17

"A HAPPY HIT"—Columbian Mirror

HELEN HAYES in

HAPPY BIRTHDAY

A New Comedy by ANITA LOOS

Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN

BROADHURST, 44th St., West of B'way
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wed. and Sat. 2:40

"ALL TRIUMPHANT"—Barnes, Herald Tribune

ETHEL MERMAN

In the Musical Smash

ANNIE GET YOUR GUN

Musical and Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN

Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS

with RAY MIDDLETON Directed by Joshua Logan
IMPERIAL Thea., 45th St., West of B'way
Eve. 8:30 Sharp. Wed. & Sat. 2:30 Sharp

TO PLACE AN AD CALL
BARCLAY 7-1066

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

arrange, say that grateful as the composers were to Koussevitzky for his performances of his altered versions of their works they would be even more grateful for performances of their own versions? Or did he realize that this would be an appeal for a humble and enlightened conception of the performer's relation to the composer that Koussevitzky already had shown himself to be incapable of?

What I would call the definitive performance of the Prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger"—Toscanini's with the N. B. C. Symphony—is excellently reproduced on a Victor single disc (11-9385; $1). On another single (10-1277; $75) are two spirituals, "Soon-A Will Be Done" and "Set Down, Servant," beautifully sung by Robert Shaw's Collegiate Chorale. And on still another (11-9386; $1) are the sailors' three solo dances from Leonard Bernstein's music for "Fancy Free," well-performed by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra under Fiedler and excellently recorded, but in need of the dancing of Lang, Kriza, and Robbins.

Dvorak's Cello Concerto is a work I have not cared much for even when it was played by Casals or Feuermann with distinguished musical taste and style. And I don't care for it at all as it is sentimentalized in the performance by Piatigorsky with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy, which has been issued by Columbia (Set 658; $5.85). What I mean by musical taste is exemplified by the horn solo on the first side, which brought tears to my eyes with the exquisite inflection of the beautiful sound; what I mean by sentimentalizing is exemplified by the exaggerated nuances of tone and pace in Piatigorsky's treatment of the same melody on the second side. A string player who listened with me was more disturbed than I by Piatigorsky's occasional deviations from pitch; but these constituted the only technical flaw in his playing. The recorded sound of the orchestra is spacious and agreeable, but without the warmth and splendor it should have; and it is blanketed occasionally by the cello.

The nine Scarlatti sonatas that Sylvia Marlowe has recorded for Musicraft (Set 72; $3.85) include some fine ones; but Miss Marlowe's harpsichord-playing is hammered-out spectacular sonority and nervous excitement or it is stodgy and dull. Spectacular sonority seems also to have been the objective in recording; and surfaces are poor.

Liberated Antiques

Dear Sirs: The third annual National Antiques Show is being held this year through March 16 at Madison Square Garden. Of particular interest to readers of The Nation will be a number of "liberated" antiques—objets d'art that were kept in hiding during the dark years of the Nazi occupation or were stolen by the Nazis and have since been recovered.

MORTON YARMON,
General Manager

New York, March 5

In the Face of Reality

Dear Sirs: The article on Emily Greene Balch by John Herman Randall, Jr., in The Nation of January 4 was interesting, but you ought to clear up one point. The impression is left that Miss Balch was an "absolute pacifist" in the Second World War. Actually Miss Balch advocated our going to war. Many members of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom abandoned their "non-violent opposition" stand in the face of ugly inescapable reality.

MARY BARNETT GILSON
Babson Park, Fla., February 19

Requests Stieglitz Items

Dear Sirs: I am putting the material at An American Place in order. I am also attempting to gather as much further material relating to Stieglitz and his life work as possible. In the event that your readers may have letters or other items that might be of general interest, I wonder whether they would be good enough to send the originals, which I will return, or copies of them to me at 124 East Seventieth Street, New York 24, N. Y.

DOROTHY NORMAN
New York, February 27

Health Bill's Limitations

Dear Sirs: Dr. Harvey Cushing, whose health plans of 1934 Dr. Martin Gumpert recalls in your issue of February 1, was a genius as a surgeon and a Napoleonic personality. At the time he wrote the letter to President Roosevelt which Dr. Gumpert quotes he was working with the American Medical Association to prevent the inclusion of health insurance in the original Social Security Act, which the President's Committee on Economic Security was then drafting.

Doctor Cushing proposed much more than a coordination of federal health services, for he included, as Dr. Gumpert said, not only the Public Health Service but also the Children's Bureau, old-age insurance, and the Food and Drug Administration. A long step in the realization of his ideas was taken last summer when President Truman, acting under powers conferred by Congress, consolidated all the chief health, education, and welfare functions of the federal government in the present Federal Security Agency and subsequently proposed that such an agency should be a regular department with Cabinet status. Now comes the Fulbright-Taft bill. It would not set up a Department of Health but comes closer to Dr. Cushing's idea by establishing a Department of Health, Education, and Security.

Unfortunately, the Fulbright-Taft bill, despite this laudable objective, is full of undesirable provisions. It would tie the hands of the Secretary by prescribing in advance the organization of the new department. It makes further objectionable prescriptions concerning administrative policies and the appointment of personnel. There is not space here to go into more detail, but anyone who wishes can obtain a full analysis and copy of the bill itself from the Committee for the Nation's Health, 1790 Broadway, New York 19, New York.

MICHAEL M. DAVIS
New York, February 18

Reduce the Cost

Dear Sirs: There can be no disagreement that public housing undertaken by municipal authorities is vitally necessary to the solution of the nation's housing problem. My point of difference with the thesis expressed by Charles Abrams in his series Homeless America (The Nation, December 21, 28, January 4) is one of emphasis and proportion. He gives the impression that the major way to meet the housing needs of the American people is through public housing. I doubt the necessity or political feasibility of a solution in which public

Crossword Puzzle No 203

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Young hopeful of the Green family
- 6 Extend or extent
- 9 Howl
- 10 Mill's place in literature
- 11 The prima donna and the Russian go into a clinch on the sofa
- 12 A best seller (3 & 4)
- 16 Her Pa's a molder
- 19 In Africa, the river feeding a lake
- 22 Not military policemen
- 23 Recognized
- 24 I'd eaten before ten
- 25 It bloweth where it listeth
- 26 "One Pinch, a hungry, ---- faced villain, A mere anatomy"
- 27 Nora has changed for the river
- 29 Rain would be a change for Persia
- 30 Girls venturing out in modern hats on a stormy day are apt to return looking thus
- 33 This wine is not lawyers' sherry
- 35 Throws up the sponge
- 38 Roseate flower
- 41 Refreshing outcome of a crushing operation
- 42 Doctor's pinch-hitter
- 43 Red wine should never be served thus (3 & 4)
- 44 Ice tower in a glacial crevasse
- 45 Whist! But how noisy!

DOWN

- 1 Exercises a fine discrimination
- 2 Feminine name meaning "a rose"
- 3 By no means a "dry" talker
- 4 Bet in a boa.
- 5 It's no joke if you fall into it

- 6 Fresh-water fish, also known as the rudd (3-3)
- 7 He's a head shorter than Calvin
- 8 He takes Ann up
- 13 I am in the artillery by order
- 14 French parish priest
- 15 They kept the cutlery clean before the days of stainless steel
- 17 Ha! Orion! (anag.)
- 18 Red Indian conjurers
- 20 Stupid
- 21 Dutch province—scene of a German last-ditch stand
- 28 He has the makings of a bore
- 31 Relating to physic or physicians
- 32 Brandishes
- 33 Dashing young fellows of Regency days
- 34 Comes at or on the back
- 36 The Bride of Lammemoor
- 37 Early in calling for help in the Aegean
- 39 Subjects of feminine reticence
- 40 Ferry fare

□—□—□—□

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 202

ACROSS:—1 JACK PROST; 6 NOOKS; 9 NEOZOIC; 10 HILSTON; 11 SPENSER; 12 DILATES; 13 SEE; 15 PUPPET; 17 GROYNIE; 18 OXBYE; 19 CACKLE; 22 MASCOT; 25 FLO; 27 IN A NAME; 28 POLITIC; 30 KEELSON; 31 ITALICS; 32 ROUEN; 33 LANDLORDS; DOWN:—1 JINKS; 2 CLOSEUP; 3 FLOSSIE; 4 OCCURS; 5 TIRADE; 6 NEBULAR; 7 OUSTAY; 8 SENSICENT; 14 SPELL; 15 PICKNICKER; 16 TOE; 17 GEM; 20 CHATEAU; 21 LAISON; 23 ALL HAIL; 24 CATTIER; 25 FENNEL; 26 OPTION; 29 CASTS.

housing would represent the largest volume of housing construction.

Through the additional legislation provided in the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill, which has not yet been introduced in the new Congress, it should be possible for private enterprise to provide decent housing for sale or rental to the lower income groups. The bill would provide more favorable financing terms, which would mean lower monthly housing costs.

In addition, we must bring about a reduction in the capital cost of housing. To do this, we must stimulate modern industrial methods in housing production. Housing today stands almost alone as a remnant of handicraft methods. The result is that consumers must pay the price of an expensive and antiquated method of producing homes. With the economics of mass-production and assembly-line methods, capital costs of housing can be brought down even in today's market.

With both financing charges and capital costs reduced, private enterprise could serve a larger percentage of the families in need of decent homes. For families which still could not afford such decent private housing, public housing would continue to be necessary, but in smaller proportions than Mr. Abrams suggests. CLARK FOREMAN
Washington, February 22

CONTRIBUTORS

HANS REICHENBACH, now on leave from the Department of Philosophy of the University of California, is the author of "Experience and Prediction."

R. P. BLACKMUR is a member of the Department of English at Princeton University. He is the author of "The Second World," "The Expense of Greatness," and "From Jordan's Delight."

ELIZABETH BISHOP is the author of "North and South," which received the Macmillan Poetry Award.

ALBERT GUERARD is professor of comparative and general literature at Stanford University.

CHARLES B. FARRELL has written several reviews for The Nation after having appeared anonymously many times in Mr. Haggin's column.

HAROLD ROSENBERG, author of a book of poems, "Trance above the Streets," is a frequent contributor to the Partisan Review, Commentary, Poetry, and View.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 164

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 22, 1947

NUMBER 12

Manifest Destiny, 1947

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

THE purpose of Mr. Truman's message to Congress was so simple and obvious that it should have been universally understood. The conflicting interpretations applied to it in this country and in Europe reflect only the confusion of a public which has yet to realize that the United States, as the greatest industrial and military power in the world, is going to support its rapidly expanding interests in every continent. No talk about the United Nations will deflect it from that purpose. No scruples about intervention or imperialism. No further dependence on Britain. It may make strategic and diplomatic mistakes; it may move uncertainly, since the implications of overwhelming power are still new to it and run counter to old, established attitudes. Its course of action is not fixed—the contradictions between the policy announced for Greece and Turkey and the policy being pursued in China are apparent—but the objectives and general outline of its policy are now clear. President Monroe's hands-off doctrine has been expanded by President Truman to encompass the globe.

It would be foolish to waste much indignation on the language of the President's message: his unctuous reference to Greek "freedom" and "integrity" and the "necessity of helping free peoples to maintain their free institutions"—as embodied in the noisome, brutal oligarchies ruling Greece and Turkey. All governments are hypocrites and questionable policies are packaged to please the eye of the guileless, moral beholder. It is useful to expose this particular deception only in order to bring to bear as much pressure as possible in defense of the people of those countries, especially of Greece; and to illumine the real and specific intentions behind the President's verbal camouflage.

Put baldly, Mr. Truman's message was a plain declaration of political war against Russia. Nothing more, but also nothing less. Under his plan, American money and arms would be employed simultaneously to establish economic stability and crush rebellion in Greece, thus accomplishing what Britain has failed to accomplish and ending the danger of a Communist-controlled government linked with similar governments in the other Slavic states. By this maneuver the President thinks he can prevent a political "chain reaction" which would engulf Turkey and open the whole Near and Middle East to Soviet domination.

The idea might be feasible, however unappetizing, if the premises were what the Administration apparently believes them to be. But the new strategy, as Mr. Truman outlined it, is based on a series of false assumptions about the situation in Eastern Europe.

What Mr. Truman charges is that the guerrilla forces fighting in the mountains of northern Greece and their political sympathizers in the population are actually nothing more than Russian-inspired terrorists who must be crushed by force of arms (American arms) lest a "totalitarian" regime be imposed upon the Greek people. Whether the guerrillas have received help—or if so, to what extent—from across the borders, the President obviously does not know, since he sprang his drastic program on the world without waiting for the findings of the United Nations commission now investigating the disturbances in northern Greece. But one thing is dead sure without any new evidence: the Greek guerrillas have received far less help from any source than the government's army has received from the British; and still they fight on. They fight, not because Russia orders them to, but because they have the backing of a large part of the Greek people who have suffered beyond endurance at the hands of right-wing irregulars and soldiers, armed and trained by the British. Terror has been practiced on both sides in Greece, but by ignoring the terror of the right Mr. Truman betrayed a shocking indifference to the human and political realities of the Greek struggle. And he demonstrated his faulty understanding of the situation all over Eastern Europe.

The truth is, Russia's influence in the Balkans rises from two things: first, from the fact that the Red Army defeated the Germans and then occupied the area; and, second, from the more basic fact that those countries, ripe for change long before 1939, emerged from the horror of occupation and civil war and economic collapse with no practical alternative to revolution. The necessary and inevitable overturn in no way threatened Moscow's long-range interests. On the contrary, the Soviet

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

Manifest Destiny, 1947 by Freda Kirchwey	317
Had Enough?	319
The Shape of Things	320

ARTICLES

Two Worlds in Moscow by Alexander Werth	322
Dixie in Black and White: I. by A. G. Mezerik	324
Italy on the Hard Road Back by J. Alvarez del Vayo	327
Carrie Chapman Catt by Mildred Adams	330
Conscience in California by Henry Geiger	331
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	333
In One Ear by Lou Frankel	334

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Psychology and Symbols by Eleanor Clark	335
The Poor Man's Jeremiah by David T. Bazelon	336
The Isthmus by Elizabeth Wilder	336
Briefer Comment	338
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch	338
Films by James Agee	339
Art by Clement Greenberg	340
Records by B. H. Haggin	342

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 343

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 204
by Jack Barrett 344Editor and Publisher: *Freda Kirchwey*Managing Editor: J. King Gordon Literary Editor: *Randall JarrellEuropean Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Ralph BatesAssistant Managing Editor: *Jerry Tallmer*Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside, Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting, Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.Business Manager: *Hugo Van Arx*Advertising Manager: *William B. Brown*Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

*Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 15, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

Union backed revolution in the Balkans for national as well as for ideological reasons. Neighboring countries with Communist-controlled governments have provided a security belt, a strategic bulwark against possible future attack and a defense against the pressure of Western economic interests. While the Western powers have done their best to stifle social change, Russia could capitalize upon it; a vast advantage in fighting a political war.

No criticism of Moscow's methods in the Balkans, however justified, can alter these fundamentals. American officials may demand the institution of democratic processes and denounce one-party states, but if they continue to ignore—as they have constantly done in the past—the indigenous character of the revolutions in those countries, the Truman doctrine will fail miserably, as the Churchill doctrine has failed, in Greece.

For Greece is also a nation in revolution; and in spite of the active leadership of Communists in the resistance forces, that revolution was not made in Moscow. That it may be exploited by Moscow for Russia's larger strategic ends can hardly be questioned. What must be denied is the assumption, Mr. Truman's major false assumption, that Russian ambitions can be blocked by propping up the Greek government in the name of "democracy," or by crushing the guerrillas in the name of "freedom from outside pressure" and coercion.

Defenders of the new doctrine will argue that we are not interested in any special government in Greece; we are interested only in restoring order and stability by lifting the shattered country out of chaos and by helping the government—any legally constituted government—to put down rebellion. But this statement leaves the real issue untouched. Rebuilding Greece to at least the low economic level that existed in the years before the war would ease the suffering of the people; and it should be undertaken without delay. It might, if successful, reduce political tension and moderate the rigors of revolution. Why this necessary task should be undertaken by the United States in solitary munificence is another question, and must be dealt with separately. The point I want to make here, in response to the apologists for the Truman doctrine, is that stabilizing an economic system that needs to be rooted out and strengthening a government that needs to be overthrown—or at least invited to resign—are not going to provide a lasting substitute for thoroughgoing social change. They will not solve the problem of a poor country which has been subjected for years to a succession of grasping, inefficient governments, ranging from fascist dictatorship to corrupt oligarchy, interested above all else in dragging the last penny of tribute out of the people in order to maintain a small and lavishly ornate aristocratic society. France was not more fatally poised for revolution in 1789, or Russia in 1917.

That no comparable change occurred in Greece in 1944 was the responsibility of the Churchill government. It will be repeated in the days ahead. Sane Americans must ask themselves whether they want to continue the Churchill policy, however embellished with up-to-date American technology and lend-lease arms. They must ask themselves whether they really want to fight the political war Mr. Truman has declared. It is a war we cannot win, and Russia knows it. The editorials in Pravda and Izvestia are convincing evidence that Moscow regards the new American doctrine with resentment but not with alarm. The Russians know we do not intend to fight them with arms, and they will be sure they can turn our proposed intervention into a propaganda weapon against us.

The President's brusque dismissal of the United Nations as an agency through which relief and rehabilitation could be brought to Greece was alone sufficient to expose the political nature of his program.

Last October the Food and Agricultural Organization of the U. N. completed a remarkable study of the economic situation in Greece and the measures necessary to bring about an improvement. The full report, which has just been made available, describes the desperate poverty of Greece, the breakdown of its civil service, and the antiquated system of taxation that accentuates the violent extremes of wealth and misery in the country. The recommendations of the commission are very concrete and should be studied by every Congressman and Senator before the hearings on the President's program begin. The F. A. O. proposes the creation of a special United Nations Mission, superseding all other bodies, to operate the program of reconstruction and development. How the work should be done is set down in detail. Financial estimates are included: loans totaling $100,000,000 as a start. And minimum reforms to be carried through by the Greek government are proposed as prerequisites to the whole program. Significantly, the commission advises that military expenditures be sharply scaled down; evidently it did not contemplate war to the death with the guerrillas.

The F. A. O. report is so sound and humane, and so practical in its recommendations, that its publication at this time will, I think, prove an embarrassment to the Administration. It provides for everything Mr. Truman demanded except political war. If it does not go far enough to settle the civil struggle in Greece, it at least promises amelioration. And, by explaining exactly how the machinery of the United Nations can be used to carry out a large-scale program, it dramatizes the President's insistence on unilateral action.

The Administration may discover that a plan like this appeals to large elements of the public, and to members of Congress, who have no stomach for new and grandiose adventures in power politics. The people have been urged to believe that the interests of the United States are tied to the success of the United Nations. They may well decide that they prefer the proposals of the F. A. O. to the proposals of Mr. Truman. They may reject the idea of defending those interests by engaging in political war with Soviet Russia.

Had Enough?

IT IS too early to tell whether the voters have already "had enough" of the Republicans, though Dr. Gallup indicates that they have, but after two short months the Republicans in Congress behave as if they had had too much of each other. Not even the Democratic Party of the latter-day New Deal, suffering the sting of daily collision between its Southern wing and the Republican enemy, was so noisily at war with itself as the G. O. P. today. What is more, the Democratic cleavage at least made sense ideologically, whereas the current Republican squabbling is in large part merely the consequence of personal rivalries sparked by Presidential ambitions. The Democrats suffered from having conflicting programs; the Republicans from having no program at all.

One need not, of course, accept the word of the Democratic National Committee that the Republicans, having "sowed the hot air of empty promises," are now left to "reap the burning whirlwind of national problems unsolved." G. O. P. leaders themselves put the matter less figuratively. From the extreme right comes the querulous voice of Senator Bushfield of South Dakota: "The leaders of Congress are in confusion among themselves and have not agreed upon any major legislation which we had promised. . . . Putting it bluntly, we have failed in everything which we promised the voters." And Senator Jenner, representing the ultra-conservative Indiana machine that ran over Charles La Follette, has served notice "on my distinguished colleagues on both sides of the aisle that, as a freshman Senator, I am disgusted."

Sniping from a middle position, young Senator Lodge of Massachusetts has admonished his colleagues that the people "did not intend that in voting Republican they were voting for reaction." And Senator Baldwin of Connecticut, on behalf of sixteen Senate "freshmen" (aged thirty-eight to sixty-seven), recently addressed a round-robin letter to Republican leaders protesting the brush-off the newcomers have received at the hands of the Senate Big Four.

On what passes for the left in the G. O. P., scarcely a trace of party discipline remains. Senator Morse, who keeps his party franchise only by campaigning indiscriminately for Republicans at election time, last week let loose a blast at his esteemed National Committee chairman for having demanded "team play." "If his party leaders have their way," said Mr. Morse, "they will lead this country to a laissez faire economy which rests on the principle of the exploitation of human beings for profit." Similarly acid observations came from Senators Aiken and Tobey.

On the floor of both houses we have the spectacle of Republican against Republican on every major issue that has come before the Congress. The party is split from top to bottom on which should have the right of way, tax reduction or payment on the national debt, with Representative Knutson's proposed 20 per cent tax cut due for a bitter intra-party free-for-all. The Lilienthal appointment has sharply divided Taft and Vandenberg, along with their respective followers, without in the least closing the breach between Taft and Bricker, even though both are opposed to the appointment. Bricker went out of his way to dissociate himself from the precise Taft line of attack on Lilienthal and has yet to renounce his Presidential ambitions in favor of his fellow-Ohioan, as predicted. Vandenberg has ranged his followers against those party colleagues who are bent on wiping out the reciprocal trade program, and House G. O. P. leaders are grumbling against their opposite numbers in the Senate for soft-pedaling the labor issue. And now the President's speech on Greece, it may be assumed, will add to all this fragmentation by opposing those Republicans whose Russophobia transcends their isolationism to those who take their isolationism straight.

To Mark Sullivan, all this sound and fury merely indicates that "crystallization" is in progress. To a less charitable eye it appears that the Republicans, having built their house in the hot haste of an election campaign, are now trying vainly to agree on a foundation.

The Shape of Things

WINSTON CHURCHILL'S ONSLAUGHT against the Labor government's economic policies has been described by reporters present as one of his most brilliant efforts. Viewed in cold print, however, his speech seems to be more colorful than constructive. The fact is that he and the party he leads have no program of their own and are unable even to follow a consistent line of criticism. For months they have been accusing the government of imposing an unnecessary degree of "austerity" on the country; now the coal crisis has forced them to take the opposite tack and denounce ministerial failure to restrict fuel consumption at the beginning of the winter. Even on foreign policy Mr. Churchill attempts to ride horses galloping in opposite directions. He damns the government for wasting man-power by staying in Palestine and then blasts it for getting out of India, where British rule could only be sustained by a much greater expenditure. It will take more than speeches of this kind, however glittering their phraseology, to shake the government's position. More damaging are the criticisms to which it has been subjected inside the government party. Labor members have charged, with some truth, that the Cabinet has many plans but no coordinated plan and that it has been timid about taking the country into its confidence. Undoubtedly, the fuel crisis has diminished the prestige of Mr. Attlee's team, but it has also given that team a new chance, for it has shocked Britons into fuller realization of the magnitude of the problems they are facing. Now that they know the worst, the British people are likely to respond to this challenge as vigorously as they have responded to other challenges to their existence.

✱

FIVE JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURT, WITH the supposedly conservative Justice Jackson as spokesman, have decided that the Wagner act gives collective-bargaining rights to unions of foremen. The other four, led by the allegedly left-wing Justice Douglas, contest this view, holding that foremen are part of management. It seems to us that the views of the majority rather than of the minority correspond to the letter and spirit of the Wagner act, and certainly they show a greater understanding of the facts of industrial life. In his dissenting opinion, Justice Douglas asserted that the decision of his five colleagues tended not only "to obliterate the line between management and labor" but "to emphasize that the basic opposing forces in industry are not management and labor but the operating group on the one hand and the stockholder and bondholder group on the other." From this statement he proceeds to the reductio ad absurdum argument that if foremen are "employees" with the right of collective bargaining, so are vice-presidents. We think it would be truer to say that the growing atomization of corporate ownership and its divorce from management theoretically put top executives in the position of "hired men" but actually make them independent of ownership. Real power in an increasing number of large corporations is concentrated in the hands of management groups, which tend to become self-supporting and self-perpetuating, with interests differing from those of both workers and stockholders. In any case, there is a clear line to be drawn between these policy-making officials and foremen; the latter may be the non-commissioned officers of the industrial army, but, as in the real army, their status is that of enlisted men.

✱

SHOULD PUBLIC EMPLOYEES BE DENIED THE right to strike under all circumstances? It may be easy to answer that question in a totalitarian state, but in a democracy, we submit, no blanket rule is admissible. We may agree that it is a right which guardians of the public safety, such as policemen and firemen, may have to forego, but if they are forbidden to strike they should be protected by a guaranty of better-than-going wage rates and stringent bargaining and arbitration provisions. In the case of teachers and most other public employees, we believe that, under the present circumstances of employment, they should be free to strike when they have exhausted all other means of persuading the authorities to consider their grievances. The Republican majority in the New York Legislature, however, not content with a general ban against strikes in the civil-service law of the state, has jammed through without hearings a bill imposing harsh penalties on public employees who collectively walk off the job. Such strikers, the bill declares, must be instantly dismissed from the service and reinstated only on condition (a) that their pay shall for three years be not greater than it was before dismissal, and (b) that for a five-year period they shall be treated as on probation and without tenure. This bill now goes to Governor Dewey, and as he is generally credited not only with promoting it but with insisting on amendments increasing its severity, there seems little doubt that it will receive his signature. The crying need of the public service, however, locally and nationally, is not more curbs of this nature but remedies for conditions that tend to exclude from it people of ability and character.

✱

IF THE COMMUNISTS ARE AS DIABOLICAL AS they are reputed to be, they will send delegations to Washington to lobby for the mess of crackpot legislation that has been introduced to outlaw them. Some of the proposed bills we have noted would leave the comrades free to pursue their disruptive way, enhanced by martyrdom and bothered only to the extent of having to convert themselves into some such thing as an American Workers' Progressive Labor Party, with an avowed program no more dangerous than the Elks. Others of these bills might indeed choke off the Communists, but they too have a flaw: they would choke off the rest of us as well—maybe even Rankin himself. His bill, for example, provides ten years in jail for anyone who "conveys the impression of sympathy with or approval of communism or Communist ideology" either in the classroom, in private letters, or in print. To many potential jurors in this country, public power is pretty pink, and it was Rankin—then known as "Cheap Juice John"—who fathered the TVA in the House. Then there is the Hobbs bill, which would jail a government official for recommending or approving a person who turned out to be "subversive"—a term that embraces "conduct . . . inimical to the government of the United States or the tendency of which is to impede" any of its projects. Like the OPA, for instance? There would not be jails enough to hold all the Republicans who worked to undermine the New Deal. These farces need not be taken seriously as long as we have free elections and a Supreme Court, but Secretary of Labor Schwollenbach's call for a legal ban on the Communists is genuinely disturbing. A man of sobriety and usually good judgment, he should know that such blunderbuss treatment would hit only the innocents, while, as our "subversive" contemporary, the Wall Street Journal, points out, the Communists themselves would "flourish like the green bay tree."

✱

WHILE IT IS WRITTEN FROM A CONSERVATIVE standpoint and contains a number of serious omissions, the A. F. of L. delegation's report on trade-union conditions in Argentina should be studied by everyone concerned with Latin American affairs. The delegation finds that the General Confederation of Labor is now completely subordinated to the Perón government and that it has neither the power to elect its officers nor to make its own policies. The Argentine Department of Labor has itself become a union organizer, employing means that are familiar enough in the labor history of fascist states. Resisting officials are arrested, dismissed from their posts, or, as in the case of the former general secretary, Señor Gay, simply spirited away. Strikes, wage demands, and organizational plans are all dictated by cliques responsive to the government's direction. At the same time, Perón is carrying on a campaign against the unions outside the new Labor Front. It is true, the A. F. of L. delegates declare, that for the time being labor derives certain advantages from its forced alliance. In many industries wages have been raised by a nominal 25 per cent. Long overdue social legislation has been enacted. Perhaps because the delegates have sought to avoid the charge of political intervention, there is no mention of the important fact that wage increases pass through the hands of Perón's Ministry of Labor. Nor is it pointed out that while millions of pesos have been amassed in the old-age-pension fund, very little has been received by the beneficiaries.

✱

HOW LONG WILL PERON'S PATERNALISM continue? At present, the army and the ranching and land-owning classes, whose interests and traditions are paramount with the government, have their own feuds with the manufacturers and with the navy, and therefore find it expedient to play up to labor. But what will happen when the strategy changes? The great likelihood is that the Argentine workers will discover, as others have done, that eventual losses will far outweigh present gains. Labor may find that it has become the tool of that expansionist nationalism which dominates the minds of the army leaders and of Perón himself. So much is suggested by the reply made to the A. F. of L. charges by the present federation secretary, Aurelio Hernandez, himself a Ministry of Labor nominee imposed upon the unions by intimidation. According to the Labor Front boss, the A. F. of L. report is merely intended to support Spruille Braden's "imperialist policies." This absurd accusation is clearly intended to win popular support for Perón's rearmament campaign.

Two Worlds in Moscow

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Moscow, March 15 (by Cable)

AT THE end of the first week of the conference Moscow has an uncomfortable feeling that the discordant squawking of the Ministers' quartet is not half so important as the brass-band accompaniment coming out of Washington. Many Americans are happy about Mr. Truman's speech, but the Russians are acutely upset; as was to be expected; while the British, including even Bevin, are scratching their heads and the French are holding theirs in their hands. People are asking what it all means, right in the midst of the conference. What is the significance of the peculiar timing? Even assuming Greece is "a very special case," why is Turkey's independence regarded as threatened when, in reality, the Russians have been laying off Turkey for the last few months more than ever before? Russia and the Black Sea powers clearly have a case where the Dardanelles are concerned. Why prop up the Turks to such an extent that they will hardly be in a mood to discuss reasonable proposals for revising the Montreux treaty?

But what is worrying the Russians, British, and French in varying degrees is not Greece and Turkey so much as those more general considerations in Truman's speech which are already being described as "the new American foreign policy." Two sets of reactions can be noted. On the American side in conference quarters you hear it said, "The Russians have been asking for it. They've done nothing but snipe at us in their propaganda, insult us as fascists and imperialists, and we've had enough." The Russians, of course, have promptly compared Truman to Hitler, and said he was trying to revive the anti-Comintern pact and the idea of a cordon sanitaire against Russia. Stung by the sharpness of his comments on totalitarian influences in Rumania, Bulgaria, and Poland, they also comment, "He says all this allegedly in defense of the highest principles of pure democracy as he understands it, but he doesn't say one word against totalitarian regimes such as Spain and Argentina. In other words, the right-wing totalitarian regimes are quite O. K. but anything that he chooses to call a totalitarian left-wing regime is anathema. And anyway, what sort of democracies are Greece and Turkey—it's enough to make a cat laugh!"

Whether one takes seriously or not the talk of American imperialism—though the military implications of the loan to Turkey are pretty obvious—the question inevitably aroused in every mind is whether we are going to have one world or two. Is it to be Russia and its "victims" on one side and America and all the rest of decent humanity on the other? But many of the French and British here feel this is just the question Truman did not care to analyze carefully. For isn't there rather a crude identification in the speech between "democracy" and "the American way of life"? There is a third group of humanity which rejects communism but equally rejects the American way of life. Did Truman overlook Socialist England? Did he forget France, at least half of which is either Socialist or Communist? Moreover, in Europe several sets of ideas and ideologies are in conflict, and to say, "You've got to choose between the Soviet way of life and the American way of life," is considered a crude oversimplification of the mental processes of the people of the Continent. If that is the case in Europe, how much more complicated are the problems of human conduct and aspirations in the immense areas of Asia and Africa! Why, even in terms of "pure democracy," is Chiang Kai-shek's China so much worthier an object than Red China, which at least has certain standards of efficiency, discipline, honesty, and human decency that corrupt Kuomintang China lacks?

Such are some of the general considerations one hears on the fringes of the Moscow conference, where, it must be said, these fundamental issues are being talked about much more than at the Foreign Ministers' meetings proper, with their dreary mudslinging contests between Molotov and Bevin—one denouncing the state of affairs in the British zone of Germany, the other in the Soviet zone. Who cares? In all fairness to Bevin, he did not start it, and it is not clear what practical purpose, except filling the air and the Russian newspapers with his speeches, Molotov is hoping to achieve by cataloguing all the shortcomings of the British in their zone. For so far as foreign opinion is concerned, he knows that Bevin in the next hour will throw an equally heavy packet of the Control Council's reports at his head.

Bevin no doubt made a useful point when he said denazification was such an immensely difficult problem that there were inevitable shortcomings in all four zones. But is denazification today the real problem? Are there not much more serious features of the German situation to worry people in Moscow today? Truman alluded to the existence of two worlds, and are there not in fact already two Germanys? The Russians have been clamoring for "German economic unity." The British and the ALEXANDER WERTH is special correspondent at Moscow for The Nation, the Manchester Guardian, and the British Broadcasting Corporation.

Americans are saying that economic unity was originally prevented by the Russians when they were unwilling to ship food from eastern to western Germany, which led western Germany in turn to suspend the delivery of reparations to Russia. Now, with the large liquidation of German industry in the eastern zone—what there was of it—would not the economic unity of Germany be a liability to Britain and America unless the Russians "put money into it," that is, unless they at least provided their zone with adequate equipment for intensive food-growing?

So there is clearly no hurry on the part of the Western powers to establish German economic unity or scrap the industries in their zones. Nor is there much desire for political unity, for that matter. The Russians have been asking that the democratic political parties—by which they mean in the first place the Socialist Unity Party—and the trade unions be allowed to have their all-German congresses and their central organs or newspapers. But the feeling among the Western powers against centralization remains strong.

Many of the French are completely cynical about the whole thing. This is the sort of talk one hears in French quarters: Of course England has no intention of scrapping the bulk of the Ruhr industries. Western Germany has got to become a prosperity area in Europe whether the Russians like it or not. It is too bad if foul people like the Germans have the benefit of living in the prosperity zone, but western Germany is essential to the whole economy of Western Europe—England, France, Belgium, Holland. Such, say the French, is the American point of view. According to the French speaker's taste he adds or does not add a discourse on the American monopoly capitalist's interest in western Germany and trots out or does not trot out stories about sinister American links with German capitalist trusts, cartels, and monopolies. Some declare frankly that Germany will be the industrial spearhead against Russia; others simply say that it will be the citadel of Western Europe's prosperity. Many Frenchmen add, "We don't like it, but France and England are poor, miserable countries and, in the end, we will do just as the Americans tell us, whether we like it or not." Such cynicism is not in the British nature, and one hears much talk from Englishmen here about German Social Democrats doing this and that and about the nationalization of western Germany's industries, and so on. But anyway, it is a far cry from Morgenthau's ruralization of western Germany.

By the time this appears in print we may have some clearer ideas on what is likely to be achieved by the Foreign Ministers' conference. A study of the Control Council's report, with mutual recriminations, will take several more days, and one can only join in Bidault's prayer that agreement on a whole group of proposals at the end of the discussions will be easier than agreement on the proposals one by one. A view authoritatively expressed in British quarters is that this is not Versailles, where the victorious powers produced a set of ready-made solutions. Germany is today the sick man of Europe, and the whole process of treaty-making must be very different from what it was in 1919. The German treaty will, in fact, be only the registration of a certain status quo which will emerge after a long process of implementing instructions to the Control Council.

A further profound complication arises from the question—linked with the whole problem of when, if ever, there will be a central German government—whether it is to be called a treaty with Germany or a treaty for Germany. The American compromise proposal for calling it simply "the German treaty" will probably be challenged by Molotov; already the Russian press is asking whether it will be a treaty or a diktat—obviously an important political question.

The only forecast about the outcome of the conference now possible is that a large number of new instructions will be sent to the Control Council and that the draft of a peace treaty with Austria may be more or less completed, though even that is uncertain.

In one matter the Russians appear to be sadly disappointed. The phrase "Anglo-Americans" is beginning to reappear with growing frequency. Their great hope, as I wrote last week, was that England might follow an "independent policy." So far there is not much evidence of this. In British quarters some are saying, "How can there be when we simply must get another loan from America?" Others remark, "Bevin is in a very sticky spot. The Truman speech is sure to increase the opposition to America's and Bevin's policy—if it remains the same policy—and unless Bevin brings back from Moscow a new alliance with Russia there'll be hell to pay inside the Labor Party." And there is an acutely uncomfortable feeling among many British that if Truman's two-worlds policy is pursued, the consequences may be extremely serious. It might even mean the collapse of the United Nations and an increased danger of war—war in which England might be the chief victim.

There is another aspect to the whole thing. Will Truman's speech help the difficult and slow settling-down process in some parts of Europe, a process which begins to be observable in some countries—in Poland, for instance? The Polish government has undoubtedly achieved much in the way of economic restoration and has not been excessively interfered with in its work by a truculent and belligerent opposition. Isn't there a danger, it is asked, of this opposition becoming more active now and retarding economic restoration? Would this really benefit the Polish people as a whole?

There is another danger. The Russians are today economically weak and suffering from a variety of post-war difficulties, and they feel that America is cashing in on these temporary weaknesses. This is creating a feeling of anger and resentment in the bulk of the people. It is a psychological factor which should not be overlooked. Russia in isolation may become a more disturbing factor in the world's thinking than Russia even superficially "cooperating" with the West. We saw it playing such a role during various periods between the two wars.

Dixie in Black and White

BY A. G. MEZERIK

I

Chapel Hill, North Carolina

ALONE of the regions in the United States the South has a tradition of a hereditary aristocracy, of landed bourbons. Their philosophy, molded by generations of slave-holding, has been contemptuous of those who work in trade, industry, or the learned professions. These bourbons were and are the great resisters of change, the strong defenders of their yesterdays.

The virtues and vices of the Southern bourbons are not confined to their class but have set a stamp on the whole society. The South has glorified physical prowess and adventure, the exploits of the hunter, the pomp and courage of the military man. It has nourished a strangely distorted code of chivalry which expresses itself even now in duels, fights, and horsewhippings. It exalts sportsmanship and gives a high place to horse-racing, cock-fighting, and feuding.

The legacies of the plantation mind are apparent to this day in the opposition to progress in education, health, industrialization, unionization, and religious practices. Religion has felt this hand of the past very heavily, perhaps because spiritual aspirations are conditioned by other goals. The South has always had the largest percentage of church members of any section in the country; it has, in fact, been derisively called the "Bible belt." The God of the Southern Protestant churches has been, much more than in any other region, a personal God, watching over the individual, assuming responsibility for his luck or misfortune, supporting him in his fights and feuds. The aim of the church has been the good individual rather than the good society.

This is the setting in which the South has matured. There have been some changes, but until recently they have lagged far behind the needs of the people. The great crisis of 1930 ushered in a violent awakening. And with the advent of Roosevelt in 1933, factors which would begin the transformation of the social, political, and economic status of the South came into being. The waste of land was slowed by programs to correct soil erosion. The farmer, accustomed to thinking of himself as a lone individual who had no interest in a society bigger than his family clan, found that a nation was interested in his welfare. Without markets for his produce, with hunger penetrating his kitchen, the farmer awoke to the meaning, in his own life, of government purchases of his crop at prices far above the open market. His brother in the villages and the towns found that in work relief, PWA and WPA, society was showing an interest in him too, and he reciprocated that interest. Farmer and townsman began to think about their government, to go to the polls, and to look around at the bigger world.

Farm Security brought the first freedom from the fear that a man might work hard to create a home and a farm and lose his all to a bad crop—and it would be no one's business, for in the bourbon ideology, no one cared. Social Security erased a few of the lines in Southern faces with the hint that old age might not be the years of the unwanted they had always been. Laws on minimum wages and maximum hours brought a tiny surcease from the never-ending struggle to earn a bare living and to get some resting time that wasn't also worry time. And the TVA was being built, providing work and a new way of life for a region.

The towns which dot this rolling countryside are lovely. Raleigh, Durham, Charlotte, and Greensboro have a warm ingratiating quality which seems to insure ease of living. There is a pervasive feeling that things move slowly, that the even tenor of old ways could not easily be disturbed. Yet the old is giving way to the new.

On a sunny, cool morning of November, in the beautiful mountain resort of Asheville, the North Carolina Baptist Convention was holding its 116th annual meeting. The "messengers," as the delegates from the local churches are called, listened to the report of the Committee on Social Service and Civic Righteousness,

A. G. MEZERIK, author of "The Revolt of the South and West," has spent the past several months making a new survey of the South. This is the first of a series of articles on current social and economic trends.

The committee made recommendations, and the chair asked for a vote. The report was unanimously adopted.

The Baptists, the religious denomination to which Bilbo and Talmadge belong, had voted to support hospitalization, education, and suffrage for Negroes, with facilities and opportunities fully equal to those enjoyed by whites. They stood foursquare for an end to segregation in the church, and the committee's report told why:

If there is an equality of all men by virtue of their relationship to an impartial Creator, and an equality of all believers who share in the redemption of Christ, such equalities must be respected in the body of Christ, which is the church. Therefore, segregation of believers holding to the same tenets of faith, because of color or social status, into racial or class churches is a denial of the New Testament affirmation of the equality of all believers at the foot of the Cross, and alien to the spirit of Christ, the head of the church.

This was unprecedented, and the final planks in the platform were just as revolutionary. The North Carolina branch of the Southern Baptist Church moved into politics to achieve Christian aims. The messengers of the church asked for the immediate passage of a federal anti-lynching bill. And in full acceptance of the logic of the times they went on to call for equal wages and equal treatment for Negro workers and the passing of such legislation, both state and national, as would assure fair treatment.

The teletype brought the news to North Carolina's many independent newspapers. Liberal editors were bewildered. Not one wrote a paragraph in praise of the Baptists' action. Fair Employment Practices had suddenly come out of the closet, and they didn't know what to do. A Southern editor, however enlightened his other policies, had never felt he could support the FEPC in his columns; his readers, he thought, would not stand for it. Then came this bolt out of the blue: the preachers of the Bible belt, he discovered, were ahead of him. Nor did the liberal and labor organizations mobilize support for this grass-roots moral renaissance. Though they were publicly on record for the FEPC, they had not looked hard enough at the change being wrought in the people on the farms and in the towns to be prepared for the stand taken at Asheville. Not so slow to act were those on the other side, the Baptists who had long rendered lip service to their church but in their personal, social, and political decisions had violated its spirit. Over night the convention received three thousand indignant telegrams, and the telephone circuits to Asheville were unable to cope with the number of calls for the assembled religious leaders from old familiars who opposed their action.

The onslaught was effective, and the next morning the messengers reconsidered. The session was hectic. By a vote of 253 to 158 the convention rescinded the ringing passage quoted above, which would have banned segregation within the church. And with this backtracking went a watering-down of the crucial FEPC resolution, which was changed from a demand for legislation to one for equal treatment. The demand for an anti-lynching law and for equal hospitalization, suffrage, and education withstood the attack. While the original resolution is no longer on the record, what was so eloquently said will live. All through the South the FEPC is on the lips of people who formerly dismissed any discussion of it on the ground that Southerners—particularly the churchgoing folk—would die rather than accept it.

The Baptists had already made forays against race prejudice in Virginia, Florida, and Georgia. In Florida the Ministerial Association of Greater Miami, shocked by an attempt to revive the Ku Klux Klan in the name of Protestantism, had acted with swiftness and vigor. They declared:

As ministers of the gospel of Christ we not only oppose the position and principles of the Ku Klux Klan, but we also strongly advise our people to have no part in furthering its organization. We are not alone opposed to the Ku Klux Klan, but also to the apparent tendency on the part of many people to assume that the Klan is a Protestant organization. . . . We do not consider the Ku Klux Klan as representing Protestant Christianity in any condition or expression, since it is a denial of Christianity itself. . . . The Ku Klux Klan is the precise denial of everything truly American and democratic.

In Georgia the Reverend Joseph Rabun, pastor of the church to which the late Gene Talmadge belonged, demanded more teeth in the resolution on racial relations submitted to the messengers at the Georgia Baptist Convention. In the struggle of the old against the new the Talmadges and Bilbos find themselves fighting a growing movement within their own churches. Whipping up race hate does not serve them in fighting churchmen. Nor can they go into their accustomed routine and berate Baptists as Yankee meddlers. The argument falls on deaf ears, for the Southern Baptist Convention came into being on the issue of secession. Its tradition and record make the demagogues' claim to being the sole guardians of sectional patriotism look pallid indeed.

The old mis-leaders so familiar to the South have new antagonists, born of the changes which have slowly been taking place in the Southern people. That these should be joined, or led, by the Baptist church is truly heartening, for no other spiritual influence is so widespread and

Drawings by Golden powerful in the region. The Baptists have large and wealthy congregations in the cities; in the rolling country of the agrarian South no village is without a Baptist minister. The church has lived with the people of the city and of the farm. It has also been an integral part of the company town, where the evolution of a new attitude on race has lately been strikingly demonstrated.

Thomasville, North Carolina, one of the many company towns that dot the Piedmont, is the domain of the Thomas Chair Company. The company has made the rules for the residents and enforced its own conception of the proper social pattern, including segregation. The Thomas plants run down one side of the main street in Thomasville; stores line the other. The railroad parallels the street, and its smoke and noise are always present. None of the beauty and quiet of the North Carolina landscape penetrates the town, nor for a long time did any sense of community responsibility.

Then came a strike. The 350 Negroes and the 954 whites employed in the plant walked out together—uncertain of where they were going, of whether they could trust each other, of what the all-powerful employer might do. In the forefront of everyone's mind those first days were two questions. The first was, if the strike lasted, how would the strikers and their families continue to eat? For the wages they had received had permitted no savings. The other could not be asked aloud; the etiquette of Southern bourbons had made it taboo. The Negro wondered how he should behave to the white man on the picket line and in the union hall. The white man was perplexed by that and a related question: what would his neighbors say if he let down the old barriers?

The answer to the economic question came speedily. The merchants supported the strikers. They gave credit to the families of the men so they could buy food, and many business and professional people contributed $10 a week to the strike fund. It was a long strike. Repeated "back-to-work" movements initiated by the employers failed. The company's greatest effort enrolled twenty-two scabs, not one of whom was a Negro.

In the long days and nights on the picket line, in union meetings, and at crude canteens the relations between Negroes and whites were clarified. Before long they marched together before the gates; soon they ate together; and after a time they sat down together and played cards. Forty-five strike leaders met constantly in the union hall to plan their course, and there were nearly as many Negroes as whites on this Steering Committee. When they had finished for the day, they had coffee and doughnuts, continuing in mixed groups their never-ending discussion of how to win the strike. It was not a recognized process of cementing race relations—that ticklish subject was never more than touched upon. The strike could not be won if the workers were divided. And everybody understood.

They understood so well that on Labor Day, when the strikers marched down the smoke-blown street, white man walked next to Negro, white woman beside black. There was no defiance of native prejudices in that parade: friends and fellow-workers marched quite unconsciously side by side. At last the day of victory came, and there was a real celebration. Outside the union hall the strikers clustered, gay now, doing little dances, congratulating each other. Upstairs there were jigs, songs—and a new union contract. This, though it said nothing of the rights of Negroes or the obligations of whites, was, in a moving sense, a charter for both.

The state's educational institutions have felt the same influence. In the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill the ferment of change has long been working. Years ago Howard Odum and Frank Graham picked up the gauntlet of progress. Dr. Odum propounded his theories of regionalism, and the national government in Washington began to translate them into political and social realities. Farm Security, the restoration of soil fertility, the TVA were logical outgrowths of the ideas which came out of the University of North Carolina.

The traditional progressivism of the university finds notable expression in the publication of the magazine Christian Frontiers, called by its editors a "Journal of Baptist Life and Thought." This magazine is attuned to the thinking which brought the Asheville resolution into being, to the morality which condemns as sinful the white man's sense of racial superiority. In the past few months other significant events have occurred on the campus. Dorothy Maynor, the Negro soprano, sang at Graham Memorial Hall to a non-segregated audience, and white and Negro ushers escorted thousands of Carolinians to their seats. This was another manifestation of the awakened fervor of the Southern churches, for the concert was sponsored by the Council for Religion in Life and the proceeds were for the benefit of the Fellowship of Southern Churchmen.

In Raleigh, for the first time in history, a Negro student recently presided over a mixed meeting of North Carolina students. Thirty-four delegates from State Negro College and seventy-nine white students joined together to elect a Negro as pro-tem president of their organization.

The Southern world is definitely on the move, and in North Carolina the pace at which each segment of society is adjusting itself to the new conditions can be seen more clearly than in other Southern states. The liberal who once thought his position so daring now finds he is no longer out in front. While he kept saying, "Don't press us; what we want to do will take a long time; it's got to come slowly," the majority moved beyond him. The weakness of the gradualist position was unwittingly revealed to me by one of North Carolina's liberal editors. Relations between Negroes and white, he said, were much better now than in the time of his father, and he had no doubt that they would be wonderfully improved by the time his infant child was grown up. As he spoke it apparently dawned on him that this slow process might not appeal to persons undergoing the degrading imprisonment of segregation. After a long pause he said, "If only the Negroes will be patient."

If good liberals have been left behind, think what has happened to the bourbons. Their point of view was clearly enunciated by a textile magnate who organized the flood of telegrams and telephone calls to Asheville designed to head off the Baptist resolution. "What made the Baptist messengers pass their resolution?" I asked. The answer was prompt: "Too many red Baptists—the state is full of them!"

Italy on the Hard Road Back

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Rome, March 13

MY FIRST favorable impression of Italy was due in part, I am sure, to seeing the sun again after six weeks of the worst winter Europe has experienced in twenty-five years.

From the moment I crossed the frontier I was literally in close contact with the Italian people; between Milan and Florence we were jammed together like sardines in the corridor of the train. It was Saturday, and all the Milanese seemed to be off on a holiday. When we reached Florence I finally located a seat. Order on the train is assured not by railroad employees but by the people themselves: you call out the next station to a traveler who is getting off there, and as soon as he leaves you take possession of his seat. Despite the staggering crowd aboard, not a single unpleasant incident occurred; everyone helped his neighbor to make the best of the uncomfortable conditions created by the lack of rolling stock. What struck me most was the pervasive air of good humor. In Mussolini's day his admirers abroad were so impressed by the punctuality of Italian trains as to overlook the assassination of Matteotti. Today the trains no longer run on time, but they carry a population which knows how to enjoy its new, hard-won liberty.

In Rome that impression was heightened by the animated throngs out for a stroll on Sunday afternoon. The whole city seemed buoyant and alive. Pastellerias, like Berardo's in the Galleria, were brimming not only with customers but with delicacies that are rarely seen in Paris even in the most expensive shops. People were queued up outside a midtown movie waiting to see an old Rudolph Valentino film—American producers are not shipping their latest films to the dollar-poor countries of Europe.

The age-old problem of Italy—a population twice as large as the soil can support—is nowhere more apparent than in the capital. Despite post-war hardships, the population has grown in the past two years. Moreover, the United States, which used to admit hundreds of thousands of Italians unable to eke out an existence at home, has now practically closed its doors to this immigration. Rome is somewhat encouraged by the recent decision of the Swiss government to supplement its labor force with Italian laborers. Argentina, too, is encouraging immigration, but with a view to the aggrandizement of the present dictatorship. As might be expected, Perón has taken precautions against receiving too many anti-fascists; he has sent Father José Clemente Silva to Rome with instructions to press for a large contingent of Christian Democrats, notwithstanding the demands of the powerful Italian Confederation of Labor for an equitable selection without regard to party.

On the whole the Italians do not appear to be starving, though in Rome as elsewhere in Italy sections of the population are living very wretchedly. The shops are well stocked despite an intensive export program aimed to prevent further, catastrophic devaluation of the lira. The women are not as well dressed as in France, but the impression is of a greater number of people decently clothed and shod. However, prices are mounting steadily: according to the latest figures of the Rome Central Institute of Statistics, the cost-of-living index, based on 100 as of 1938, rose from 2,900 to 3,964 between August and December of last year. A comparison of wages and prices makes one feel that it will take little short of a miracle to keep the Italian workers going. In the textile industry, for example, piece-work wages range from 12,000 to 20,000 lire a month. But a simple meal in Rome costs about 300 lire. Women hat workers, who are comparatively well paid, earn about 4,000 lire a week. But in stores similar to those of New York's Fourteenth Street a pair of shoes costs 5,000 lire and a dress 25,000.

Perhaps the miracle that will carry the Italians through this difficult period lies in their own ingenuity and imagination. Large families take on all sorts of work. In the railroad stations a swarm of youngsters vie with the porters to carry your luggage. I met a government functionary who is holding down four jobs: during the day he works at the Ministry; at night he does bookkeeping for a small firm; in spare moments he translates detective stories from English to Italian; and on Sundays he helps his brother, who owns a popular restaurant.

The frugality of the Italian is well known; bread and spaghetti are the basic elements of his diet, and if a jug of wine is thrown in, so much the better. Unfortunately, however, the monthly ration of spaghetti is used up in a week, and for the rest of the month he must buy in the black market. In Italy the black market operates more democratically than in other countries. I do not deny that many unscrupulous traffickers have made fortunes; obviously the corruption that swept post-war Europe did not skip Italy. As a matter of fact, the other day I heard the Sicilian deputy, Finocchiaro Aprile, accuse the Christian Democrats in government posts of profiteering. No doubt his charges had overtones of demagoguery and Sicilian separatism, but the calmness with which the man in the street accepted them indicates that a certain amount of administrative corruption is taken for granted. Still, I feel that here the black market, in addition to enriching a few selfish men, assures a minimum of food and tobacco to the majority of Italians. The trading is carried on very openly as a natural extension of regular commerce. The center of the black market in currency is the Piazza Colonna; sacrilegious wits say that St. Peter himself presides over the transactions. A story now making the rounds has it that in the days of the liberation, when the dollar was bringing 300 to 400 lire—today it sells for about 600 lire—a speculator who had bought up some dollars one morning at 375 was selling them the same evening for 420. When asked for an explanation he said, "That's the rate St. Peter has set." And indeed, right behind him stood the famous statue of the saint with four fingers outstretched.

Neither the existence of the black market nor isolated instances of bad administration justify the picture of a lazy, corrupt Italy drawn by certain reactionary papers abroad in the months since the people drove out the king and began to map progressive social legislation. On the contrary, the Italy of today is one of the most hard-working countries of Europe and is likely to make the most rapid recovery. Wherever electric current has been restored and raw materials are available, one sees feverish activity. In the factories emphasis is on the perfect craftsmanship that distinguished Italian products in former days and made the leather workers, in particular, masters in their field. The past two years have seen extensive rehabilitation of transport. Few people abroad have any idea how great was the damage inflicted on Italy. Of course they have read about the destruction of historic buildings, famous monuments, and bridges like the Ponte Santa Trinità at Florence, whose arches were one of the glories of the Old World, and about the wanton mutilation of the city of the Medicis which has dishonored the German High Command for all time. But little was written about the hundreds of other bridges and the miles of railroad and telegraph communications destroyed in central and northern Italy, a great deal which has now been repaired. Today classes are in full swing in universities that lack the barest essentials. And, incidentally, professors receive 20,000 lire a month when by pre-war standards and present livings costs they ought to be getting at least 140,000. Yet I know of several who have refused invitations from American colleges—which would have paid them far more—because they believe their duty is to help reorientate a youth poisoned by years of Fascist education.

The feeling of most Italians is that the Allies do not sufficiently appreciate their country's contribution to the general post-war recovery of Europe, and the harsh terms of the recently concluded peace treaty have created a certain bitterness, which extreme right elements have been quick to exploit. Americans may derive satisfaction from the fact that in the last "Doxa" poll, the United States was named the "friendliest nation," with Russia second, and Britain and France sharing last place. Actually, the results indicate not so much friendship for America as hostility toward Britain, which backed the House of Savoy to the bitter end, and toward France, which has stupidly alienated its neighbor by annexing two small, unimportant provinces. The truth is that Italian resentment is directed against all four of the big powers.

To begin with, Italian anti-Fascists will not soon forget how little recognition was accorded their "unknown war" against the Germans. Readers of The Nation may recall that beginning in the fall of 1942 the Political War Section devoted a number of articles to the epic struggle of the workers in Milan and Turin and Naples, about which so little had appeared in the American press. Yet I must confess that until I came here and heard the story from the protagonists in that struggle and read the underground press of those days, I did not fully appreciate the magnitude of the Italian Resistance. Under the leadership of the Committee for the Unity of the Italian People (C. U. P. I.), founded by Pietro Nenni, a Socialist, Ercoli (Palmiro Togliatti), a Communist, and Carlo Celli of the Justice and Liberty movement, who were later joined by leading trade-unionists, Catholics, and liberals, there was waged one of the most glorious people's struggles of the war. Italians fought Germans on French soil; among those who fell before Gestapo machine-guns were Marcello Bertone, coeditor of the Italian anti-Fascist paper in France, Ricardo Rohegger of Trieste, Mario Buzzi, and others. Within a year the C. U. P. I. had 8,000 experienced underground workers in Milan alone. But the movement was not restricted to the industrial cities. It spread quickly to the rural districts and enlisted the support of the peasants. In Rome the rebellious attitude of the students forced the authorities to close the university on May 9, 1942.

After the fall of Mussolini, when further organized army resistance became impossible, the masses took over the conduct of the war; under the inspiration of the partisans, the whole nation rose in arms. Though reluctant to admit the value of an "army" in which career officers shared authority with Socialists and Communists risen to the rank of colonel or general, Allied Headquarters was obliged to state in January, 1944, that "the figure of 300,000 armed Italian patriots can be taken as an understatement of the total number." None the less, the Allied Command, with the honorable exception of Britain's General Alexander, at all times maintained an aloof attitude toward men who not only saved American and British lives but were destined to be the very sinews of the new Italian Republic. On April 10, 1944, the British Admiralty issued a statement praising the behavior of Italian submarine crews, but by some mysterious legerdemain it never reached the press. Apparently Italian anti-Fascists were good enough to die, but not good enough to be encouraged to build a new Italy.

Perhaps the Resistance might have resigned itself to being classified as a third-rate auxiliary force if the Allied Military Government had not systematically opposed everything that meant Italy's orientation in a democratic, socialist direction. Those of us who have followed sympathetically the efforts of the Italian people to root out fascism are aware of this aspect of the story too. But again, I had to come here and talk with leaders of the various political parties—and I saw almost all of them—to understand fully the extent to which the Allies have sabotaged the progressive forces of Italy. Their obstructionist tactics have retarded the consolidation of Italian democracy and forced the government to abandon many projects for nationalization and new social legislation. While conciliatory in tone, former Premier Bonomi's new book, "Diario di un anno," makes it clear that the Anglo-American ideal was an Italy ruled jointly by the monarchy and the Vatican, which would counterbalance a leftist France and ultimately serve, together with Franco Spain, as a bulwark against the advance of socialism in Western Europe.

In the light of these facts, the Italians could not but regard the peace treaty as another injustice against their nation. I have the feeling that most realistic political leaders know the treaty might have been worse, and that the study of possible revisions, already initiated at the suggestion of Britain and America, may bring about favorable modification in the near future. But certain provisions of the treaty—not necessarily the most important, but certainly the most irritating—have given reaction a new opportunity to stir up discontent. The disposition of the Italian navy is a case in point; except for two modern cruisers, it will add little strength to the Allied navies which are to share it. Italians, however, are more disturbed by the loss of the fleet than by the prospect of having to pay reparations far beyond their means; they see in this a blow to their national pride, for during the period of cobelligerency their navy performed major services for the Allies. While intelligent left leaders may be more interested in organizing a genuinely democratic government and putting the country back to work than in protesting against the injustices of the peace treaty, were they to say so openly they would probably be denounced as traitors by the right.

From a Rome newspaper (1946)

The Problem of the Right Is Solved

The left must be constantly on guard against the nationalist agitation instigated by the forces of the past. Fortunately for Italy, Mussolini's Fascists never attained the same degree of power as their counterparts in Germany, but that is no reason to dismiss Fascist activity lightly. Every three months or so a new Fascist publication is started, usually not in Rome or cities where the workers are strongly organized, but rather in Sicily, where the old landed proprietors hate the republic and fear the coming agrarian reform. The first attempt to build a Fascist underground was made in 1945 when half the peninsula was still under Allied occupation. Today the existence of a secret organization is common knowledge; in Rome I heard talk about the Mussolini Action Squads (S. A. M.) complete with codes, contact points, and meeting places, and directed by former Fascist and monarchist officers. Since the S. A. M. knows that a coup would have no chance of success now, its strategy is to infiltrate into the legal political parties as a fifth column in order to "control" democracy and mold it along lines as completely Christian Democratic and as little Socialist or republican as possible. The reputed leader of the Fascist revival is Carlo Scorza; his present whereabouts, like those of his German colleague Martin Bormann, are a mystery. Along with the small provincial publications, a number of thinly disguised Fascist papers are being sold openly at newsstands in Rome: Rivolta Ideale, edited by Giovanni Tonelli, with a circulation of about 80,000, La Ruota of Naples, and Meridiano d'Italia of Milan, with smaller audiences. On the other hand, the popular anti-clerical weekly, Don Basilio, has half a million readers.

Barely a year old, the Italian republic appears to be well entrenched. But the bitter struggle continues between the right and the left, between the forces working desperately to establish a neo-fascism and those that are attempting to translate the "century of the common man" into reality. The national elections, which will decide Italian policy for the next four years, are scheduled to be held in October, but already the country is engaged in full-scale campaigning. This helped me to get a clear idea of the various party programs and of the political climate in general.

[Mr. del Vayo's next article from Italy will discuss the political position and policy of the Vatican.]

Carrie Chapman Catt

BY MILDRED ADAMS

THE end of a great human being stops time and for a moment holds people and forces revealed in naked light. So it is with the death of Carrie Chapman Catt. Only now that the blue eyes are closed and the strong voice quiet can we begin to see the proportions of the tall leader from Iowa and the part she played in creating certain forces that help make American life what it is today. She spent sixty years in shaping two mass movements—the progress of women out of their position as a submerged class into an equality of opportunity with men, and the progress of the world in developing peaceful techniques of international change. She stands not only as a leader of women but as a political thinker of the first order.

What women all over the world owe to her is so imbedded in their daily lives that only through the illumination of a moment like this can they imagine how much more meager things might have been for them had she not lived. What the world owes is even harder to isolate and appraise, for it would include not only her own contribution but also the work done by millions of women whose energies she unleashed. One of her last acts was to join Mrs. Roosevelt and others in saluting Russian women for their efforts to build a peaceful world.

President Truman, in a telegram sent to her New Rochelle home when he heard of her death, said that with her passing "an era in our national life comes to an end." She was the last of the great leaders whose fight for woman suffrage began in the nineteenth century and followed through to the ratification of the amendment in 1920. As a young woman she traveled and spoke with the pioneer Susan B. Anthony, and though she had far more sense of humor than that indomitable veteran, she was in spirit her direct heir. Her great contribution was the concept of organizing along recognized political lines what had hitherto been a movement more remarkable for its enthusiasm than for its campaign skill. Beginning with the Assembly districts in New York City she organized women into a political party with the vote as its first aim. Not only did this new attack prove successful, first in the states and then in the nation, but it persuaded a great body of women of the need for informed opinion and skilled action and taught them how to use the vote for public good once they had won it. Her realization that wise use of the ballot is not an inherited instinct even in a democracy but a skill to which citizens must be educated is now an axiom in political thinking.

Mrs. Catt's interest in international affairs, commonly thought to have followed her work for suffrage, actually paralleled it for at least forty years. As early as 1904 she became president of the International Woman's Suffrage Alliance, and traveling about the world on its affairs, she looked at governments in action with that clear, inquiring gaze which was one of her most valuable assets. As a distinguished visitor on a public mission, she was usually accorded an interview with the country's ruler. Abroad and at home she saw government face to face, and she had few illusions about it. If her optimism was temperamental, her skepticism was informed and healthy.

When suffrage was finally won and she had founded the League of Women Voters to carry on education in the use of the ballot for the common good, she said with a relieved sigh that she could "now devote all attention to the cause of peace." She drew together eleven national women's organizations into a working group to study "the cause and cure of war." When another war came that group developed into the present Women's Action Committee for Victory and Lasting Peace.

MILDRED ADAMS is a distinguished writer in several fields and an occasional contributor to The Nation. She knew Mrs. Catt personally for many years.

Between the wars, when "peace groups" stronger in good intent than in wisdom littered the land, Mrs. Catt was one of the few peace advocates who could not properly be called either a pacifist or an isolationist. Iowa farm woman that she was, dowered with a sense of reality that never left her, she recognized growth, dispute, ambition as human manifestations that could neither be legislated nor educated out of existence. What she hoped was that techniques could be developed by which disputes between nations could be kept at a minimum and settled when they arose by compromise and agreement instead of armed conflict. Her cherished dream was that peace should be treated as a positive national good rather than as a State Department by-product, and should be made the active business of a Department of Peace set up within the executive branch at Cabinet level. That has not yet come to pass, but she felt herself fortunate to have lived to see what she regarded as the tragic national blunder of 1920 corrected when the United States entered the United Nations. Her last birthday wish was that the "United Nations would make a perfect success and that we would never have another war."

To younger people of good-will, confused by the plethora of organizations that seek to move the world this way or that, there is cause for wonder in the degree to which Mrs. Catt's influence was that of the individual making up her mind on the evidence of her own eyes. It is true that she went about the world as a feminist leader, but she did not lean on her position as the representative of groups of women. On the contrary, the groups leaned on her.

For reasons deeply rooted in her personal life and that of the nineteenth-century communities in which she spent her youth she really believed that women had better stuff in them than men, that given a chance to develop and to contribute to public life they would be a force for good. If this was an illusion it also served as an inspiration, and there is reason for examining the influence of modern pessimisms in the fact that women who worked with and for her felt the spur of that optimism and did better than they knew they could.

The rare qualities which attracted her followers from near and far to New Rochelle long after she had retired from active life still stir thousands who never saw her. She went without a last recorded word, but she would have stood by the message with which, in the dark days of 1940, she closed her speech to the Women's Centennial Congress.

"Friends," she said in that slow, direct voice which reached into listening minds like the thrust of a spade, "it is a hard future, but every problem can be solved and many of them must be solved. For your own sake, face the future cheerfully, for your friends' sake, be optimistic, for your children's sake, be confident, and for the sake of all things, be bravely unafraid."

Conscience in California

BY HENRY GEIGER

Los Angeles, March 12

ALTHOUGH the Selective Service act expires at the end of this month, twenty-two conscientious objectors are being tried in Los Angeles on charges of violating it. Cases against thirty-six others were dropped after the United States district attorney decided to limit prosecution to the alleged ringleaders. The twenty-two are being tried for going on strike to get pay for "work of national importance" which prior to last April they were forced to perform without remuneration in the Glendora, California, civilian-public-service camp. They also sought civilian control, dependency allotments, workmen's compensation, and equitable discharge rates.

The last of these demands has been granted, but the strikers will not benefit if they are now sent to a federal prison instead of going home. "Civilian control" could probably be established by Presidential order. The three remaining strike aims—bare minimums of decency in any kind of employment, military or civilian—are as far from realization as they were four years ago, when the C. O.'s petitioned the government for wages equivalent to army base pay and subsistence for their wives and children.

Thousands of the men in these camps were married; many had small children whose need for care prevented their mothers from working. Yet according to the Selective Service law they had not the right to earn money for their families even in the time left to them after a fifty-one-hour work week, except as a "privilege" allowed by federal authority.

HENRY GEIGER, a theosophist, spent three years as a conscientious objector in a civilian-public-service camp.

Last April about eighty conscientious objectors in Camp 76, at Glendale, having exhausted all known "democratic" avenues of appeal, stopped working for the United States Forest Service and started packing food for hungry Europeans, using contributions from friends to buy food and pay the postage. They refused to work any longer for nothing—their "allowance" of $2.50 a month, raised to $5 six months after the war began, could hardly be called "pay"—under illegal military supervision.

In explaining their protest, the men pointed to the contradiction between the theoretical recognition of the right of conscience in the United States and the government's practice of treating C. O.'s as slave laborers. "If the public judgment is that C. O.'s should be treated as criminals and slaves," they said, "then the program should be legalized by Congress. If the public believes in recognition of conscience, then the program should be changed. Either pay us and place us under civilian control or admit that you are treating conscientious objectors like felons and stop all this talk about freedom of religion. We don't have it."

Labor leaders are beginning to realize that the civilian public-service system may set a dangerous precedent for civilian labor drafts. Last month Meyer Bernstein of the C. I. O. Veterans' Committee told the President's Amnesty Board: "We sense a great danger in compulsory labor not in punishment for crime. Forced work of any kind is detrimental to democratic institutions. The arrest of C. O.'s who struck against forced labor is the compounding of an injury. We of organized labor have suffered from this sort of abuse ourselves. So we protest on our own behalf as well as in defense of the C. O.'s."

When the system was described to Senator Wallgren, now Governor Wallgren of Washington, in 1943, he said, "You are treating those fellows worse than the Japs," meaning the interned Japanese Americans. To which General Hershey responded: 'Maybe so, . . . but that is the way we have been running it for a good while.'

Clarence Dykstra, first director of Selective Service, explaining the program for C. O.'s worked out by church groups to a House subcommittee on appropriations in January, 1941, said, "We do not expect to pay them anything." Representative Houston demurred, saying, "They are protected by law." Nevertheless, 12,000 men were sold into slavery for the duration. Liberal Congressmen were lulled into acceptance of the no-pay idea by assurances that the church pacifists wanted it that way. At first many C. O.'s themselves accepted the doctrine that they could prove their loyalty by the "sacrifice" of working without pay, but as years passed, they grew restless. The alternative-service program, as they saw it, consisted of trivial jobs in concentration camps ruled by military regulations, where men were denied even the elemental compensation of base pay to take care of their personal needs. Medical care was inadequate, often irresponsible.

Of course, it was an ordeal that healthy men with principles could stand. They did not oppose the system because it was unpleasant or destructive of their own morale. It was the thought of these slave labor camps as a fixture of the American scene that drove them to protest. The knew that in England conscientious objectors were allowed to find their own jobs, within limits defined by the British tribunals, and were paid prevailing wages. British C. O.'s had to face social ostracism, it is true, but this every war resister expects. Canadian C. O.'s worked in labor camps for pay, and after a year were released to fill civilian jobs vital to their home communities—as in hospitals and schools. What rankled with American conscientious objectors was the hypocrisy and waste of the American system. It squandered the energies of thousands of useful and often highly trained citizens; it pretended to uphold religious freedom but actually imposed heavy economic penalties on conscience.

During and after the war hundreds of conscientious objectors "walked out" of camp to face federal prosecution. But the strike at Glendora was the first mass action in protest against the civilian public-service system. The Friends' Service Committee has just withdrawn its aid in administering the system. The friends' camps—Glendora was one of them—were populated with articulate, socially conscious men. When their misguided friends, the church pacifists, got out, the last frayed strand of allegiance to the program snapped. The war was over.

As the soldiers came back, the men in the camps found it unendurable to be held as peace-time civilian conscripts.

So though their discharges were only a few days or weeks away, these Glendora men went on strike, risking prison sentences that might extend their punishment for years. The FBI descended in force, and soon all the strikers—except a few who went back to work because of church pressure or for family reasons—were arrested and charged with criminal offenses against the Selective Service Act, for which they face a maximum penalty of five years.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

KEITH HUTCHISON

Russia and Reparations

THE attempt to extract a vast sum in reparations from Germany after World War I ended in fiasco. The comparatively small amounts that were in fact collected were transferred only through the agency of much larger American and British loans to Germany, and these loans in turn served to finance the modernization and expansion of German heavy industry and, ultimately, rearmament. Seeking to avoid such pitfalls this time, the Big Three at Potsdam agreed that reparations should be paid by the physical removal of the capital assets that constituted Germany's armament potential. Moreover, they decided that the total of industrial equipment left intact should be no more than enough to provide a modest standard of living and a volume of exports sufficient to finance the imports needed to maintain that standard.

It was a neat theory, but in practice it has not worked out very well. Dismantlement of plants has proceeded slowly in the western zones, and removals were formally halted in the American sector in May, 1946, on the ground that Russia's failure to implement the Potsdam decision to allow Germany economic unity compelled reconsideration of zonal industrial needs. Actually a trickle of equipment has been made available, but allocations have been too small and irregular to be of much assistance to nations counting on German machinery to further their industrial reconstruction. Russia, whose share of western-zone reparations was fixed at 25 per cent, has been particularly dissatisfied, and at the Moscow conference Molotov has accused America and Britain of "sabotaging" German demilitarization by failure to dismantle 1,540 out of 1,557 plants listed by the Allied Control Commission.

However, the Russians appear to be disappointed also with the gleanings from their own zone, where they have had a completely free hand. They are reported to have shipped some $1,000,000,000 worth of equipment eastward, but the operation appears to have entailed unexpectedly large losses. According to David Ginsburg, who has prepared a report on reparations for the National Planning Association, "although considerable quantities of industrial machines did arrive in usable condition, the assembly and operation of whole plants at the point of destination proved to be inordinately difficult. Missing parts and machines, damaged parts and machines, lost engineering plans, shortages of skilled manpower, delays at every stage—all bedeviled the Soviets to the point where confidence in the capital-goods reparations program as a major contribution to the success of the new Five-Year Plan was lost." As a result the Russians have greatly reduced their removals schedule and have even returned some plants to Germany. More and more they are relying on the proceeds of current production in their zone as a means of reparation, and to this end they have taken title to over 200 important industrial plants in which 300,000 to 400,000

Germans work as "Soviet state employees." From these and other sources, Mr. Ginsburg estimates, they have obtained some $500,000,000 worth of goods. However, this flow seems destined to be reduced owing to scarcity of raw materials and depreciation of machines which cannot be made good from local resources.

While the receipt of reparations has lagged behind Soviet hopes, the need of the Soviet economy for additional supplies of both capital and consumer goods has become more urgent. Even the scanty news Moscow vouchsafes about industrial development makes it clear that the Five-Year Plan has got off to a very slow start, while last year's drought has held in the fields workers wanted in the factories. It is not surprising, therefore, that the Russians hope to turn to account the idle machinery and man-power of western Germany.

Last July in Paris Molotov renewed a demand, made at Yalta but never agreed to by America and Britain, for a total of $10,000,000,000 in German reparations, including deliveries from current output. To make this possible he agreed to consider an upward revision in the level of German industry and even an increase in German steel output. This represented a complete reversal of the earlier Soviet position, which had been to cut German industrial potential, and particularly steel capacity, to the lowest possible point.

Nevertheless, this volte-face was not welcomed by the Western powers. Mr. Ginsburg, who served during 1945-46 as United States alternate on the four-power economic directorate in Berlin, makes their reasons clear in an analysis which I can reproduce only in the briefest summary. The crux of the matter is, however, that even if German industry were allowed to expand beyond the limits determined by the occupying powers, payment of reparations from current production would only be possible with the aid of outside—that is, American—loans. Under the most favorable circumstances it will be several years before Germany can export sufficient to pay for the imports of food and raw materials required to restore the German standard of living to the low 1932 level—the target fixed by the Allied Control Council. Payment of reparations at the rate of $1,000,000,000 annually—half to Russia and half to other claimants—would raise the required export total to about $2,500,000,000.

The Allied Level of Industry Plan proposes that the bulk of future German exports shall be the product of light industry—toys, china, textiles, and so forth. But markets for such goods in an impoverished world are limited; moreover, they are not the goods Russia most wants. Consequently, payment of reparations from current production would necessitate reviving German heavy industry on a much larger scale than has been contemplated. It would mean, too, that an increased proportion of the Ruhr coal output would have to be retained for German industry, thus defeating the hopes of France and other Western countries which have been counting on Ruhr coal to fuel their industrial expansions.

Even if the Moscow delegates agreed to let Germany go ahead and produce as much as possible, the chaotic state of German communications, the appalling housing situation, the shortage of labor, particularly skilled labor, and the increasing debility of the German population would combine to slow down the process of recovery. The attainment of an export surplus available for reparation payments is hardly even in sight. Thus the Soviet demand for German goods now could only be satisfied if the clause in the Potsdam agreement which gave payment for imports a prior claim on export proceeds were nullified. But since Germany must have foreign food and raw materials to produce at all, this in turn would mean a continuous flow of American credit to fill the gap. In regard both to the financing of reparations by the United States and the rebuilding of German heavy industry we would be back in the post-Versailles pitfalls.

IN ONE EAR

BY LOU FRANKEL

RADIO listeners in and around New York City have the privilege of hearing WMCA (570 on the dial), a non-network commercial station with a flair for fine public-service programs. In the two years since the atomic bomb smashed Hiroshima sundry stations and networks have broadcast talks and forums about the atom: the ABC network read the John Hersey story; every network and most stations reported the experiment at Bikini Atoll play by play; and the CBS documentary unit is preparing a program on the industrial use of atomic energy. But it remained for WMCA to grapple with the basic problems of atomic power in its dramatized series of broadcasts "One World or None." For breath-taking drive, for blunt, shocking facts, for calling a fool a fool and a lie a lie, "One World or None" is outstanding.

Under the direction of Nathan Straus, WMCA has frequently tackled local problems. Straus took over five years ago, just after New York City had been racked by a race riot in Harlem. A weekly series of dramatizations against racial intolerance based on Roi Ottley's "New World Coming" was started at that time and is now in its fourth year. When the atomic scientists began to fight for less censorship and more information for the public about the atom, WMCA saw another project taking form. The publication in March, 1946, of "One World or None," written by the scientists themselves, provided the vehicle. And just as WMCA had organized a community committee to advise it on its tolerance programs, so it now called in consultation the leading atomic scientists. Einstein, Oppenheimer, Bethe, Urey, and others served on an advisory committee.

The first broadcast of the series, on Friday evening, January 10, at 9:30, drew a mixed response. Quite possibly that first program was overdone. The strong broad strokes built to plateaus, not peaks, of tension. The climaxes tugged at the lapel instead of stopping the listener short with a blow to the "button." Perhaps it would have been smarter not to have opened with a hypothetical bombing of Manhattan, for New Yorkers are blasé about their town. Subsequent programs were presented more deftly without any loss of punch. Fine acting and scripts crammed with facts power the series; satire and fantasy are used for contrast; original music emphasizes the emotional impact.

On February 21, during the fight over the confirmation of David Lilienthal as chairman of the United States Atomic Energy Commission, the subject was "The Case of David Lilienthal." This program showed first how the military brass hats had tried to railroad through Congress a bill giving them control of the atom, how the scientists had stymied the War Department, how finally the Senate and House had passed the McMahon bill calling for civilian control, not military, for public control, not private, and for the subordination of domestic policy to any international agreements that might be signed later. Then the alignment of forces in the fight against Lilienthal was brought into the open, and the issues were made clear. As the narrator put it, "It was not David Lilienthal, it was the public-control provision of the Atomic Energy law itself that was the target." Finally, as any good public-service program must do, "The Case for David Lilienthal" spelled out action—in these words: "The drive to subvert the power of the universe to private use will go on. It must be beaten down again in the days ahead by the pressure that can always beat it down—the pressure of the people."

The writing by Dexter Masters, the direction and production by Mitchell Grayson, the narration by Paul McGrath, the music by John Gart (he has the makings of a "one world" symphony in his bridges and underlines), and the performances of the players measured up to the concept of this exceptional public-service program. And so did the results. WMCA was snowed under with letters from educators and other prominent persons asking for more information and for speakers on the subject. Several offered funds, which were refused. Radio stations requested transcriptions. Unfortunately, but understandably, the musicians' and performers' unions have approved the rebroadcast of the series only on educational stations. WMCA, grateful to the unions for permitting even so limited a number of rebroadcasts, hesitates to ask for waivers for commercial stations.

Since WMCA can hardly be expected to carry the additional cost itself—the rebroadcast fees for commercial stations approximate $750 for musicians and $72 for each actor—the program will run only its stated period. The broadcasters, the National Association, and the networks, busy lambasting the Federal Communications Commission for attempting to enforce public control of radio, are not eager to support the fight for public control of atomic energy. Local committees, however, might well finance the replaying of this series. Or organizations like the National Committee on Atomic Information in Washington might be persuaded to shoulder the burden.

This much is certain: the job needs doing. Scripts or transcription will be made available by WMCA if the cost is covered; the stations will surely be glad to air a program with such high entertainment and educational value.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Psychology and Symbols

UNDER THE VOLCANO. By Malcolm Lowry. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

THE AERODROME. By Rex Warner. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.75.

ALTHOUGH in "The Aerodrome" Rex Warner continues his brave, intelligent attempts to exhume the novel from the grave of Proust, it is in the far more conventional of these two English novels that the sorrows of the times, as well as those of the contemporary novelist, are most powerfully reflected. Not to suggest a comparison where none is apt, but to think of the two books together is to have a fresh if dangerous respect for mere vitality in writing, and incidentally to wonder whether it was not a matter of self-preservation for Malcolm Lowry to have lived in recent years, "as it appears he has, almost everywhere but in his own country. Certainly, whatever its weaknesses, "Under the Volcano" has a vigor and impact that have been missing in home-grown British fiction for some time. Large, "ambitious," and immensely sad, marred by a specific failure of vision and at times by a more irritating subjectivity of treatment, the book would compel respect if only for its more than occasional skill and for the conglomerate wealth of perceptions that has gone into it. Luckily there is also a fine central perception to keep the book from falling apart—a central character, that is—and though the author is not secure in his larger meanings and tends to overstress them, nevertheless in his story of the death of a man's will he does touch with rather anarchic brilliance on the core of the modern tragedy. This, as he has his hero reflect, is precisely to have lost the stature and capacity for tragedy—"Even the suffering you do endure is largely unnecessary. Actually spurious. It lacks the very basis you require of it for its tragic nature"—and it therefore presents a problem of sustaining interest, of simple dramatic tension, to which Lowry's medium is inadequate. But the perception remains valid.

The hero is Geoffrey Firmin, British ex-consul, now a "knight of sorry aspect" drinking himself to death in a Mexican town presumably modeled after Cuernavaca. The two great Mexican volcanoes loom literally and symbolically in the distance, and the town and the region around are traversed by an ominous ravine into which the Consul's body is thrown at the end. "Quauhnahuac was like the times in this respect, wherever you looked the abyss was waiting for you around the corner." The time span of the book is one day, the Day of the Dead, 1939, on which the Consul's divorced wife, Yvonne, rather miraculously comes back to him after a year's absence; miraculously because he has been howling for this to happen, imagining that their love could save him, though he has had too little will to be saved even to answer her letters. And of course he will not be saved now; he will even, through a symbolically used accident, destroy them both; but we are taken through all the heart-breaking detail of the process, against a background of Mexican festivity and in a somewhat overwritten but on the whole convincing atmosphere of doom. Also involved are a middle-aged French movie director named Laruelle, whose function in the pattern of the novel appears strained, and the Consul's half-brother Hugh, an unhappy young man of action whose political thinking seems too close to the author's own conscience and in any case comes close to spoiling the book, since it is interwoven with the political incidents of the Mexican scene on which the Consul's death is made finally to depend.

That the book is not spoiled by the basic and by now boring innocence embodied in Hugh is the highest tribute to Lowry's talent. Hugh is another Robert Jordan of "For Whom the Bell Tolls"; he has various doubts and incapacities analogous or complementary to his brother's, but they are shown chiefly in the murky stream of his consciousness, and at the end we have been given nothing to undermine his political view of the world as good, represented by his thoughts of the Battle of the Ebro, versus evil, or the "forces of reaction." This comforting dichotomy, so familiar among a certain variety of intellectual tourists, would be more shocking in this context if there were not a more general and literal tourist quality in the book as a whole. The fact that none of the characters have any inevitable relation to the scene in which they are placed could, if properly used, greatly have heightened the sense of alienation, of the spiritual homelessness of modern man, that is part of Lowry's theme. But it is not so used. On the contrary, he is continually suggesting correspondences between the Consul's collapse and the failures of the social structure, and since his people are really connected with no structure at all, except a very remote British Empire, the resulting atmosphere is sometimes less of doom than of the Left Bank.

A more pervasive sense of the thing's not quite coming off arises from the erratic and overloaded nature of the writing; and yet almost any page read separately would be taken to indicate an extremely expert hand. The pace of the story too is extraordinarily effective, so that the Consul's struggle and enormous downfall, to the tune of a staggering number of drinks which manage to drown neither his wit nor his agony, become almost unbearable—even though one could wish for clearer insight into the origins of his failure. But in spite of this achievement and the innumerable details of observation that beautifully support it, one arrives before long at the conclusion that prose is being asked to do here more than it can and is buckling under it. It goes weary, as in the long flashback concerning Hugh's earlier life, or flies off into such subjective rhetoric that one can no longer be sure of what is happening, as in the passage on the death, if she did die, of Yvonne. The fault would seem to be one not of skill but of conception, and the clue to it lies, I believe, in the startling impression this book gives now and then, not often, of having been written by a newspaperman; the question being whether the techniques of the psychological novel have not by now become so much the property of journalism on the one hand and of science on the other as to be inappropriate to such many-leveled complexity as "Under the Volcano" attempts to convey. Lowry himself has indicated the extent of the problem in his reliance on symbols, but the symbols he uses are too scattered, incomplete, and even arbitrary to carry much of the burden of his meaning.

Another possible direction has been illustrated for the last ten years by Rex Warner, who beginning with "The Wild Goose Chase" has produced a series of schematic fantasies so deft one can almost say there is nothing wrong with them. "The Aerodrome" is once more a parable, this time of the contemporary struggle of values, which he defines as between order and life. Order is represented by an imaginary Nazi-esque air force aiming at a coup d'état, and life by a quite realistic English village nearby; the characters are plausible in the ordinary way, most of the plot might have been invented by Dickens, the lesson is to the point, and the whole is so gracefully worked out as to be, if not compelling, at least readable and entertaining. To be sure the implications of the book are meant to be vast, but Rex Warner's talent is a mild satirical one, too humanitarian to be reminiscent of the early Evelyn Waugh, and with just enough trace left of Kafka's influence to remind us that the commonest legacy of Kafka as of Proust just now is likely to be anemia; which is to repeat a point in favor of Malcolm Lowry.

ELEANOR CLARK

The Poor Man's Jeremiah

AN ESSAY ON MORALS. By Philip Wylie. Rinehart and Company. $2.50.

ALL is vanity, Mr. Wylie has discovered. And as if to prove the point once and for all, as far as he is concerned, the very first paragraph of his book contains the statement that his basic concept offers "a very clear answer to every [sic] individual and collective problem." Mr. Wylie's answer to every problem runs something like this: man is an animal—that is proved conclusively in a little over fifty pages; therefore man is instinctual; but he has developed an ego for the sake of which he submerges and distorts his instincts; thus all is vanity. Q. E. D. The term "instinct" (à la Jung) being so central to this "true science of philosophy," it is extremely unfortunate that Mr. Wylie should have neglected to define it intelligibly. He says that instinct is everywhere man is, and that it is everywhere determining—which is on a par with the statement that man must have oxygen in order to live. Mr. Wylie's use of "instinct" is, in fact, nothing but a simple extension of his profound belief that man is an animal.

The intellectual core of "An Essay on Morals" is a kind of jazzy mysticism, the springboard of which is constructed of simple elements from psychoanalysis. But if the intellectual content can be taken lightly, Mr. Wylie's manner of expressing himself cannot be: it is too unusual among popular writers. To begin with a minor point, he has chosen to affect the style of very old essayists. This heavy pomposity, mixed with the usual commercial style and a key concept employed sloppily, produces a uniquely unreadable result. But the chief thing about Mr. Wylie's manner is that he is critical. His writing, to state the fact fully, is the reductio ad absurdum of all critical writing. The movement of his "thought" is merely from one sneer, rebuke, exposé, critical "revelation," to another; and where he can demonstrate himself knowing and superior in this way mostly determines where he moves—determines the course of his argument, that is. In this sense, Mr. Wylie's is a parody of the modern critical mind—a genuine comic relief.

"Instinct" is a perfect term for such a mind to employ, particularly in relation to the subject of morals. For then criticism can be directed at everyone—the moral for not being instinctual, the latter for not being the former. Especially, that is, if the environment is ignored. And Mr. Wylie proudly possesses a phenomenal ignorance of and contempt for the environment; he begins and ends with "instinct." We are especially impressed with his contemptuous ignorance when he arrives, briefly, at politics. It turns out that he is in favor of democracy, which means for him that what happens happens. Here we begin to understand in just what sense Mr. Wylie is the philosopher and seer of the commercial intellectual: he suits the latter because he is never concrete or political enough to mean anything except in the sphere of after-hours "belief." Almost everything he suggests can be accomplished in the mind alone, during one's leisure. Like many people today, he wants a revolution in our way of life without any political effort, especially without the struggle of classes. (He makes the fantastic statement that knowledge of the unconscious mind must be spread over the globe before the distribution of material goods!)

Mr. Wylie writes like a man overcome by the cosmic significance of the fact that he has run across a few rather enlightening ideas. In this circumstance, he has quite blown his top. "An Essay on Morals" is the result. His more educated readers will be startled, and perhaps confused, by so much guttural noise and seeming sense. The semi-educated—Mr. Wylie's own special audience—will love the exhibition, just as they love all intellectual vaudeville. Not least in the pleasure will be the big words they can't understand and the many vague sentences.

If the author were not so pompous, this reviewer would be moved to give him "E" for effort—after all, the book is based on a primary Freudian principle, does contain a few good insights, some well-chosen facts, and one or two decent formulations. As it is, however, this vain diatribe against foolish vanity tempts one to suggest to Mr. Wylie that he either learn a reasonable humility or return, please, to the Saturday Evening Post salt mines.

DAVID T. BAZELON

The Isthmus

MEXICO SOUTH. By Miguel Covarrubias. Alfred A. Knopf. $7.50.

IF YOU travel four hundred miles out from New York City, you will find yourself in Cleveland—or, at the most exotic, Bangor—but if you set out from Mexico City, you can reach the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and that is quite another matter. Women are re-

"Extremely well done . . . the cumulative effect is terrific."

—N. Y. TIMES

A ROOM ON THE ROUTE

A NOVEL OF MODERN RUSSIA BY Godfrey Blunden

JOHN DOS PASSOS telegraphs—"Just finished reading A ROOM ON THE ROUTE—really first-rate writing—one of the few important novels of generations tells us a story we must understand before it is too late. Reading it I found myself back in Moscow among Russians I knew there in less terrible times. The people ring true; the city, the cold, the hardship and the terror ring true. Blunden is the only writer who has been able to make us feel in our bones the realities of Soviet life."

$3.00

2nd Large Printing

"A remarkable, and even exciting, novel in which everyday existence in Moscow during the war is made to seem as real as life in New York or Minneapolis . . . An important as well as a deeply moving piece of work."

—New Yorker

"Bound to be widely read and discussed."

—New York Post

"The characters excite compassion they're as human."

—N. Y. World Telegram

The Aero-drome

A novel by REX WARNER author of Return of the Traveller

"A steady narrative thrust and a controlled atmosphere of excitement . . . Uncommon, stimulating and satisfying . . . Many books are called important. I sincerely believe that this one is."—BEN RAY REDMAN, Saturday Review of Literature.

$2.75

At all bookstores

THE SHORE DIMLY SEEN

By Ellis G.
Arnall

"Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson brought up to date in terms of education, soil erosion, freight rates, the Tennessee Valley, and true democracy."

—HENRY A. WALLACE

$3.00

4th Large Printing

The War Reports

OF GENERAL MARSHALL GENERAL ARNOLD
AND ADMIRAL KING

All nine official reports by the men responsible for waging the war, now available in a single permanent volume. "An authentic story of the war which will have to be consulted by anyone interested in the conflict."—Chicago Tribune. Profusely illustrated. Foreword by Walter Millis.

$7.50

PHILADELPHIA

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY

NEW YORK

puted to be handsomer; their gowns are rich and proud; tamales are wrapped in banana leaves instead of corn husks; there are different dances, dialects of a different Indian language, and social customs of great complexity, especially having to do with celebrations.

It is significant that the Isthmus can be described in romantic and picturesque terms, by a Mexican, as if it were indeed foreign territory—significant of the isolation of important regions of Mexico and of the great variety and autonomy of indigenous cultures. Much of this will disappear in our lifetime, with the pan-American highway cutting right through Tehuantepec, and there is already a wistful note in this record of a light-hearted and self-sufficient way of life. But after all, it has been disappearing now and being re-created for at least four hundred years, and in fact this ambivalence of past and present, rooted in intense local tradition, is one of the special fascinations of Mexico. Covarrubias catches its quality very well in the parts of the book devoted to the daily life, social organization, customs, and traditions of the region: he simply tells us, in all aspects and in considerable detail, how the people of the Isthmus live, and it is a subject that one can listen to indefinitely with pleasure. The text is supplemented with abundant drawings and photographs which have the same quality of distilled observation. A tourist might never see these "typical" things, for such things emerge as not merely beautiful but characteristic only for a person who stays long enough and lives close enough to the local scene. To this sort of reporting the author brings a natural gift for entering into his material, a quality of enjoyment which gives his experience rather more validity than the clinical sociological study.

For me the almost separate treatises on pre-conquest, colonial, and republican history mar the pure and agreeable scope of the book: it is not clear why the author suddenly writes as an archaeologist or as a professional historian instead of bringing to the events and the evidences of the past the same mood of personal observation and appraisal. The armchair traveler can always skip, however, and I recommend "Mexico South" without scruple as the year's best substitute for a winter holiday—with the warning, however, that it is sure to carry you off to Tehuantepec and Juichitan and Vera Cruz in the end.

ELIZABETH WILDER

BRIEFER COMMENT

Brogan on France

BENEATH OUR RATHER MUZZY sentimentality about France ("sister republic," "Lafayette, we are here!" "Last Time I Saw Paris") there are depths of ignorance and strange currents of hostility. The Second World War would not have happened if we had attempted to understand Clemenceau instead of painting him with horns. And Potsdam might not have been such a tragic muddle if France had been present, as it had every right to be.

The American reader who wants to understand France soberly, without gushing or raving, will find no better guide than Denis Brogan's "French Personalities and Problems" (Knopf, $3). The expert who is too exclusively a specialist is under legitimate suspicion. He has a tendency to magnify his field, whether it be the Hittite Empire or Etruscan inscriptions. Brogan, our best authority on contemporary France, is also thoroughly acquainted with our country and with his own. His sympathies are not lopsided. He is a Western-liberal, a citizen of that great commonwealth which came to life in the eighteenth century, and of which England, France, America are closely related provinces.

The twenty-seven essays in this book, selected from many contributions to British, French, and American periodicals, cover a wide field, historical and literary, from the French Revolution to the resurgent France of 1945. For the student of political thought the most valuable essays are those on nationalism, discussed either directly or through its exponents, Barrès, Maurras, Bainville, Daudet. We once had a friendly quarrel, Brogan and I, about nationalism. I recognize the virulence of the disease; but a raging fever need not be a permanent condition. Even in this book I might not agree with every one of his interpretations: where would liberals be, if they had to follow the same rigid line? But the facts are accurate, the reasoning is cogent, and the presentation masterly.

For Brogan, a political scientist, is a writer. So were Tocqueville, Marx, Henry George: a dull style is no sufficient evidence of profundity. He has touches of American smartness, French irony, and British humor. All this without levity: the problems are hard and the outlook is dark. In such a crisis it would be foolish to chirp, and even more foolish to mope.

ALBERT GUÉRARD

The Old Inimitable

THESE TWELVE ESSAYS ("Mainly on the Air," Knopf, $2) by Sir Max—"the incomparable"—Beerbohm are of trivial importance, if urbanity, ease, and wit are trivial. The table of contents indicates that six of the essays were delivered to the British public by word of mouth, Sunday evenings, for a quarter or half an hour, over the facilities of the British Broadcasting Corporation. This leads us to the sixty-four-dollar question: what sponsor, what forward-looking executive, of all those cited in Mr. Frankel's department in these pages, would invite American authors to come and do likewise, at the risk of interfering with Mr. Benny, Mr. Bergen, or Mr. Allen? And what good would it do him if he did? For, even were there listeners, in our shires of the republic of letters, alas, no elder statesman could be found to discourse so engagingly, and with such an absence of what Sir Max refers to as the "argute" and the "rebarbative." ROLFE HUMPHRIES

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

THE IMPORTANCE OF BEING EARNEST" is one of those plays which read well but gain little in any merely competent performance. This particular play may, indeed, easily lose a good deal for the simple reason that it is easier to see its fantastically inhuman dramatis personae in the mind's eye than to body them forth in an even tolerably satisfactory fashion. If you play them as if they were really men and women, the effect is as disastrous as it was in those Victorian productions of Shakespeare where Hermione, or even Puck, was humanized into mere silliness instead of being allowed to live and breathe, to think and act, according to the arbitrary laws of her own being. One of the characters in Wilde's play, indignant at the unfairness, describes Lady Bracknell as "a monster without being a myth," and so she is within the framework of the play. But from any standpoint outside it the important fact is that she, like all her fellow-characters, is both a monster and a myth—a monster of elegant brainlessness playing her part in the mythological realm of perfect dandyism.

The most monstrous woman who was not also mythological could not possibly congratulate a prospective son-in-law upon having an occupation when he confesses that he does smoke, or could, when she discovers that he is a foundling picked up from a railway cloak-room, dismiss him with the observation that no man can be socially acceptable if his origins turn out to be a terminus. But grant her the mythological realm in which she functions—a realm of dandyism whose denizens achieve an ideal of privileged uselessness so far beyond the imagination of Thorstein Veblen that they take merely manual or practical incompetence for granted and are not really proud of anything except their arrogant refusal to use even their minds for anything except word-juggling; grant her, I say, this realm in which a sensible idea would be as gauche as sensible shoes, and she is as credible as Volpone or Ariel.

All this is by way of a preliminary to the statement that Mr. Gielgud and his company have found for their production now current at the Royal Theater a style which does help to create the mythological atmosphere instead, as is sometimes the case, of destroying it. This style is not overdone; it wisely keeps a little this side of the extravagance of the words, so that these words still come as a surprise even when uttered by the people who utter them; but it is also a style which makes each character just sufficiently assured and debonair in his manner to keep it clear that he is not human but mythological. All the parts are played extremely well, and there are at least three really superb performances—that by Mr. Gielgud himself as John Worthing, that by Margaret Rutherford as Lady Bracknell, and, best of all in my opinion, that by Pamela Brown as Gwendolen. According to the program Miss Brown in London played Goneril in Olivier's "King Lear," Lady Macbeth in another Old Vic production, and has been urged by James Agate to undertake Hedda Gabler. Of what she does for Gwendolen, that perfect embodiment of genteel assurance and maidenly ruthlessness, I can only say that Gwendolen becomes what one might imagine Lear's daughter or Macbeth's wife would be if either were translated from tragedy into comedy and thereby became what Shakespeare elsewhere describes as a very civil monster.

I note that the reviewer in Variety—usually very shrewd in the judgments based on its own premises—finds the play much less promising for Broadway than "Lady Windermere's Fan," and Variety thereby offers a poser to those of us who have always taken it for granted that the latter play was an artistically unsatisfactory mixture of wit with conventional sentiment and stale theatricality, while "Earnest" was quite perfect in its kind. The explanation, I suppose, that for strictly popular consumption even obviously false realism is more easily acceptable than anything which openly cuts loose from all pretense of fidelity to any actuality; and though my guess is that "The Importance of Being Earnest" will sell out for the limited run which has been scheduled, it does to some extent remain caviar—which comestible I should remind those who might find the two last statements not quite compatible finds a ready sale to an adequate public. As for myself, I must confess that I have what many would no doubt regard as a quite extravagant liking for the play in question. Certainly the stream of Wilde's wit never ran so pure in any of his other works and certainly it never sparkled along so easily, so copiously, or with so much joy. The whole range of his power as a phrase-maker is exhibited, from those phrases which are barbed darts penetrating deeper than one at first realizes to those which are pure exuberant nonsense. And for once there is almost no dross, no intrusion of the alien elements of sentimentality or melodrama. Moreover, the special style of farce which he created by joining irresponsible talk to action irresponsible in some similar way is so far from being as easily imitable as one might suppose that it has seldom if ever really been imitated. To some extent, I suppose, it might be claimed that P. G. Wodehouse has been rewriting and watering it down for a generation, but Levy's "Spring Time for Henry" is the only play I can remember which comes within miles of catching its tone. Wilde did not really found a school because no one was able to learn his trick, and it is almost terrifying to remember that this triumphantly assured, irresistibly debonair work was actually enjoying its first run when its author toppled over into the pit from which he was never to emerge. He did not, like Prospero, drown his book. It was drowned with him.

Films

JAMES
AGEE

I SHOULD review several of the films mentioned below at some length, and I hope that at length I will. But I have left so many films unreviewed, some of them weeks or months old by now, that I can begin to catch up only by reviewing them now, somewhere near as briefly as possible.

"The Adventuress," an English film, stars Deborah Kerr as a patriotic Irish innocent who helps Nazi spies until she learns better. It is a try at comedy melodrama and in both ways is sometimes clever. More often, the styles go thin or conflict, or lose themselves in rather unpleasant bids for general American liking. A good deal has been derived from Hitchcock, but little of the intensity and conviction which made his English films so good. There is some grace, intelligence, and fun here, but essentially this seems to me a supercilious drama, as if it had been made by bright young men who had decided to package and toss a bone to the groundlings.

"The Angel and the Bad Man," John Wayne's first production, mixes up Quakers with gun-bearing cowboys. The

CAN WE LICK THE REAL ESTATE LOBBY?

Who has beaten every national public housing bill for the last ten years? Who wrecked the veterans' housing program? Who's behind the current threat to end rent control? The Real Estate Lobby, an eye-opening article in the March AMERICAN MERCURY, reveals interests far more powerful than the landlords... far more difficult to beat. Also in this provocative, 128-page issue: Stassen of Minnesota... The Airlines Face a Crisis... The Rape of Manchuria, and 18 other first-rate features by noted writers. To get the next 6 months of THE AMERICAN MERCURY clip $1 to this ad (special trial rate for new subscribers only—regular price $3 a year).

MAIL TO:

THE AMERICAN MERCURY

573 Lexington Ave., New York 22, N. Y. result is unpretentious, sweet-tempered, and quite likable.

"Before Him All Rome Trembled" tells the story of "La Tosca" in a sort of double exposure; the principals sing the crisis of the opera and go through a similar offstage crisis in Nazi-dominated Rome. This is all likably mediocre except for Anna Magnani of "Open City," whom I could watch for any length of time for her square-handed operatic gestures alone. She has never yet been used for anything like all she has, or promises, and I suppose never will be, now that she is coming to Hollywood, which is a pity, for both as a woman and as a movie actress she is magnificent—the nearest thing to an absolute that I have seen in films since the silent Garbo movies. Incidentally I hope that the Pope, at least, will-sooner or later get around to admitting that he took no very active part in the anti-Nazi underground; judging by Italian films, practically everyone else in Italy did.

"Blaze of Noon" is a story about four flying brothers and the anxious girl one of them marries. So long as it sticks to stunt-flying and mild comedy it is pleasant enough, but the last half, during which the obsessed brothers come one by one to grief and the little woman waits it out, gets pretty monotonous.

"Boomerang!" produced by Louis de Rochemont and directed by Elia Kazan, is the story of a real-life murder and the resultant police and political work. This is still only March, but I won't be surprised if it turns out to be the best American film of its year, barring only Chaplin's. It was made in Stamford and White Plains; it is notable for Dana Andrews's best performance to date; a large cast mainly of Broadway actors, inspired perhaps by their surroundings, the non-professional actors, and the highly intelligent general intention, turns in the most immaculate set of naturalistic performances I have seen in one movie. The script and photography are exactly what they should be. "Boomerang!" never tries to get beyond the very good best that good journalistic artists can do, but on that level it is a triumph, a perfect job, and I very much hope a springboard for many more films of its kind.

"A Cage of Nightingales," a French film, reminds me of "Mädchen in Uniform" and of the fantastically original and inspired "Zero de Conduit," both of which were about the treatment and maltreatment of schoolchildren. This time the talented teacher, the healer

(the comedian Noël-Noël), reforms the boys in a reform school, largely through getting them interested in choral music. Both he and the children are very charming. I like these demonstrations of what even a reasonable amount of kindness, common sense, guile, and self-reliance can do against brute authoritarianism, and I know they are still apposite and always will be. But I would like still better to see any sufficiently intelligent attack on the new kinds of soul-destroyer—those heirs of the healers of the recent past who have learned the words ever so earnestly but, lacking the remotest ear for the tune, do their work by the book. (I'm told that one of the newer books on child-raising tells you that it's all right, indeed altogether well-advised, to smile at your baby.) They are the most deadly enemies, in our particular time, and they are still hardly even suspected, much less assaulted, except by the neolithic types they have to some extent supplanted.

I will be back at this remnants counter as soon as possible. Meanwhile I must digress briefly to say a few words about the clergy.

In the current issue of Motion Picture Magazine are three articles about divorce in Hollywood, signed by Monsignor Sheen, Rabbi Goldstein, and Dr. Fosdick. They say a good deal about marriage and divorce and about the relationship between the strength of a civilization and the integrity of the family, with which I agree, whether I want to or not. They also wish to requite of the Hollywood stars that they serve as a good example rather than a bad one to the mere human beings who make up the stars' general audience; one even demands that the industry see to it that these employees behave themselves. In my opinion such moralists are impudent enough in hornning in on what appears on the screen without assuming it is their right and duty, as well, after the stars' working hours, to get into bed with them. I would like to know, moreover, what a few people whose moral sense has reached the shaving age think of arbiters of morals who still believe in the obligation of the prominent to set a good example; who still believe in exerting pressure on them in order that they shall exert pressure on others; and who feel so profound a contempt for the souls and minds of people in general as to dare to approach them through force and through example.

I have an unsolicited apology to make.

I recently referred to Cardinal Spellman in this column in a way which now seems to me to have been over-personal and otherwise vulgar. I lose no love to the Cardinal or to the clergy in general, of whatever denomination, but I am ashamed to have expressed my dislike in the way that I did.

Art

CLEMENT GREENBERG

THE Chirico revealed by his latest paintings, which are now on view at the Acquavella Galleries along with specimens of earlier work (through March 31), is surprising only as an objective fact, but not in the perspective of his whole development, which was always colored by an ambiguous and guilty but thoroughly logical hostility to all truly modern painting since Courbet.

At the beginning of his career Chirico was struck by the German Swiss painter Böcklin, whose work is one of the most consummate expressions of all that we now dislike about the latter half of the nineteenth century; however, I cannot believe there was not some perversity, half-concealed from himself, some desire to shock his peers and betters, in this admiration of Chirico's—a desire that sprang perhaps from his despair of equaling the profound matter-of-factness of the impressionists and of Cézanne and Matisse. Like many a twentieth-century Italian, with the glorious past behind him and the glorious present elsewhere—in Paris, London, Berlin—he clowned out of a historical instinct that he himself was half unconscious of.

But Chirico still was and is a gifted painter, as he demonstrated in some of the pictures he painted before 1919. Although they show portents of the bankruptcy to come and signal across a decade to that retreat of avant-garde painting which began with the surrealists in the late twenties, these canvases have a substance and plastic quality that justify, in plastic terms, this last serious attempt to save literary easel-painting. They will survive because they are sui generis. Though certain aspects of their design and subject matter owe much to cubism, they do not exist within the same order of criticism, and must be treated as a point of exception and not approached with the demands we make on the great and typical painting of the first twenty years of the century. They are one of those

MOTION PICTURES

MANHATTAN

ALHAMBRA
COLUMBIUM
814 ST.
80th ST.
80th ST. & 3rd
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENCY
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

BRONX
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

WESTCHESTER

MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

BROOKLYN

BUSHWICK
DYER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island

QUEENS

MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Kelt's
FLUSHING
Kelt's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

MANHATTAN

COLONIAL
B'way & 62 St.

RKO

NOW

EXPERT CAST AND DIRECTION."—N. Y. World-Telegram

IDA LUPINO

Robert ALDA • Andrea KING

Bruce BENNETT

'THE MAN I LOVE'

Directed by RAUL WALSH
From MARITTA WOLFF Novel

—AND—

'THE VERDICT'

SYDNEY GREENSTREET

PETER LOHRE • JOAN LORRING

From Novel by ISRAEL ZANGWILL

"REAL AND EXCITING."—PM

HENRY FONDA

VICTOR MATURE

LINDA DARNELL

'MY DARLING CLEMENTINE'

Adapted from STUART N. LAKE'S Book

—AND—

'WAKE UP AND DREAM'

J'NE HAFER • JOHN PAYNE

Based on ROBERT NATHAN'S Novel

MOTION PICTURES

BOB HOPE • DOROTHY LAMOUR

'My Favorite Brunette'

A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

—IN PERSON—

JIMMY DORSEY AND HIS ORCHESTRA

PLUS

PAT HENNING • Lyn Shirley

EXTRA ADDED ATTRACTION

LOUIS JORDAN AND HIS TYMPANY FIVE

Doors Open
at 9:30 A.M.
55¢
TO 1 P.M.
(Tax Incl.)
Mon. to Fri.
Inclusive

NOW
TIMES SQUARE

PARAMOUNT

Midnight
Feature
Nightly

3rd Week!

3rd Week!

STAGE PLAYS

"A smash hit of enormous proportions."

—Ward More-
house, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way. CH 4-4258
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wednesday & Saturday 2:40.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★
BUY BONDS
★ ★ ★ ★ ★

RODGERS & HAMMERSTEIN Present

In association with JOSHUA LOGAN

"A WELCOME HIT."—Columbian, Mirror

JOHN LOVES MARY

A New Comedy by NORMAN KRASNA

Directed by MR. LOGAN

MUSIC BOX, 45th Street, West of B'way

Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40

"A HIT."—Life Magazine

HELEN HAYES in

HAPPY BIRTHDAY

A New Comedy by ANITA LOOS

Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN

BROADHURST, 44th St., West of B'way

Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wed. and Sat. 2:40

"MERMAN'S A WOW."—Chapman, News

ETHEL MERMAN

In the Musical Smash

ANNIE GET YOUR GUN

Music and Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN

Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS

with RAY MIDDLETON Directed by Joshua Logan

IMPERIAL Thea., 45th St., West of B'way

Eves. 8:30 Sharp. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30 Sharp

MONEY-SAVING MAGAZINE COMBINATIONS

For Your Convenience

The NATION

- ☐ with Harper's Magazine . . . $8.50 You Save $2.50
☐ with Consumers Union . . . $9.25 You Save $1.25
☐ with Harper's Magazine

and Consumers Union . $11.75 You Save $3.75

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses.

THE NATION by itself:

- ☐ One Year $6 ☐ Two Years $10 ☐ Three Years $14
☐ Servicemen's Rate $4 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage $1 a year extra

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed.

☐ Bill me.

NAME _____

STREET _____

CITY _____ ZONE _____ STATE _____

THE RED CROSS

Carries On!

— GIVE GLADLY — tours de force that, like Michelangelo's frescoes, founded a misguided school.

As a colorist, Chirico was in this period a last emissary of mannerism, three hundred years behind Delacroix in its use. The emphasis of his gift lies in his draftsmanship, and his best works are tinted drawings in which color does not interfere or speak in its own right. (Thus his most prominent disciples—Dali, Ernst, and Tanguy—are likewise draftsmen, but so exclusively so that they cannot handle color at all, and in their painting it gets in the way of the drawing.)

Chirico's deep space, foreshortenings, and exaggerated perspective announce, in spite of himself, the absolute flatness of Mondrian. It is the latter who drew the correct conclusion from the Italian painter's early work, not Dali. The early work parodies the perspective of the Quattrocentist masters and the means in general by which the Renaissance attained the illusion of the third dimension; and because it parodies, it destroys. From his tangential position Chirico, by an exaggeration that amounted to ridicule, helped the cubists exile deep space and volume from painting. See only how completely schematic and second-hand is his delineation of depth, how flat all surfaces in these early pictures, how the shading and modeling are applied in undifferentiated patches, like a decorative convention, and how light is handled as if in a shadow box.

Having performed this parody, which was in the nature of a final summing up and relegation of all the problems that had occupied Western painting between Giotto and Courbet, Chirico had no place left to go. Failing or unwilling to understand either what he had done or the character of painting since Manet, he could find nothing to replace that remnant of the Renaissance which he had destroyed. His destruction had been too exclusively negative—unlike the cubists, whose attack on the third dimension had of itself generated something equally positive to take its place: a new conception of pictorial space.

Chirico went on into the twenties continuing to parody, this time Davidian neo-classicism, sculpture, architecture, literature. This was the period of broken columns, toppled statues, pale horses, and whitewashed gladiators, but handled with baroque or romantic technique. The objects of the parody and the painterly means were both irrelevant. The literary effects themselves were boring, while the loose brush-stroke, the thicker paint, and the warmer colors were just so much inert machinery. His draftsmanship, now that it had abandoned the original inspiration of mannerism and nineteenth-century popular illustration, became as weak as his color. Chirico had lost touch completely. It was not even easel-painting; it was elementary interior decoration.

This was not, however, Chirico's last word. He has now performed one more parody. These very latest, post-1939 paintings of his, more or less literal pastiches of Rubens, Delacroix, Géricault, Chardin, Courbet, and the baroque still life reduced in scale and simplified, are frontal attacks on the malerisch or "painterly" school, to which Chirico's own Florentine temperament, with its leaning toward hard, cool colors, firm modeling, and clear contours, seemed so directly opposed at the beginning of his career. Here, nevertheless, he has aped the heated, swirling effects of the baroque and romantic masters. The results that in their hands took days or weeks to be achieved are simulated and mocked in a few hours of slapdash, alla prima painting (though it should not be overlooked that baroque and romantic painting was fast and broad by definition). All that is added to the originals is a curious detachment and nostalgia toward the subject matter, an emotion that is the only overt testimony to the fact that these pictures were painted in the twentieth century.

Chirico admires Delacroix, Rubens, Courbet, et al.; he could not have imitated them so successfully—up to a point—did he not. He seems to be saying: this is the finest fruit of the painting of the old past, and now it is all over with; here is an anthology of ironic reminiscences—in any case, the end, the finish, the funeral; and as for myself, all I can do is comment on other painters.

These pictures are of no importance whatsoever in the development of painting. They are not even tours de force; they are just stunts. But this does not prevent a few of them—"The Folly of Horses," "Departure," and the Chardinesque "Still Life"—from coming off on their own terms and so revealing Chirico's gift for unity again after a lapse of twenty-five years, during which nothing he did came off, on its own or any other terms. And negligible as this stuff is at its best and symptomatic as it may be of a real degeneration and of an impotence to react cogently to modern life, still it has some reality as a gloss on the history of painting, an illustrated lecture on the ABC's of baroque painting. Irrelevant as painting inside painting, it is sheer cultural evidence, a kind of funeral oration more affecting than anything that could be put into words.

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

THERE are works which music-lovers don't get to know because conductors don't get to perform them. On the other hand Handel's "Messiah" has been given year after year by the Oratorio Society; and year after year I have neglected to go and hear it—even after hearing the Beecham recording of it a number of years ago and discovering that it was a beautiful work. Apparently I needed the additional years to be able to realize—listening now to the new recording issued by Columbia (Set 666; $22.50)—how wonderfully beautiful and moving it is.

Beautiful too is the singing of Isobel Baillie, Gladys Ripley, James Johnston, Norman Walker, and the Huddersfield Choral Society, the playing of the Liverpool Philharmonic; and they are coordinated by Malcolm Sargent in a performance which gives evidence of careful preparation in its balance of sonorities and clarity of texture, its precision and finish, and of musical understanding in its effective pacing and shaping of the work. I have not been able to compare it with the old Beecham performance, which I can only suspect would turn out to be sharper in phraseological inflection and contour; but considered by itself Sargent's is wholly satisfying; and it includes sections of the work that Beecham omitted.

And sheer delight to the ear is the recorded sound of the performance. It is a product of English competence and English conscientiousness (the accompanying booklet—and what a pleasure it is to have a booklet with the text in one's hands instead of a bulky album!—refers to many hours of experiment and rehearsal in preparation for the final recording) which are employed in the achievement of an English style—the style exemplified by the English Columbia recordings of the Beecham-London Philharmonic performances of Mozart. That style attempts not a closer and closer approximation to the real sound of an orchestra in a hall, but perfection of what the ear has become accustomed to accepting from a phonograph in a room as standing for the real thing, in the way that the eye accepts the photograph as standing for the real object. It gives us not the astonishing depth in space of some Victor recordings and the new London Deccas, but a more compact assemblage of sounds clearly defined in live quiet; and perfection in this style means the balance and clarity of individual sounds, the warmth and luster of their composite sonority, that are to be heard in the recording of "The Messiah."

It means, that is, everything that is not to be heard in most of American Columbia's orchestral recordings, and in particular in its recording (Set 664; $4) of a performance of a suite from Khatchaturian's ballet "Gayne" by the New York Philharmonic under Efrem Kurtz. The suite offers a number of dances and other short pieces which use engaging Armenian themes in the way that is suited to their character, not in the unsuitable ways of Khatchaturian's symphonic works; and the performance seems good.

On a single record (71929-D; $1) are good performances of the Waltz and Polonaise from Tchaikovsky's "Eugen Onegin" by Sargent and the Halle Orchestra, which come off the record with not enough treble to balance the heavy bass.

In the months since I wrote about the first new machines I have managed to hear in addition only the expensive London Gramophones. They gave very fine reproduction of records, and indeed the only good reproduction I have heard of the new London Decca records—but whether fine enough for their high prices I cannot say, since I haven't yet been able to hear other machines in their quality and price ranges. One important fact about the London Gramophones is this: the frequency-range claimed for them—as for the London Decca recordings—is out to 14,000 cycles; and while there is reason to question whether it really goes out that far there is no need of settling the question; for the machines give harsh reproduction with their full range, and the fine reproduction I have mentioned only when the treble-control is set at one step down, which reduces the frequency range, making 8,000 cycles (so the London Gramophone engineer told me) the cut-off point at which the frequency-response begins to fall away. And 8,500 cycles, I am reliably informed, is the similar cut-off point of the Victor recordings.

14,000 cycles, then, is what one may hear—extremely attenuated, be it noted —in the concert-hall; 8,500 cycles—recorded with proper microphone-placement and reproduced without distortion—is as much as one wants out of a phonograph in a room. Microphone-placement to catch the proper amount of reflected sound for richness and liveness is more important than extended frequency-range in recording: it is what causes some old English Columbia recordings that don't go beyond 6,000 cycles—like those of Prokofiev's Violin Concerto No. 1 and Mozart's "Linz" Symphony—to sound so beautiful today. And a sufficiently large speaker-cabinet for spaciousness and clean definition in the sound is more important than extended frequency-range in reproduction of the recording.

Letters to the Editors

There Isn't Any Business

Dear Sirs: Reading Simon Lesser's article What Will Your Dollar Buy in 1947? in your issue of January 18, I found myself taking immediate exception to his concept of business acting as an entity. There just isn't any such animal as "business"—presidents, publicists, and protagonists to the contrary notwithstanding. The business of the country is carried on by thousands of individual enterprises of all sizes and of all degrees of efficiency. Each enterprise has its own employees, management, owners, and customers, its own history and policies, and its own will to survive in a competitive world.

In his pursuit of enduring success the enterpriser has no function more important than pricing his product, for its price is the ultimate measure of his strength or weakness in the competitive struggle. In setting his price the individual enterpriser must weigh a host of factors, tangible and intangible. First comes a complex of costs incurred in getting the product on the market; and in times like the present these costs are in turbulent flux. Beyond covering costs, the price of the article is compounded of a "past," which buyers cherish; a present, which multifarious competitors attack; a future, which involves replacement of capital, contingencies, taxes, and profits. At all times the price level is the consensus of opinion of thousands of enterprisers and is in no sense a conscious reaction of "business" as a whole. Like any consensus of opinion, the price level reflects fallible human judgments, fears, and hopes; it is an attempt to gauge the future by men not gifted with second sight but facing the need to bet their own money on their own judgment.

In the boom of 1919-29 the United States Steel Corporation, dominant in its industry, undertook to maintain stable prices as those of competitors soared. The corporation obtained a volume of business which enabled it to operate for a time at a high rate while its competitors' business was slipping. But the time came when Steel's "stable prices" were forced to yield to the retreating price tide. During the same period our own company followed a policy of limited profit. When demand was insatiable, price was a minor consideration; when demand all but vanished, price became paramount. Such good-will—if any—as we had built up evaporated in the intense heat of the struggle for mere survival. Another "noble experiment," if you will, resulted only in the sacrifice of profit which could have been used later to great advantage.

In the sellers' market which has followed the war, and particularly since ceilings were lifted, the individual enterpriser has generally enjoyed an unusual degree of freedom in pricing. Activated by his quite normal purpose and obligation of securing the maximum advantage for his organization—employees, management, and owners—the enterpriser has sought to get the best available price for his product. To expect him to limit his take, so-called, is to ignore the motivating force of our competitive economy. As well expect a bridge player to toss in a "power house."

For most enterprisers the collapse of the towering price structure of 1920 is a living fact, not history. They want no part of a repetition in which profits and reserves will disappear. But each enterpriser in the interest of his own organization must get the best possible price for his product. Experienced enterprisers know that the direction of prices will change, perhaps suddenly; and many will manage their affairs with prudence against that day, thus benefiting, each in a small way, the entire system. But we must bear in mind that it will be the individual enterpriser, acting in his own interest, not "business," mixing prices, wages, and profits to suit its mood.

To live dangerously is the credo of the mountebank, not of the enterpriser. The latter's duty is to meet successfully the vast tides of economic forces and human emotions which swirl through the market and which find ultimate ex-

Crossword Puzzle No. 204

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Thus Indian may be—in fact it is!
- 6 Beards, not trimmed but sawn
- 10 Nice tan (anag.)
- 11 Multiplied by itself
- 12 "Slow but sure" might be their motto
- 13 Exeunt
- 15 "Then a soldier, Full of strange
----- and bearded like the pard"
- 17 Describes a simpleton, but not the sort that is likely to get done brown (4-5)
- 19 "A man of the Pharisees"
- 21 Praise
- 23 Popular name for unpopular insects
- 24 Passionate
- 27 In for a lot
- 28 Body cavity containing air (3 & 4)
- 29 The chair in which to take it
- 30 He works on the railroad, but not during his dinner hour
- 5 On which a lady sits on a steed (4-6)
- 9 Radio-controlled airplane in a swarm (5 & 3)
- 14 Early English furniture, but not that of the Angles (5 & 5)
- 16 Oblique offshoot
- 18 Does not mean fall in love (4 & 5)
- 20 Chirping insects
- 22 A place for tanning (where it doesn't hurt)
- 24 Watch, yet just miss seeing a great poet
- 25 Completes the fable
- 26 Not a distinct aspersion

□-□-□-□

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 203

ACROSS: 1 SPRIG; 2 REACH; 3 UL-
ULATE; 10 FLOSS; 11 DIVAN; 12 HOT CAKE; 16 SHAPER; 19 NYANZA; 22 OR-DERLIES; 23 KNEW; 24 IDEA; 25 WIND;
26 LEAN; 27 ARNO; 29 IRAN; 30 WIND-
BLOWN; 33 BARSAC; 35 YIELDS; 38 TEA-ROSE; 41 CIDER; 42 LOCUM; 43 ICE COLD;
44 SERAC; 45 SLAMS.

DOWN: 1 SIFTS; 3 RHODA; 3 GUSHER;
4 PUNT; 5 HAHA; 6 RED-EYE; 7 ALVIN;
8 HENNA; 13 ORDINANCE; 14 CURE; 15
KNIFEBOYS; 17 HONORIA; 18 POW-
WOWS; 20 ASININE; 21 ZEELAND; 23
EBOR; 31 LATHIC; 32 WIELD; 33 BUCKS;
34 RIDER; 36 LUCIA; 37 SAMOS; 39 AGES;
40 OBOL.

pression in price. No doctrinaire, the enterpriser does not know the course the tides will take. If with a prudence which is not akin to panicky fear he gauges their force and keeps sailing, he does the job he has chosen.

HENRY S. DENNISON

Framingham, Mass., March 4

Classified Advertising Rates

74 CENTS A LINE (SIX WORDS) minimum 3 lines

Classified Display $7.39 per Inch

Attractive discounts for multiple insertions

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.
BRaceley 7-1066

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS

MILLIONS OF USED, RARE and out-of-print books stocked in 15 cities. Mention interests if catalogues are wanted.
TAAB, 529 S. Melville St., Phila. 43.

BOOK

NEW BOOK IN RUSSIAN.
M. JERLITZYN, "THE LEGEND OF THE BLACK HORSE." A poem. Price
$1.50. Send orders to M. Jerlitzyn, 222 East
60th Street, New York 22, N. Y.

CURRIES

HOW TO MAKE GOOD CURRIES:
Your request with a 3¢ stamp will bring you our Recipe Booklet of precise Indian recipes for making curries of chicken, lamb, shrimp and vegetables. Learn the simple principles of using this condiment; it changes ordinary foods into new and delightful dishes.

JAVA-INDIA CONDIMENT CO.

IMPORTERS
442 Hudson Street New York 14, N. Y.

Buy Your Books Through THE NATION

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price post-free if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C.O.D. No C.O.D.'s outside the United States. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible.
Make checks payable to The Nation.

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION

The NATION

TWENTY VESSEY STREET
NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

DOWN

- 1 Racial anger
- 2 Small adornment edged with net
- 3 Set on its bottom, as a cask (2-3)
- 4 Up this Hill Piscator stretched his legs to overtake Viator
- 5 When blown these organs sound more like trumpets
- 7 English earl (1428-1471) known as
"The king maker"

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 164

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 29, 1947

NUMBER 13

The Shape of Things

THE PERVERSE STREAK IN HUMAN NATURE that makes it embrace the evil and neglect the good is well demonstrated these days at Lake Success. The visitors and the hungry newsmen crowd the Security Council chamber when a spat between Gromyko and Austin is expected. But next door, likely as not, the Economic and Social Council is playing to empty galleries. All that it is doing is building into reality some of the vague aspirations set forth in the Atlantic Charter and the Four Freedoms manifesto. It is grappling with the problems of human rights, the status of women throughout the world, the desperate needs of children in the devastated countries, the traffic in narcotics, the interrelated problems of population and economic conditions. But of much more revolutionary significance are its plans, just agreed upon, for two Economic Commissions—for Europe and for Asia and the Far East. As long ago as last summer the Economic and Social Council sent groups to survey the devastation in Europe and the Far East. Their reports contained specific suggestions for programs of economic restoration. The governments of the countries directly concerned were first charged with responsibility. Then, the specialized agencies of the U. N., such as the Food and Agricultural Organization, the World Bank, the Monetary Fund, World Health Organization, and the like. But in both Europe and Asia, it was felt, a special Economic Commission directly under the Economic and Social Council would have great value in correlating all the work of reconstruction. The terms of reference may confine the work of the commissions to that of assistance in rebuilding the war-shattered economies. But in rebuilding Europe there is now a fine opportunity to leave unbuilt the dividing walls. And in rebuilding the East more is contemplated than a restoration of the pre-war order, under which, as the report states, "a thin veneer of industrialization overlaid ancient, pre-industrial societies; [and] the lot of the people was still one of grinding poverty, disease, and ignorance."

✱

IN 1946 THE FRENCH BUDGETARY DEFICIT reached 50 per cent and that for the present year will be a little less. The reconstruction fund has already been slashed almost by 40 per cent, and the military allotment estimated to be some 40 per cent of the state revenues is insufficient to cover the cost of the Indo-Chinese war. These facts highlight the dilemma confronting France and, quite as much as the Viet-Minh party's alleged Muscovite sympathies, explain the French Communist Party's stiffening opposition to the war. France, like Britain, cannot afford costly military establishments which will surely endanger Socialist or any other sort of economic reconstruction. The Socialist Party, originally critical of the government's Far Eastern policy, now vigorously supports the war, chiefly because in the present state of world trade the control of colonial economy appears to be necessary for the maintenance of living standards. Last week's long debates on the Indo-Chinese question were marked by passionate speeches, furious insults, and plentiful fist fights. An ingenious compromise, by which the Communist back-benchers abstained from voting while the party's ministers gave their support to M. Ramadier, alone saved the government from collapse. The Communists undoubtedly regard the German problem, concerning which they agree with other governmental parties, as more important than Indo-China, and so are reluctant to provoke a major crisis.

✱

CONFUSION AND SOMETHING LIKE PANIC reign in Asunción, the Paraguayan capital, where the seven-year old dictatorship of General Morinigo appears to be drawing to a close. Perhaps one-half of the army, which alone has kept the Caudillo in power, has now joined the revolt. The Colorado Party, Morinigo's only political ally, has either ignored his urgent appeal to raise a civilian militia or has been unable to comply. There are confident reports that the dictator is willing to negotiate with the military leaders of former President Franco's Febrerista Party. So far the rebels have not begun their announced drive upon the capital, but whatever the immediate outcome of the fighting, the military strength of the revolution appears to be sufficient to enforce its demand for unfettered elections to a Constituent Assembly. There is no doubt that in a free election the Febreristas would triumph, though the stability of their government would depend on Colonel Franco's ability to work out a program acceptable both to his military supporters and to the progressive groups—a difficult problem, as past experience proves.

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	345
To the Greeks, Bearing Gifts by Freda Kirchwey	347
Tax Cuts and Politics	349

ARTICLES

Marshall's Role in Moscow by Alexander Werth	350
A Plea to America by Elliott Roosevelt	352
Britain Without Empire by Harold J. Laski	353
Cartoon by Schloss	355
What America Could Do in Greece by Constantine Poulos	356
Kolonaki and the Others by Allen D. Fields	358
Dixie in Black and White, II. The People Win in Georgia by A. G. Mezerik	360
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	364
In One Ear by Lou Frankel	365

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Norfolk Memorials. A Poem by Coman Leavenworth	366
The Materialists: 1946. A Poem by Josephine Miles	366
Political Anthology by John Crowe Ransom	368
Out of the Frying Pan by James T. Farrell	368
Infantilism and Steinbeck by Eleanor Clark	370
Platonic Bohemian by Wylie Sypher	375
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch	375
Music by B. H. Haggin	378

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 204

by Jack Barrett	379
-----------------	-----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor

J. King Gordon

Literary Editor

Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor:

Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

ATTACKING THE GWYNNE-DONNELL BILL TO outlaw portal-to-portal suits, Senator Pepper said: "The Supreme Court of the United States happens to decide something in favor of the workers, so Congress at once proposes to reverse the Supreme Court." Actually, the Republican authors of the measure have gone even farther. They have seized the opportunity to amend not only the Fair Labor Standards Act but also the Walsh-Healey and Bacon-Davis acts which set minimum standards for employees of government contractors. Thus in addition to outlawing existing claims for uncompensated time, the bill subjects future suits which charge violations of these various acts to a two-year statute of limitations. And it issues an open invitation to chiselers by giving employers the right to plead "good faith" as a defense in wage-and-hour cases. Secretary of Labor Schwellenbach has rightly described this measure as one that threatens to deprive millions of unorganized workers of the protection now afforded them by wage-hour legislation. It is, as he says, "a backward step from the sound social progress we have made in the past fifteen years." A vigorous fight on this issue has been put up by a section of the Senate Democrats, but with some of their Southern colleagues joining the overwhelming majority of Republicans the bill was carried by 64 to 24.

✱

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S EXECUTIVE ORDER establishing elaborate and expensive machinery to keep the civil service free of "disloyal" elements is yet another sign of the way in which our fears of totalitarian communism are driving us to the adoption of totalitarian methods. The inquisitorial apparatus will include a "central master index" of persons who have undergone loyalty checks in the past, "Loyalty Boards" in each department, and an over-all "Loyalty Review Board" within the Civil Service Commission. The standards to be applied by these boards include not only evidence of treasonable and seditious activities but membership in any association designated by the Attorney General as "totalitarian, fascist, Communist, or subversive." As this list, apparently, is not to be made public, organizations included in it will have no chance of defending themselves, and persons joining them will do so without knowing that they are automatically placing themselves under suspicion of disloyalty. Investigators of applicants for government jobs are to make use not only of the FBI's and other official files but also of the notoriously biased and inaccurate records of the House Committee on Un-American Activities. They are to dig back into school and college records and to consult former employers and home-town police departments. Persons accused of disloyalty on the basis of such investigations will be notified of charges and allowed the assistance of counsel at hearings—an improvement on the war-time procedures of some agencies—but they may still be denied a chance to confront and examine their accusers. The opportunities for malicious gossip, character assassination, and the settlement of private grudges are obvious. The Presidential commission on whose advice Mr. Truman acted admits that the vast majority of public servants are "loyal." Hence the purpose of this order, which violates every American tradition, is to exclude a very small minority. It seems to us like spreading poison indiscriminately for the sake of killing a few rats.

✱

BRAZENLY FLOUTING ADMINISTRATION policy, the War Assets Administration has begun negotiations for sale of the government-owned aluminum-ingot plant at Massena, New York, to the Aluminum Company of America. As was pointed out in an article in The Nation three weeks ago, the government's refusal—up to now—to allow Alcoa to buy surplus primary aluminum facilities has enabled two new producers to gain a foothold in what was formerly Alcoa's private domain. Competition, in turn, has brought new life to the industry and by creating new demands has greatly enhanced the prospects for still further expansion. This good work would be endangered if the proposed deal goes through. Besides strengthening Alcoa's position in the ingot market, the sale would prevent either the Reynolds Metals Company or Henry Kaiser's Permanente Metals Corporation from ultimately acquiring the efficient, modern plant they both need to round out their facilities. Neither company could operate the plant at present because the only electric power available is controlled by Alcoa, which runs its own ingot plant at Massena. The Department of Justice has power to veto surplus-plant disposals which promote monopoly. This one certainly does. In the circumstances the only sensible course open to the department is to compel the WAA to offer to lease the plant to Alcoa until such time as power conditions permit a competitor to take over.

✱

EVIDENTLY THE SPONSOR IS STILL BOSS, EVEN at CBS. In any case, when the J. B. Williams Company (shaving cream, etc.) canceled its contract with Bill Shirer, he lost his spot on the air—Sunday at 5:45. The reasons were evidently not commercial, for Shirer had the highest Hooper rating—6.9—of all the daytime programs on CBS, with an audience of something like 5,000,000. He was dropped, we must assume, because his sponsor did not approve of his liberal political views, and because the broadcasting company, in spite of its past good record and the many declarations of independence by its high officials, was unwilling to keep Shirer on as a sustaining program until a bolder sponsor appeared. What we would like to know is, why should 5,000,000 people be deprived of their preferred news analyst because one soap manufacturer does not like his politics? We suggest that Nation readers who want Shirer back write to William S. Paley or Edwin R. Murrow and ask them that question. They might write with even better effect to the J. B. Williams Company, at Glastonbury, Connecticut. Only by such direct measures shall we be able to keep liberal broadcasting alive in these days when freedom is everywhere on the defensive.

To the Greeks, Bearing Gifts

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

THIS week the bill "to provide for assistance to Greece and Turkey" goes before the House. It provides funds for the purposes outlined by Mr. Truman and sets no limitations whatever on his discretion in using them.

It is clear enough what is going to happen if Congress approves the Truman Doctrine in these terms. We'll go into Greece with our dollars and our engineering and financial experts, with our arms and our military experts, and we'll help the Greek government put down the rebels in the north, assuming always guns and money can do it. (This isn't a safe assumption; Italian and German arms failed against the same guerrillas in the same mountains.)

Since we know the Greek monarchy is an empty fake and the government corrupt and greedy as well as tyrannical, we may try to bring about some political changes. We'll certainly keep a sharp eye on the money we lend the government so that it will be spent—presumably in America—for industrial equipment and arms and not siphoned into official Greek pockets. We'll probably do a decent job of economic rehabilitation within the limits imposed by the rotten political situation. But we will not try to oust the government, for that, our leaders are already explaining without a smile, would be intervention in Greece's internal affairs. Besides which, we could hardly oust the government and at the same time use it to crush the guerrilla forces and "stop communism."

Nor could reputable democratic politicians be found who would lend themselves to that job. Some of them undoubtedly deplore the fact that many guerrilla leaders are Communists; they may fear the spread of Communist influence in Greece. But whether they do or not, they know that the whole left, along with masses of people who are neither left nor right but have been terrorized and pushed around by government soldiers and by Royalist and fascist gangs, look upon the guerrilla fighters as their champions and the champions of freedom. For this reason, a leader of any democratic party who accepted a post in a government subsidized by the United States to wipe out the guerrillas and end the rebellion would not continue to be a leader. He would be written off quickly as a Royalist or fascist traitor. So the idea you begin to hear talked about—that Mr. Truman's mission in Greece can somehow bring into being a more democratic government which will convert the job of exterminating guerrillas into a democratic crusade against Soviet totalitarianism—is a meaningless fantasy. Or more likely it is just sugar-coating for a nasty political pill.

But it won't work. The true nature of the job the President has asked the country to take on has been clearly described by Mr. Acheson. We are going into Greece to put down a rebellion because that rebellion is regarded as a Russian thrust into an area which has become very important to the United States. The Administration believes the moment has come to stop Russia, whatever the means or the cost, because if we don't, Russia won't stop short of—well, where? Perhaps Iran, perhaps China, perhaps Rio or New York. Who knows? In any case, this is the Great Crusade—the one, you will remember, that Hitler invited us to join long ago.

In China the very extreme terrorist right wing has come up, since Mr. Truman announced his doctrine, with new plans to strangle every breath of opposition, liberal as well as Communist. In Spain the Falange has met and called for more aggressive action to bring its "syndicalist revolution" to full flower. The effect of the new policy on relations between the Communists and the other parties in the French Cabinet is discussed on another page. Everywhere, since Mr. Truman spoke, fascists and royalists and other assorted reactionaries have welcomed the new American doctrine with naked satisfaction; they believe their day has come. Set back, temporarily broken, by the defeat of the Axis, they suddenly see the tide reversed. If George II and President Inonu, why not they?

For the same reasons, liberals and Socialists abroad are openly anxious: more anxious, I am sure, than the Communists. The assertion in some inspired quarters that a setback to the President's policy "would discourage the friends of the Western democracies throughout Europe" is not borne out by the specific comments of individuals and non-Communist left newspapers. They talk about the new American imperialism and believe it means war. They believe we shall soon reverse our small, reluctant gesture against Franco. They are afraid we shall make tougher political conditions for loans or relief to European countries. The refusal to give or sell wheat to Yugoslavia or include that country in the proposed $350,000,000 relief measure will be taken as clear proof of discrimination on political grounds, no matter what the official explanation. Above all they are afraid the United Nations will be shoved aside, to wither or collapse, as bad feeling piles up between the East and West, and the United States goes its way alone, putting down communism by sheer weight of arms and money. With the atom bomb suspended just off-stage.

These things that are going to happen, or that democratic people fear are going to happen, may not trouble Mr. Truman. They are already troubling Congress, and so are a lot of other possible consequences. But the bitter fear of Russia, and of communism inspired and backed by Russia, will almost certainly be strong enough to outweigh their worries. The Administration is already mobilizing its best and most democratic spokesmen to stress the urgency of the situation, and dispel suspicion of its purposes. The debate will waver between the extremes of isolationist retreat and visions of beneficent world tutelage by a mighty America equipped with the latest technological gadgets of mass production and destruction. Old-fashioned democrats of both parties will dislike helping a decayed monarchy put down a popular rebellion, Communists or no Communists. Other democrats, who consider themselves more up-to-date, will argue that our new role as super-state demands that we move in and restore order before Russia takes over in Greece and elsewhere, but that we must do it nicely, with due regard to the sensibilities of the various peoples involved. Some, who have taken seriously the painful and expensive effort to create a real collective-security system, will resist a plan that ignores the United Nations. Others will urge with equal sincerity that the U. N. be spared a responsibility that might sink it; they want to calk up a few of the seams first. But behind all the arguments and all the unease will be the fear of Russia, and Russia's threat to our cherished "way of life."

People like myself, who believe that we are more likely to scuttle our way of life by following the Truman Doctrine than by rejecting it, must meet and answer that fear. It is the strongest antagonist we have to face. We know that communism threatens the established order wherever political instability and economic misery rule; and that includes most of the post-war world. If the only way to end the threat were to dispatch American arms and money to Greece and Turkey and wherever reactionary rulers are killing off Communist-led rebels, the chance of defeating the Truman Doctrine would be even smaller than it is.

If that were the only way. But I do not believe it is. I believe such a program is the product of national hysteria, in so far as it is not based on considerations of sheer power such as Harold Laski discusses on a later page. I believe there is a totally different choice that the American people can still make if they have the brains and courage.

The other choice is to take the revolution away from the Russians.

Does that sound impractical? I hope it does not, for it is clearly the only alternative to a struggle for power that can only widen the breach, perhaps fatally, between East and West in the world at large, and between left and right in each country. Must this nation be everywhere the champion of reaction; everywhere abandon to Russia the defense of the popular cause?

The way to prevent the spread of communism, as has been said many times in these pages, is to recognize the industrial and agrarian revolution that is sweeping Europe and Asia, and to work with, not against it. This means accepting socialism in most of Europe; and a new agrarian system in the Balkans and in Asia. And this, in turn, implies the overthrow of the ruling groups that have in the past dominated those countries through a variety of political machines—monarchist, fascist, and even republican.

The fact is, the United States has much to gain in the long run from the change the old world is going through: economic advantages as well as the hope of peace. Only by the disappearance of obsolete systems of economy that keep 90 per cent of the populations without means to raise their standard of living, can trade be effectively promoted, and labor protected from low-wage competition abroad.

The most tragic lack at this moment is a progressive political movement in America which could urge this position with real effect—among the public and in Washington. So far organized labor has been silent. No statement of policy has come from the A. F. of L., the C. I. O., the C. I. O.—P. A. C., or from any national union. No effective progressive wing now exists in either major party. No left party has the strength to make its views felt. How astonishing it must seem in England and on the Continent that American labor should silently acquiesce in the new doctrine!

Because of this lack it is doubly necessary for such organized groups as exist, and for all individuals with conviction in the matter, to protest against the Administration's bill; to organize meetings; to send letters and telegrams to the President and the State Department, to Senators and Congressmen. The Progressive Citizens of America has issued a strong statement opposing the Truman plan and urging action through the United Nations; it has called a meeting of protest at Madison Square Garden in New York, which is announced elsewhere in this issue. The Americans for Democratic Action has not uttered a word on the greatest issue before the country; can it afford to remain silent? Progressive opinion should consolidate, even at this late hour, and urge that action by the United States be made to coincide with our obligations both as a democratic state and as a member of the United Nations.

The progressive position is easy to state: in-so-far as action is needed to restore the economy of Greece it should be carried out through the agencies of the United Nations in the manner proposed in the excellent report of the Food and Agricultural Organization, which is discussed by Keith Hutchison this week. The funds for this purpose should be appropriated by Congress, but with certain definite strings attached. No funds should be released until there has been established in Greece a coalition government, replacing the Royalist government now in power, to hold office during a transition period in which honest attempts will be made to end the civil war by conciliation and the promise of fundamental reforms. As for the alleged border violations and threats of military aggression from neighboring states, no action whatsoever should be taken until the United Nations Commission now in Greece has finished its investigation and made its report. And any measures agreed to in the light of that report should also be carried through by the United Nations. The proposal to send huge funds to Turkey to build up its already huge army should be voted down without any qualifications. If Turkey is threatened by Russia its complaints can be brought before the United Nations as was the complaint of Iran a year ago.

Tax Cuts and Politics

THE stand taken by the Administration against any tax cuts in the present year may be politically vulnerable, but it is strongly fortified with economic arguments. The President's budget provided for only a small surplus of revenue over expenditure, and this surplus could easily be wiped out in these uncertain times by unexpected contingencies. Already it seems likely that greater provision will have to be made for foreign loans and relief, while, domestically, a slump in farm prices would involve the government in heavy expenditure under the Steagall act.

The Republicans maintain, it is true, that substantial savings in the cost of government are possible, though they have yet to agree among themselves about the maximum extent of such economies. While the House aims at a reduction in expenditure of $6 billion, the Senate holds that $4½ billion is a more reasonable figure. In both cases, it must be understood, these sums represent no more than targets, for even if Congress agrees to sweat down the departmental budgets by the necessary billions, there is no guaranty that expenditure will not be swollen anew by supplementary appropriations. This is all the more probable in view of the nature of some of the "economies" already announced. For instance, the House Appropriations Committee has lopped the impressive total of $897,072,750 off the Treasury and Post Office estimates. However, $800,000,000 of this sum was found by reducing the estimates for tax refunds, and as Representative Albert Gore has pointed out, refund claims will have to be met sooner or later.

Even assuming that $4 to $6 billion can be saved, the case for allotting the whole amount to debt reduction cannot be lightly dismissed. We are still in an inflationary situation; business is booming and making bumper profits; national income is at a record level. It would seem elementary wisdom to seize this opportunity to cut down the national debt. Tax reductions now may add to the inflationary pressure; it would be far better to reserve them for a time when lagging business needs a shot in the arm.

Arguments such as these, however, do not impress the Republicans, who are determined to make a record in tax reduction this year if they do nothing else. Representative Knutson, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, has stuck firmly to the pledge he gave on behalf of his party during the election, and his colleagues on the committee have now adopted his 20 per cent across-the-board income-tax cut with only slight modifications. To meet the objection that this plan meant less than a 1 per cent increase in net incomes in the lowest brackets while raising those of the highest by over 68 per cent, a cut of 30 per cent has been approved for persons with taxable incomes not exceeding $1,000. This means that a married man with two children earning $3,300, before deductions, will save about $57 on his tax bill. Taxpayers with taxable incomes ranging from $1,000 to $302,000 will be treated all alike to a 20 per cent cut, which obviously will have far more significance in relation to income in the higher than in the lower brackets. The 1,100 persons expected to report incomes greater than $302,000 are to be allowed only a 10½ per cent reduction—a mere $110,000 on a million-dollar income.

If we can prudently reduce taxes at all this year, we ought to concentrate on bringing relief to those families in the low-income brackets who have been hardest hit by the rising cost of living. This could be done in two ways: (1) by reducing or eliminating excise taxes on non-luxuries, many of which constitute a heavy burden on wage-earners and people on low salaries; or (2) by raising personal exemptions from $500 to $700. Representative Forand, Rhode Island Democrat, has formally proposed the second of these plans, which would mean substantial saving to those in the lowest brackets (particularly if their families were large), moderate but worth-while relief for the middle brackets, and very little for the millionaires. As might be expected, Mr. Forand has been jumped on by the Wall Street Journal, which complains that his plan would remove nine million persons from the tax rolls. Why not? This group, whose incomes are so low that this increase in exemptions would remove their liability to income tax altogether, are already paying their fair share toward national expenses through indirect taxation.

Marshall's Role in Moscow

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Moscow, March 22 (by Cable)

ALREADY a few basic facts have emerged from the Foreign Ministers' conference. One of them is that Bevin and Marshall—for the present, at any rate—are the squeezers and Molotov and Bidault the squeezed. Somebody who was there at the time the question of reparations was first raised said he had never seen Molotov so bewildered and upset as when Bevin and Marshall told him, in effect, that they were not in favor of anything even remotely resembling the Russian reparations claims.

It is true Marshall said it much more nicely than Bevin. In fact, Marshall has become something of a mystery man at the conference. Only once so far has he snapped angrily at the Russians. That was when Molotov asserted that the British and Americans had already helped themselves to ten billion dollars of reparations from Germany—mentioning, by curious coincidence, a figure that corresponds to the Russian reparations claims spread over twenty years. Marshall sharply denounced Molotov's figures as absurd. Apart from this incident, Marshall has been remarkably friendly and polite, never missing an opportunity to say that the United States can never forget all the Russians suffered in the war and that, of course, they should have reparations—sometime. Marshall, in fact, is so nice most of the time that a somewhat bewildering legend is growing up that he was not really to blame for Truman's message to Congress; some people are even circulating the rather improbable story that the Truman message was rewritten in Marshall's absence after the President's meeting with Vandenberg! Certain Russians have the idea that Marshall, who says little and avoids getting into scraps at the conference, is a "moderate" and that the real Russia hater and bully is Bevin.

That Bevin is a "Russ-hater" is, in a sense, true enough; he also does most of the dirty work of answering Molotov's charges with countercharges. But it is fairly obvious that Bevin and Marshall are on one side of the fence and the Russians on the other, while the French are not really anywhere. They are merely miserable, and spend most of the time complaining that the British are neither allies nor gentlemen.

No one can say how the conference will end, but the impression is that the Russians are more than ever determined that it should be a success. They are clearly worried about "America's new foreign policy." Although Stalin some time ago said to Hugh Bailey that he did not give a damn about the American navy in the Mediterranean, and still may not "give a damn" about an American naval squadron visiting Istanbul in the near future, he cannot like the implications of this display of American armed might so near to Odessa and Baku. The Soviet Union's economic difficulties are considerable at present, and there is every reason for believing that the Russians will be as accommodating as possible. We have already seen them swallowing their pride over a variety of questions. But there is just the danger that the belt Bevin and Marshall are pulling around Russia's waist may suddenly snap—it might if Russia's economic and other troubles are exaggerated. "We hold all the trump cards and can make the Russians squeal," one British personage remarked. This conviction is a dangerous gamble. When Molotov said that the abandonment of reparations "would be a crime against the Soviet people," he clearly indicated that under no circumstances could he take responsibility for such a "crime."

The arguments on both sides are sufficiently familiar to need no detailed repetition. The British say, in effect, "Let's build up the German economy, especially in the western zone—if the Russians want to cooperate in their zone, so much the better, but if they don't it can't be helped—and we can see about reparations later. Anyway the Russians' demand for ten billion dollars is excessive. Moreover, let them, if they want economic unity, abandon their Soviet Aktiengesellschaften representing 70 per cent of the industry in eastern Germany and stop taking reparations out of current production. Let them join us in building up the level of industry and putting Germany on its feet. Then there will be coal and all sorts of commodities for everybody. But meanwhile, let's not start dismantling factories in the Ruhr and Rhineland."

The Russians have not revealed whether they are willing to abandon their hold on German industry in the east, which admittedly is supplying reparations out of current production, although Molotov has assured the conference that "every kopeck taken in the way of reparations would be accounted for." But the eastern zone's industry, as the Russians have reiterated, is a small thing; the backbone of the German industrial system is in the British zone. "If," they say, "we are in agreement with Bevin about raising the industrial level, it is not for the same reasons. By raising the level of industry we can obtain reparations, even though the restoration of German living standards is delayed. But haven't we first claim?"

In other words, unless America agrees that Britain should give the Russians substantial reparations out of German production, it is doubtful whether the Russians can afford to throw into a common pool for German reconstruction the only resource they have left—those Soviet-run concerns in eastern Germany. If they don't, Moscow will be represented as having wrecked the idea of "economic unity," and Britain and America can go ahead with the building of a "prosperity zone in western Germany." That would mean, in fact, splitting Germany in two, an outcome which some have been prophesying since the beginning of the conference. It is a solution which Russia will probably do its utmost to avoid, but which some people on the British and American side would welcome, since it would fit in with the plan for isolating the Soviets—and moreover put them in the wrong. There is a widespread impression in Moscow that this is the crux of the whole matter.

Reparations are problem number one, and if no compromise on them can be worked out in Moscow, other problems will remain of academic interest. If there are two Germanys, the questions of the level of industry, of centralization versus federalization, of denazification and the rest become matters which will have to be examined from an entirely new angle. Or rather, will they need examining at all if Germany becomes simply one small element in the great conflict between East and West? Bevin so far appears unperturbed by the prospect of the eastern zone remaining separate from the western zones—despite all the ominous implications of such a development. The French, for their part, are between the devil and the deep sea. They say they must have coal or they won't play ball. The British answer is, "Give us time to build up western Germany and there will be coal for everybody." But like the Russians, the French do not want to wait or take a chance on it.

That is how things are at present. At times the four viewpoints seem to be converging quite satisfactorily. But when one thinks of the fundamental problems tied up with reparations one cannot help wondering whether this is not illusory. It seems certain that Marshall, if he wishes to, can play a big role in reconciling differences. Outwardly he has been more generous to the Russians than Bevin; his attitude is more flexible. And he has been more generous to the French on several points. The conference's fate is really in Marshall's hands. There is a feeling in all delegations that he should take upon himself the role of mediator. If, instead, he impersonates St. George slaying the Communist dragon, the conference will lead to nothing good. Marshall could prove to the world that America is not "imperialist" and has not started on an all-out anti-red crusade. But will he do it?

One might almost say that America has the responsibility of deciding whether there is to be one world or two worlds. It seems paradoxical that after the Truman message the French and the Russians and some of the British should be hopefully looking to Marshall for a lead.

A Plea to America

BY ELLIOTT ROOSEVELT

LESS than two years after the conclusion of the war our top government officials have announced a new foreign policy for the United States. Mr. Acheson, our Under Secretary of State, has proclaimed at a Congressional hearing that Communist governments in Greece and Turkey would be dangerous to the security and the future of the United States. This, in so many words, means that the Soviet Union is an enemy nation in the eyes of our government. This statement of policy was put forward to explain why President Truman had asked for loans and military aid to the present governments of Greece and Turkey. The theory behind this proposal is that by making such loans we shall bolster the present governments of these two countries and prevent internal revolt leading to eventual Communist regimes.

What kind of governments are these which we are proposing to bolster? Are they democratic? Not even the most reactionary newspapers in this country have claimed that the present government of Greece or that of Turkey can be classified as a democracy. The fact is that they are much more nearly totalitarian than democratic. There is little free speech. There is oppression of minorities—and of majorities, too, for all we know. But our government chooses to support this totalitarianism rather than risk the spread of communism.

Did we fight the last war for no purpose? Should we have tossed our armies in the fight on the side of Hitler to help bring about defeat of the Soviet Union?

Our government leaders seem to think that communism is a threat to the future of a democratic United States and that they must fight the Communists in Greece. I have read that there is a small, very militant element of the Greek population which is Communist. But why Turkey? I have never heard that there were any militant pro-Soviet Communists threatening the Turkish government. In fact, it is hard to understand the interest in Turkey at all unless we are planning to encourage Turkey to bait the Soviet Union by creating incidents on the border between the two countries, thereby risking a third world war. Is that our purpose?

Turkey was definitely not friendly to our cause in the last war until it became quite evident that we would win. Turkey certainly is not threatened internally with communism. Turkey today cannot be described as a free, democratic country. Why Turkey?

What is the truth of the post-war threat of communism enveloping the world? The truth is that Russia does not have hundreds of millions of dollars with which to spread the doctrine of communism throughout the world.

It is unable to export thousands of tons of food to help the starving people of the world. But communism is spreading in many countries. Why?

At the end of the war the peoples of the Far East and Middle East and of all Europe looked with admiration and burning hope to the United States to lead in the establishment of free and truly democratic governments in their countries. They looked to the United States to back up militantly the doctrines of the Atlantic Charter. What did they get? We made no protest when the European powers moved with force to reestablish their colonial empires. We failed to lead the way in uprooting Nazism in Germany. We did participate in UNRRA, but we later killed that organization and put relief on a political basis. We now use relief for the starving millions of Europe as a gun in the back to force them to support governments of which we approve. Is that democratic procedure? No wonder communism spreads.

The people of Europe have become discouraged. The people of the Far East have become bitter. We have failed to lead. We have not established any principles. We have failed to give force and effect to the United Nations. In fact, by our action with regard to Greece and Turkey we have openly flouted the United Nations and possibly signed its death warrant.

The actions of our leaders have been based on the theory that we could never reconcile our differences with the Soviet Union. They believe that communism and democracy cannot live side by side in the world, at peace with each other. I do not agree with this premise. There must be men of integrity and courage in America who can reconcile the existing differences between ourselves and the Soviet Union and bring peace with honor to our country.

If the leaders in both the Democratic Party and the Republican Party continue our present foreign policy the result will be a divided world which will arm itself again for inevitable conflict. Huge military budgets will remain, and economic disaster will result for the world and the United States within a few years. This will be followed by a war of destruction that will reduce the population of the globe by billions, not millions.

It is my belief that when the chips are down the best answer to the threat of communism is a living, working democracy such as ours can be. I devoutly hope that the people of our country will realize that it is not just their dollars which are being risked in this gamble today. If we destroy the United Nations the last chance of peace will disappear.

Britain Without Empire

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, March 21

PRESIDENT TRUMAN has asked that the "American Century" be opened without delay. Whatever the rhetoric about democracy and freedom, he is asking the Congress to build a new empire and designing its boundaries to safeguard the now vital stake of American oil interests in the Middle East. It is notable that the first two governments he seeks to assist are neither democratic nor free. It is significant that, like all political leaders in his position, he does not point out the real lesson of Great Britain's presence in Greece. An imperial power can never stop at partial domination. Openly or secretly, it must be the effective sovereign authority.

As necessity forces British retirement, policy persuades American entry. The United Nations organization is ignored. The timing can only be intended as a warning to Russia that Washington will go its own way regardless of what the world may think. These are high risks to take if one looks ten years ahead, but the stakes are so huge that the President's advisers are asking the right to put the fate of civilization into hands that are guided, even if only half consciously, by what has been one of the most direct sources of conflict for over fifty years. It is upon the wisdom of that gamble that this Congress has to decide. It is either to found a new imperialism or to stand fast by the policy of planned cooperation without which the United Nations has no meaning.

I

In June, 1948, Great Britain will leave India; within a pretty proximate future Burma will become either a dominion of the British Commonwealth of Nations or, at its will, an independent state; and within the next year or so Egypt, which Great Britain has dominated ever since the bombardment of Alexandria in 1882, will have been evacuated. The situation in Palestine, where on any showing Mr. Bevin has been guilty of grievous errors, is an index to principles of Middle Eastern policy which a Labor government will find it neither possible nor wise to maintain. In British possessions in Africa and Malaya, in the Caribbean and the Far East, there are deep strivings which make likely continuing change in their status.

It is interesting to watch the response to these events in the outside world. The general tendency in Soviet Russia is to regard them as signs of the twilight of the British Empire; for Soviet propagandists we are going the way of Rome and Spain. Many Americans, notably Walter Lippmann, call it the end of Britain as a first-class power. Henceforth there will be a vacuum which in Mr. Lippmann's judgment it is the task of America to fill lest it be filled with the influence of the Soviet Union; this, one is to suppose, would jeopardize the prospects of the American Century. It is not, I think, insignificant that these very different schools of thought are both in agreement, for all practical purposes, with Winston Churchill, who views with horror and indignation what he has termed the "liquidation of the Empire," since he regards the Empire not only as one of the linchpins of law and order in the world but as the sole condition upon which the influence of Great Britain can be preserved.

Whatever view we may accept, it is obvious that Mr. Attlee and his colleagues have taken a series of decisions which are bound to alter the equilibrium of power all over the world. What they have decided makes the United States fundamentally a Mediterranean power; it makes it essential for Americans to watch with care and precision the political evolution of the African continent; it insures that China and Japan must be regarded for almost as long as any of us can foresee as at once frontiers of the United States and, with the newly acquired Pacific islands, bases for both attack and defense in the contingent strategy of war. Because of these decisions, the push of American oil interests into the Middle East becomes an advance which makes the future of Greece of vital importance to the foreign policy of America, and the whole region from the oil fields of Iran to the coastal ports of Palestine must be viewed by the men who advise the President with watchful eyes and a profound sense of responsibility. The objective facts of the situation have made isolationism for the United States a doctrine wholly devoid of meaning. The whole world is now on the doorstep of America. In the next twenty years American statesmen have also to take momentous decisions. They, too, have a rendezvous with destiny.

II

The relations between Great Britain and Russia, on the one hand, and between Russia and the United States, on the other, make the Middle East the nerve-center of our own imperial problem. We are still in Greece be-

HAROLD J. LASKI, professor of political science at the University of London, is widely known as one of the leaders of the British Labor Party and the author of a number of books on political subjects. These are the first sections of an article which will be concluded in an early issue.

cause of the strategic significance of the Middle East. We are suspicious of Yugoslavia under Marshal Tito because of our interest in the Middle East. For the same reason we are the patrons of that twilight Arab League which Mr. Eden called into existence during the war. For the same reason Mr. Bevin hurriedly evoked the unreal kingdom of Transjordan while the Anglo-American Commission on Palestine was still sitting. For the same reason Mr. Bevin, backed by the officials of the Foreign Office and the defense chiefs, has sought to bolster up the ugly feudalism of the Arab effendi in Iraq and Syria and Saudi-Arabia, for the defense of the first two of which we are in effect responsible, and to the third of which we pay an annual financial tribute. For the same reason we are ready—assuming its claim to sovereignty over the Sudan is set aside—to evacuate Egypt, ceasing to use it to safeguard the Suez Canal.

For the same reason Mr. Attlee and Mr. Bevin have been able to persuade their Cabinet colleagues to throw overboard precise and unmistakable pledges made by the Labor Party as recently as May, 1945, to those Jews who seek to go on building their National Home; and, not daring to declare full-scale war upon them, have now thrown the problem of the Mandate for Palestine back to the United Nations, in a rather Micawber-like hope that some way of escape may be found from the cul-de-sac into which Mr. Bevin has led us. For the same reason also we, like the United States, have a passionate faith in the right of Iran to independence and integrity so long as its government does not seek to revoke the invaluable concession to the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company. Were Iran to have a sudden change of sovereign heart on that concession, its independence might acquire a somewhat fatigued and anachronistic air. America knows how easily that air can develop when countries like Haiti, Nicaragua, Santo Domingo, and Mexico show an inadequate appreciation of American interest in their well-being.

The Middle East means lines of communication, and it means oil. British policy there is set by these two considerations. When all the complicated rationalizations have been given their due evaluation, it is oil and strategy which dictate our decisions. The emphasis upon oil is intelligible; the navy and a mechanized army, as well as the air force, will, for the next generation at any rate, live or die by oil. The emphasis on lines of communication is less understandable today than it was in 1939. With the coming withdrawal from Egypt and India, with the paralysis, for many years to come, of Germany and Japan, British anxiety for the control of the Mediterranean seems excessive, as patronage of the Arab states seems extravagant, unless the major purpose is to prevent Russian infiltration into this area.

If this is the major purpose, I think two things are to be said. First, we are backing the wrong horse; it is inconceivable folly for Socialist Britain to support a group of Arab feudal chiefs who have never shown any interest in the well-being of their unhappy subjects, who have used Great Britain to get rid of the French influence in their territories and, as the war made clear, will turn on Great Britain the moment they see their opportunity. Objectively, our Middle Eastern policy makes Mr. Bevin the ally of American Standard Oil on the one hand and of the Grand Mufti on the other. It makes him hostile to every interest which wishes to see economic progress in that area, whether it be Jews in Palestine or Communist-inspired reformers in Persia. The Middle East needs a TVA, indeed, a series of TVA's. But they will not be developed if the Arab effendi can help it, for the simple reason that they would be fatal to the vested interests the effendi represent. Then, on the strategic side, picturesque phrases about the "life line of Britain" and the rest do not conceal the fact that the Middle East, by its geographical location, is the "life line" of Russia too, and that if the vast army Britain maintains there assures us Iranian and Mosul oil, it also provides protection for American oil interests at the expense of the British taxpayer, without a shadow of proportionate return.

If Mr. Bevin were the realist he always insists he is, he would tell his military and diplomatic advisers that the Crimean War is over and that India is on the threshold of independence. If he mingles imagination and resolution with the sturdy common sense he shows in a trade-union negotiation, he can throw away his fears, settle down to a sensible negotiation with Stalin and his colleagues, save Great Britain much obloquy, and dissolve a good deal of fantastic mythology which reads more like a legacy from Mr. Kipling than a sober estimate of contemporary realities.

III

A Socialist Britain cannot be an imperialist Britain. The contribution we can make to world peace must not be set in terms of domination by our naval strength or, as in the past, by our power to exploit the resources of subject peoples but by our cooperation with free peoples on terms that make their well-being the correlative of our own. Our security will then be not a by-product of imposed authority but a collective security resting upon the common purposes of an economic structure which, increasingly, seeks planned production for community consumption.

When, therefore, American commentators speak of the "end of the British Empire," it is well to be clear what they mean. If they mean that Britain has no longer a place as a first-class power, the answer is that they are accepting a pattern of the future which assumes already the breakdown of the United Nations and the rapid drift to a third world war. On this point I hope that no Socialist would wish to see Great Britain struggle for equal power with the United States and Russia if the price is the continued subjection of India and Burma and the rest. Burke was right when he said that you cannot suppress freedom abroad without ultimately destroying it at home also. There is not an atom of reason, once our economic reorganization is complete, why in the altered pattern of British relationships our people should be poorer or less influential than in the past. Britain's investing class, no doubt, will suffer. But their loss, in the long run, will be the people's gain. The artificial structure of the Empire will be adjusted to foundations compatible with those relations of economy which will make possible a new expansion, granted we can keep the peace.

Socialists have no reason to fear the new pattern that is emerging, once there is hope that peace will be kept. Here, I venture to think, two general conclusions are in order. The first is that if peace cannot be kept, the next war will destroy Great Britain as a civilized people, and that all discussions of its prospects as a non-imperial power are simply speculations in a vacuum. The other is in confutation of Lippmann's theory that since Great Britain has abandoned the task, the United States must hold Russia "at the key points, at Germany and Western Europe, at Turkey and in Japan; . . . the place to stop the Greek guerrillas who are trained and equipped in Yugoslavia is in Moscow." This theory not only presupposes a "redefinition of the balance of power" in terms of a threat of war, but also assumes the incompatibility of Russian social principles with the "American way of life" and the consequent need to back with men and arms as well as dollars a policy in essence similar to that which Mr. Churchill sponsored in 1919 and Hitler preached in the years when he was hoping for Anglo-American support in a crusade against Bolshevism. At least it is a comfort to us who are Socialists to know that a Britain in process of shedding its imperialism does not need to play with that kind of fire. I suspect that Jefferson and Lincoln, Woodrow Wilson and Franklin Roosevelt, would none of them have been very eager to risk wrecking the world in order to preserve those vast industrial empires which, however unconsciously, Mr. Lippmann really makes the beneficiaries of his crusading zeal. Certainly it offers no happy prospect to the ordinary American worker in Passaic, New Jersey, or Youngstown, Ohio. I think it is better to attempt to readjust, as we are doing in Britain, the productive relations of society than to call a momentous threat to peace a redefinition of the balance of power. But perhaps this is what is really meant by the "American Century."

President Truman must know that he plans by his new policy to make American money the safeguard of Greek reaction and American advisers the architects of its efficiency. He must know that he is, in fact, instructing Turkey to act as a barrier against Russian access to the Mediterranean and that he thus is not only asking his people to support a still partially feudal dictatorship but accepting on their behalf the traditional British folly, originated by Disraeli, of backing the wrong horse. The peoples of the Middle East are to be pinned down in vassalage to obsolete regimes until there arises a power strong enough to rescue them from the dependence America will be driven to force upon them. I had thought the great lesson of the Roosevelt years was American recognition that the task of the United States was to aid in the emancipation of peoples struggling to be free; but if Congress accepts the Truman policy it throws overboard that lesson for an objective as old and as evil as the history of political society.

What America Could Do in Greece

BY CONSTANTINE POULOS

Athens, March 23 (by Cable)

THE Greeks don't kid themselves. They are politically too keen to misinterpret America's sudden interest in their welfare. They know the urgent Greek request for aid did not precede the American decision but followed it.

The Royalist right is ecstatic, the center confused and worried, the left shaken and bitter. The people in general are hopeful, ashamed, and frightened. Their very deep affection for the United States makes them hope that something may work out, but they are ashamed of their fawning, prideless leaders who are scraping and bowing before "Uncle Truman" and acting as if they had had something to do with the American decision. And they are frightened by the coupling of Greece with Turkey. The geography of Greece and the temperament of the people are two major reasons, they say, why Greece cannot be an effective American bastion against Russia like Turkey. But the people know they need help.

Because of the government's increasing expenditures for the army, the Greek people would slide down to a dangerous bread-and-water diet and industry could not operate at better than 33 per cent of its pre-war level if Greece did not receive any outside assistance this year. With the original State Department sum of $50,000,000 for economic assistance only, Greece could have pulled through this year on a bread-and-olive-oil diet and its industry could have functioned at slightly over 50 per cent of the pre-war figure. With the $125,000,000 allocated by the President's recommendation, the Greek people can be fed pretty nearly as well as before the war and industry can be maintained at roughly three-fourths of its pre-war level.

But this estimate presupposes a great deal. It assumes that the Greek government will willingly reverse itself on its stubbornly defended laissez faire economic policy. Past experience indicates that it will not. The Anglo-Greek economic agreement signed in January of last year specifically provided that the Greek government would take steps to revise its taxation set-up. This was not done. The report prepared last fall by the United Nations Food and Agricultural Organization at the request of the Greek government recommended various governmental reforms. The British Economic Mission in Athens has given a great deal of good advice. Last August the London Economist warned that laissez faire in Greece "under present conditions would mean anarchy." No one in the Greek government took heed. It would have meant cracking down on boys who had spent millions of gold sovereigns to put them in power.

The American Economic Mission will be powerless if it is to serve in an advisory capacity only. The chief of the American Economic Mission to Greece must have the authority to shut off dollars on twenty-four hours' notice. Not at the end of a month or the end of a quarter, for that will not feaze the dilatory, procrastinating Greek government and its backers. Some American observers here believe it would be advisable to leave the final authority in Washington, but with assurances that when a recommendation to block funds came from Athens it would be acted upon immediately. It is suggested that this would avoid giving too much responsibility and power to one man. But there would always be the danger that a recommendation to Washington would have to go through a bureaucratic shuffle of low, middle, and high policy and counter-policy.

One of the things demanded by the Porter mission was the establishment of a Department of Foreign Trade under the Ministry of National Economy. This department would be headed by an experienced American working, under contract, for the Greek government. It would issue licenses for imports and exports, control all foreign procurement, and maintain a division of statistics. Such a department, cooperating closely with the already established Anglo-American Currency Committee, would enable the American Economic Mission to keep track of how the dollars were being spent. Its actions should be supervised by the mission, which should also have the authority to ask for and to check any information bearing on the economic situation.

This brings up the matter of military supplies and equipment. The amount of money to be expended for this purpose must be precisely determined, and it must be stipulated that none of the sums allocated for economic assistance may be later diverted to military use. One can easily visualize the Greek government pleading at a not very late date that the funds granted for military purposes are exhausted and suggesting the transfer of sums from the economic-aid reserve. In this it might well be supported by American military men on the Economic Mission, who would want to keep strengthening the anti-Russian army in the Balkans, and by American diplomats in Athens, who would want to continue chasing that will-o'-the-wisp "law and order."

It seems dead certain that we can pour a billion dollars into Greece without making the country safe for democracy unless we are ready to support and work with the progressive forces there. If, as President Truman warned, Greece is in danger of falling into the hands of the Communists today, the fault lies squarely with the British, who three years ago refused to work with anyone except the extreme right Royalists. If Greece falls into the hands of the Communists tomorrow, the fault will be ours.

President Truman said, "Greece is today without funds to finance the importation of those goods which are essential to bare subsistence." Is this the fault of the Greek left or of the Greek right wing and its government—which has squandered and dissipated Greece's foreign credits in the past two years on Packards, Buicks, nylons, and cosmetics?

President Truman said, "A militant minority exploiting human want and misery was able to create political chaos, which until now has made economic recovery impossible." In all of Greece the "militant minority" is weakest on the island of Crete. Yet in the first weeks of this month there was a serious general strike of Cretan farmers against the government. The farmers demanded the sale of their olive oil through their own cooperatives and not through profiteering brokers and middlemen as the government insisted; provision of adequate funds by the agricultural bank for cultivation needs; reduction of the high government tax on wine production, which seriously limits export possibilities; rebuilding of their school houses and appointment of school teachers.

The government wants to cut its tax-free backers in on the lucrative olive-oil market. It will lend them money to buy oil while they hoard their gold sovereigns. Meanwhile the Cretan farmer who produces the oil gets a miserly return and the government banks have no funds to lend him to enable him to till his soil. Cretan children did not go to school during the occupation and still cannot go because no attempt has been made to rebuild the schools. If there is a school building, there is no teacher. Yet the government can afford to buy limousines by the dozen for Ministers, and Ministers' wives can afford to go to the elegant bars and night clubs of Athens playfully carrying around with them "the latest American novelty"—a pocket radio which costs $90 here, the equivalent of three months' pay for the average worker.

The Greek story is an old and oft-told story. UNRRA files in Washington are certainly available to the White House; they give a good idea of who it is that has been exploiting "the human want and misery of the Greek people." Last year, when the government allowed its friends to bring into the black market foodstuffs from Turkey and Egypt, the UNRRA mission in Greece turned its head. Had it reported, as required by the regulations, that supplementary foodstuffs were being brought into the country independently, UNRRA headquarters in the United States would have automatically reduced the food allotments for Greece, and the Greek people would have been forced to buy black-market stuff at exorbitant prices.

For two years the Greek rightists have shrilled that the country's troubles are primarily political and only secondarily economic—as if the two could be divorced. They have proved themselves incapable of bringing improvement in either field. They have no economic program except one which drives the people in desperation toward the extreme left. Their only political program is something they call "super-dynamic," which means extermination of the left.

Let us assume that the government, encouraged as it has been by the American action, manages to suppress and disperse the partisans. What then? As the Liberal leader, Sophoulis, said in the Greek Parliament last January, "For one whole generation there will be no calm in our land, and the Greek people will be divided by an abyss of savage and unquenchable hatreds." A royalist-military dictatorship under the sponsorship of the United States will flourish for a while, and later a new and bitter struggle will break out, with substantial help for the left "from the north." Spain all over again.

The United States has a grand opportunity to make Greece a prize example of political and social democracy progressing along parallel lines. With United States help, Greece can, as the FAO report said last year, "double or triple its per capita production and national income within a short span of years by the effective development and use of its potentialities." The FAO report urged a "New Deal" for Greece. That is all the Greek people want. But if Roosevelt's successor believes he can bring the New Deal in Greece by working with the Royalist right wing he is due for a rude awakening.

Although Acting Secretary of State Acheson, in his first appearance before the House Foreign Affairs Committee, said the United States would deal with the present Greek government, he recalled that General Marshall, as the President's envoy to China, had urged the Chinese government to take steps to make itself more representative. In the case of Greece, a word to King George would be sufficient. George will do as he is told—even if it means dissolving Parliament and asking the Liberal Party to form a coalition government which would function until conditions permit the holding of elections. Otherwise, to preserve our new frontier, we shall have to acquiesce in a vicious rightist dictatorship.

I expect the musical show which opened here last week entitled "Send Us More, Uncle Truman," will have a long run.

Kolonaki and the Others

BY ALLEN D. FIELDS

NOW we must get to know about Kolonaki Hill. Americans will like to say Kolonaki, because once you learn to say it straight, after repeating it slowly, it rolls right off your tongue. You get to say an unusual foreign word and you can get the flavor of speaking an alien tongue without having to bother about learning how to talk the whole damned language.

I think that the men we send over to Kolonaki Hill will like the word, and unless I miss my guess, I think they'll get to like the place too, just as the Italians, Germans, and British who were there before them did.

Kolonaki is a Greek word for a place in Athens.

Kolonaki Hill is over to one end of Athens. It rises behind the Royal Palace, which faces Constitution Square. Constitution Square—that's where Dmitri Kessl, of Life, took those pictures the time the Security Battalions, still wearing their German uniforms, shot at a parade that had been banned, or had not been banned, or too late—it was all very confusing, and it happened some time ago.

There was one picture of some people, some girls, dunking a banner into some blood of some of the people who were killed there in front of the palace at the very foot of that Kolonaki Hill.

Over to the right of the palace is the Grande Bretagne Hotel, but our men won't be able to get that nasal sound in "Bretagne"; so, like the British who had their HQ there, they'll just call it the "G. B." Our men will say, "Meet me at the G. B. bar," all the time.

✱

Kolonaki Hill is the Park Avenue of Greece. The embassies, and the fine homes, and the mansions, and all the kinds of places that make you think you're not in Greece at all are up there.

There's no destruction up on the hill, as there is throughout the rest of Athens and Greece. That's because when the British were fighting the Greeks, they kept withdrawing and withdrawing, and then the British decided to base their defense around the base of Kolonaki Hill. I don't think that there was any real military reason, because they could have defended Piraeus instead, but the British were more at home at Kolonaki Hill than anywhere else, and they just naturally tended to defend "home." We'll be inclined to do the same.

What's wrong with defending Park Avenue? This isn't meant facetiously—there's nothing wrong with defending Park Avenue. But that's why we must get to know about Kolonaki Hill—it isn't really like Park Avenue.

In Greece there are in the main just two kinds of people. The Kolonaki—meaning the people of the hill—and the others. You could identify people quickly and easily that way. Is he Kolonaki?

We'll get to know many more Kolonaki than "others." They'll be our interpreters, and our friends, and when we do go out to dinner it will be on Kolonaki Hill. We're small-d democrats—certainly! But the Kolonaki will be better dressed—neater, cleaner—and they'll talk more English than the "others." They'll make better aides; they know how to get things done. It would be crazy and inefficient as hell not to use them. We can handle them, and they're more fun to be with.

✱

Some things about the Kolonaki will disturb us a little, but we'll get used to them. When we get to go out on a field trip, and when some farmer presses some food on us from his meager ration, we'll take some token goat cheese or something so the man won't feel bad, but our Kolonaki interpreter will do better by himself. He'll tell us, with his mouth full, to go ahead and help ourselves, and then he'll talk to the farmer almost as if he's ordering him to push more stuff at us, and this I think will embarrass the men of our mission.

If we come across someone who's been hurt—maybe a broken rib—our Kolonaki aide will almost get mad at us if we try to help out. He'll explain why—the Greek peasant isn't used to too much attention, he takes care of himself, and there's no telling what trouble we might get into if we stick our nose into that kind of business.

ALLEN D. FIELDS, newspaperman and magazine writer, spent eight months in Greece as director of public relations for UNRRA's Balkan mission.

Our Park Avenue residents wouldn't act like that. On Park Avenue, too, philanthropy and interest in things like social welfare are almost fashionable, but on Kolonaki Hill they aren't.

✱

Kolonaki got along with the Germans, when they occupied Greece.

It wasn't collaboration, but the Germans liked music and so they'd have musicales.

Leland Stowe reported that one funny thing was that while almost every single family in Greece was in mourning for a father, a brother, a daughter, killed by the Germans, there were scarcely any Kolonaki families that suffered that way.

A few did, of course. And not everyone who lived on the Hill was without a mind or conscience. One friend of mine who lived on Kolonaki Hill but did not consider himself Kolonaki explained it this way: "The Germans wanted to split the Greek people among themselves, and so while they executed many of the others and burned their villages down with flame-throwing tanks, they deliberately spared the Kolonaki to blacken them in the eyes of the others."

He just got to the States—this friend—and I asked him about the collaborators. When I was there, only one sixteen-year-old kid who had worked for the Germans was executed; the rest were all over the place, in the government, in the army, and so on. He said: "It's a matter that makes me feel so ashamed that I can't discuss this in front of your American friends. They wouldn't understand." Later he told me that the score was the same and that the collaborators were more powerful than ever. My friend is just a nice guy, but he's the apologetic kind. He wants to be reasonable.

✱

Some of the money we're sending to Greece is for relief, and we'll employ Kolonaki to distribute it. We just about have to. Kolonaki women helped us to distribute clothing for UNRRA. They'd wear their oldest rags to the depot, and then exchange them for the best clothing they could fish out.

Others would too. But the Kolonaki had plenty of good clothes at home. So then the government put a halt to that. They made a law that people whose homes had been looted should have first choice of clothing.

Well, the only homes that were looted were homes that had something lootable that the Germans didn't take. Kolonaki Hill was the place that was defended, though—so how could those homes be looted? Well, they weren't. But all Kolonaki had summer villas at the seashore and they were looted. So our clothing relief lines were packed with women whose closets at home bulged, but they didn't have to wear their old things to the depot after that. They wore their fur coats.

There's an outdoor Taverna on the Hill; it's called Jimmy's or Johnny's and it's the place for an afternoon Ouzo. Our mission will be found there, and they'll meet some gorgeous women who will tell them all about their hardships and sufferings. Our men will understand. They'll have to because they'll like to.

They'll live well. Servants? For cigarettes. And boy, will their boots be polished, rubbed with bone, saddle-soaped! The Germans and British brooked no nonsense, and neither should we.

✱

Most of the Greeks have had enough. They had the Italians in the Albanian war, and the Germans, and the civil war, and they want a magazine-ad post-war world as hard—if not harder—than we do. The older folks are mournful after almost ten solid years of bloodshed. Strangers in cafes tell you how tired they are of fighting, and they feel they must impress you with the fact that Greeks really are not fighters, hate warfare.

Yet for four hundred years they fought the Turk. It's as if the States had been occupied by a foreign invader clear through from the time of Pocahontas and John Smith, through the Tea Party, the Gettysburg Address, the Spanish-American War, World War I, the flapper age, World War II, and right up to Harry Truman.

These other Greeks are not much the restaurant type. They're wiry, tough, and emotional, and they sit in the mountains and in island jails rather than give up their freedom. For the unemotional Anglo-American, their passion for Eleutheria is almost embarrassing.

But when we're there we won't be bothered by the fellows who used to come up and shake hands and tell you they're John Papadapolous, of Scramtum, Pa. Our men will have to travel in groups anyway. We won't feel as uneasy as we used to, about the bulging jails. Now it will be clearer that only the others are in them.

Kolonaki Hill will be velvet. A good place to hang out—nice to come home to. We must get to know about Kolonaki Hill.

Drawn from life by Oscar Berger

King George

Dixie in Black and White

BY A. G. MEZERIK

II. The People Win in Georgia

Atlanta, Georgia, March 19

THE corridors had been packed for days. The people who were waiting for the decision shuffled their feet and talked in low voices. The general air of expectancy was a little dulled today; clothes were dampish and spirits lowered by an all-day rain outside. Then like a skyrocket on a Fourth of July night, the court's ruling came. Talmadge is out; Thompson is Governor by a five-to-two decision of the Supreme Court. The crowd moved into the halls of the Legislature and filled the seats of the galleries. The session was sixty-seven days old, would end on Saturday, and aside from the white-primary bill, the Legislature had passed only one other measure of state-wide significance. The few bills it had passed were now illegal and would not be law until and unless the new Governor, M. E. Thompson, decided to approve them. The Legislature, having been frustrated by the court in its attempt to destroy the people's voting rights by installing Herman Talmadge, spent itself on the day of the voters' triumph fulminating against the State Supreme Court. Then, realizing the futility of its sound and fury, it adjourned.

Herman Talmadge, who had so brazenly stolen the governorship, walked out of the Capitol vowing he would be back in 1949. The people, "the court of last resort" he called them now, would vindicate him. On Atlanta's wet streets those people, well remembering young Talmadge's contempt for people and their votes, were buying extra editions of the Journal, congratulating each other and enjoying the strength that comes when democracy is found to be living and in action.

Truly Georgia, in its two months of hectic dictatorship, had had enough. The moral revolt which started with Herman Talmadge's coup d'état had now succeeded. The air was cleaner, but thoughtful Georgians were asking themselves, "Is this truly the beginning of a new era?" Law and the rights of man had triumphed, but the things which made possible Herman Talmadge and his father, "Old Gene," are still very much alive.

The original troubles still remain, and they cannot be solved in Atlanta alone. Race relations, the hold of Northern monopoly, and industrialization are Georgia's big underlying problems, but they affect the whole South and the entire country.

The North demands that the South better relations between Negroes and whites, forgetting New York's Harlem, Detroit's Paradise Valley, and Chicago's South Side. The South wants Northern monopoly to empty its carpet-bag and get out, forgetting that Southern bourbons have been full partners in forging the chains on the South's economy. North and South, the majority of people are ignorant of the price which the entire nation pays for race prejudice and monopoly. Exploitation by Northern monopolists and their Southern quislings keeps the South poor, even where it has rich resources. The poverty is reflected in bitter competition for a share of the few pennies which are available. The competition is naturally most severe and malignant at the lowest level—in the mill towns, in the hills, on the land.

These conditions have been only too well illustrated in Georgia during Herman Talmadge's ascendancy, when the state government degenerated into a joke with sinister overtones. Let us look at the facts behind the political tent show. Georgia is the biggest Southern state east of the Mississippi; it has a splendid climate, vast forests (twenty-four million acres), and a variety of minerals. And it has 3,200,000 people. But see what happens to the people. Each person has to get along on an average of $761 a year—the figure for the best year in Georgia's history. In forty-one states people are better off. New York has a per capita income of $1,595. Georgia's big farm population, producing cotton, peanuts, tobacco, and sugar cane, has less than one-half the per capita cash income of rural citizens outside the South. Nearly half a million Georgia homes—farm and city together—have no running water; the infant death rate is exceeded in the whole country by only four states, and they too are Southern. The nation spends annually $103.49 per public-school pupil—teachers' strikes and pupil discontent testify to the inadequacy of even this amount—but Georgia spends only $45.47.

Georgia's peculiar politics are, in fact, based on poverty and financed by those who would perpetuate it. Money comes from the Northern owners of Southern railroads, textile mills, utilities, and banks and from their allies, the Southern bourbons. Though the poverty-stricken masses are the voting backbone of the hate politicians, the Talmadge campaigns have not been dependent on the nickels and dimes of the "wool-hats"—a name used to describe the back-country people who in earlier times bought a square of felt and shaped it into a hat by soaking it in hot sheep fat. Georgia politics are controlled by the right wing of the Democratic Party, which has kept the South hog-tied for generations. In this context the position of James A. Farley, who split with Roosevelt because of the latter's progressivism, as chairman of the Board of the Coca-Cola Export Corporation is easily understood. Mr. Farley may have no connection with the Talmadge group, but many others of his kind have taken an active, if silent, part in Southern political campaigns.

A. G. MEZERIK, author of "The Revolt of the South and West," has spent the past several months making a new survey of the South. This is the second article of a series he is writing on current political and economic trends in various Southern states.

The monopolists and bourbons leave the talking to the Talmadges and their henchmen, who make political hay out of race prejudice. At the same time, because they know their back country well, the Talmadges expose many a legitimate grievance. "Old Gene," until his death in 1946, was unequalled in sensing and aggravating the fears and discontents of poor people. A superlative servant of the rich corporations that financed him, he was skilled in making poverty and reaction seem virtues in the man whose vote he needed. "Keep a man poor," he used to say, "and you'll keep him honest." Talmadge kept men poor. He fanned the discontent of the wool-hats and directed it against the more prosperous and better-educated people of the towns as well as against the ever-present Negroes, the traditional scapegoats.

"OLD GENE'S" MARCH TO DICTATORSHIP

Talmadge's career shows how easily an American can become a dictator by using the masses and their needs as leverage. "Old Gene" got his start in 1926 as state commissioner of agriculture. In that post until 1932, he became the spokesman for the farmers, who had never been in worse plight. He spent the state's money to stop the falling market in hogs. Faced with impeachment for this, he dramatized himself as the champion of the people. He became a popular hero and beat down a dozen other candidates for the governorship in 1932. In the campaign he stumped the state denouncing the politicians who had exploited the people. His own great promise was to provide three-dollar automobile plates. Once in office, he made good on this promise, defying the Legislature in order to do it and beginning his career of governing by decree. Thereby he and his henchmen propagated the powerful legend, "Talmadge always keeps his promises."

He kept the issues simple; so that they could be understood by people with the least money or education. When he ran again, in 1934, he didn't need a platform. He was the simple man from Sugar Creek, not a man who spoke high-sounding words about fiscal affairs and such things, just a man who kept his promises. And the wool-hats turned out again to reelect him. By 1936 his eyes were on the United States Senate, but the record of his governorship was beginning to catch up with him. He had shoved textile strikers into concentration camps; he had frequently used state troops; he had forcibly ousted elected officials and commissions. Instead of answering these charges he raised simple issues about national government. He promised to bring back two-cent postage and to cut the national budget. But the New Deal was delivering the goods, and the very people who had voted in "Old Gene" before were benefiting from AAA, FSA, and TVA and supporting Roosevelt. More than two-cent postage was needed to hold the country people. And suddenly Talmadge's real backers came into the open. The man from Sugar Creek, it appeared, was the darling of the bankers and the Liberty League. The big employers made speeches for him, and their arguments revealed how little "Old Gene" had done for the rank-and-file voters. The financial and industrial interests said they wanted Talmadge because he had cut taxes and public services, in marked contrast to a federal government spending billions on relief.

Realizing that the Liberty League would not save him, Talmadge invoked the Negro menace. Before 1936 he had not needed, or bothered, to use it. But the times were not right, and his bid for the Senate was defeated. In 1940 he again pulled out all the stops on white supremacy and was elected for another term as governor, during which he used dictatorial methods to destroy the state university system. On his next try, in 1942, "Old Gene" was defeated by Ellis Arnall. Then came 1946, bringing labor's organizing drives and the Supreme Court decision that Negroes might vote in primaries. The combination was manna from heaven. With it "Old Gene" played on the simplest and most direct fears of the country folk. It was almost enough to elect him—almost but not quite, for when the votes were tabulated he would have lost had it not been for the county-unit system. Talmadge's opponent had more votes than he had, but they did not count.

The county-unit system is one of those voting restrictions invented by the Talmadges for the Talmadges. It effectively cancels the city vote and delivers the preponderant power to the rural areas. Under it the primary vote for elected state and federal officials is tabulated by county units. Each county has twice as many unit votes as it has representation in the lower house of the state legislature. Fulton County, in which is Atlanta, with a population of 400,000 has three representatives in the lower house and therefore six unit votes. Echols County with a population of 3,000 has one representative and therefore two unit votes. Thus one vote for Talmadge in Echols County counterbalanced fifty votes for his opponent in Atlanta. In another county a single Talmadge vote was worth more than fifty-six against him in Atlanta.

The system permitted Talmadge to ignore the cities and concentrate on his crossroads show. He went to the crossroads riding on cotton bales. He stood in his red suspenders, drinking from a gourd, and responded to cues from a stooge in overalls perched in a tree near the platform. When the speaking was over, his henchmen carried him off on their shoulders. This routine got the votes. "Old Gene's" success was greatest where discontent was deepest, needs most desperate. He knew what the country people wanted, but he never gave them anything but three-dollar auto tags—for a little while—and federally financed projects and roads. "Old Gene" kept many more promises to his financial and corporate backers. Today the people of the back country are left with a legend which is false and with old needs which are real. The Talmadge legend will be fuel for the next demagogue's fire until that day when the country people have seen that somebody really cares and is doing something about it.

DEMAGOGUE'S FORMULA

The back country, not only in Georgia but everywhere in the South, fails to get the services it needs. Farm-to-market roads have not been built, and the farmer is left at the mercy of a city middleman. County roads have not been hard-surfaced and are impassable a good part of the time. Schools are hopelessly dilapidated, incompetently manned, and impossible to reach in bad weather, even if there were enough school buses, which there are not. Good teachers cannot be obtained. There is a great deficiency of hospitals, doctors, and nurses, and where they do exist, their quality is poor.

Anyone who promises to improve things will get a hearing from the wool-hats. Who prevents the farmer and the small-towner from having these essentials? The answer of every Southern demagogue follows the same pattern. It is the goddess, overdressed, overeating city dweller. "The cities have the hospitals, schools, and roads. They have stolen what you are entitled to; that's why they have them and you don't. Hate the cities." And there is enough truth in this to convince people whose discontent is real.

The second villain, according to the Southern demagogue, is monopoly. Never, never does he name the Georgia Power Company, the United States Steel Corporation, or du Pont. Always he limits himself to a general accusation against monopoly. But when he begins to rail against Yankee labor leaders, his reticence leaves him. He rolls their names on his tongue—Baldzani, John L. Lewis, and Sidney Hillman (for the politician's purposes the last remains alive and well). He loves to linger on the Italian and Jewish names, which sound especially outlandish to the isolated Scotch-Irish of the Piedmont.

"What are the Yankees trying to do to you? Make you into coolies, slave labor, paying dues to un-American unions. They'll give you jobs to niggers." There comes in the familiar note. From that point it is easy. The "nigger," if the demagogue's opponent wins, will supervise all jobs, take over the land, push Mr. Wool-Hat off the street—he thinks the "nigger" is acting too uppity in the cities anyway—and end by raping his daughter.

As part of the formula, the demagogue ties up his opponent with the outsiders. "Arnall is a Wallace man, Wallace is a C. I. O. man," therefore they are "nigger lovers." "Turn out and beat them—keep Georgia pure." And in the wings, while this hammy act goes on, stand the financial and industrial backers.

Helping the demagogue on the local level is the Ku Klux Klan and its thousand variants—one even has "Coast Guard" in its title. All of these are anti-labor or anti-Negro, or both. Here and there the aid of a preacher is enlisted. "Parson Jack" has his headquarters in Columbus, Georgia, in a tabernacle that cost $100,000. The building was the gift of Columbus Roberts, a gentleman with large holdings in the Coca-Cola Bottling Company and other industries. "Parson Jack" publishes a sheet called the Trumpet, which specializes in anti-union diatribes. Not long ago he explained in the Trumpet in heavy type that C. I. O. stood for Communist International Organizations. When admonished by another preacher who said he could prove the C. I. O. was not Communist, Parson Jack replied, "You may be able to prove the C. I. O. isn't Communist, but you will never convince me that the Federal Churches of Christ in America is anything but Communist." Anti-labor employers who provide funds for preachers like Parson Jack explain blandly that it is an old Southern custom for mill-owners to contribute to churches in the small towns.

BOURBONS IN RETREAT

The Northern industrialists and Southern bourbons who finance the demagogues resolved to keep their men in power. Today they are in retreat, Governor M. E. Thompson sits in the State Capitol and the people rejoice. The next big step comes in December, 1948, when the election for governor is held. Between now and then Herman Talmadge and his Northern friends will be trying to stave off change. Already Talmadge has announced a speaking tour on which he will make his bid for all-South leadership in company with none other than Gerald L. K. Smith. These will be critical days for the new forces which came into being in the moral fervor of the fight to oust Herman Talmadge. The demagogues and their backers, in installing their pretender, stimulated a valiant opposition. They brought into action against them almost the entire organized church of Georgia and the South. (Preachers like Parson Jack are not accepted in most organizations of ministers.) A large section of the decent citizens of the state became aroused by the immoral nature of the white-primary bill. Voters and politicians who had been excluded from party councils demanded their rights and were determined to take steps inside or outside the one-party set-up to get those rights; this may lead to a two-party system.

In June, 1946, a Gallup poll revealed that 62 per cent of all Southerners having an opinion believed that the one-party system was bad for the South. More than a majority wanted a two-party system. The majority would be much greater now since the attempted seizure of the Democratic Party and the governorship by Herman Talmadge in Georgia. An organization called "The Aroused Citizens of Georgia" has been formed to revamp the Democratic Party so it can serve as a democratic vehicle. This movement will go forward.

The signs today foretell a better era, although the 1,085,000 Negroes who are the submerged third of Georgia may well remain depressed. Their day has not yet come. White supremacy is still a staple, and while it exists it will be felt by the Negro in every relationship. The lynching of four Negroes at Monroe, Georgia, followed "Old Gene's" incendiary speeches, and this year in Greenville, South Carolina, a Negro was lynched after a white-primary bill was passed in that state.

The demagogue has been able in the past to sell his race-hate bill of goods to the wool-hats, the Crackers, and the red-necks. Their reaction is conditioned by their ignorance, their poverty, and their prejudices. The root of the trouble which plagues the South is not in these people of the back country but in the evils which beset them.

The use of race hate in politics, in Georgia or any other Southern state, will have to be fought with deeds. Southern liberal leaders are learning that what is said is not so important as what is done. When a hard road or a school is built in the red-clay hills, the families living near know who got it for them. That is an argument which sticks, as the demagogues' empty promises do not. Southern progressives who can offer this type of concrete help will be supported in the rural areas. There are many more people in the South who will welcome a working democracy than is indicated by newspaper reports, which deal almost exclusively with coup d'états, lynchings, and fiery crosses. In every walk of life, save among practicing bourbons and Northern overseers, people have stood up to be counted in the face of public threats of violence and private warnings from their bankers. Among them are leaders as able as any to be found in New York or Washington. Hosts of young people, on the campuses, in the factories, and in the churches, are readying themselves to fight a political battle for social ends. But if they are to win the victory, Southern needs must be recognized as national problems, important not only in Atlanta but in Seattle and New York.

Meanwhile Atlanta and Georgia may well celebrate. They have had a victory in which people's rights became state's rights.

In the Wind

TOM KELLY, twenty-six, Aleutian campaign veteran and Reed College (Oregon) student, was arrested last month and jailed overnight by the Portland police when they found him reading Shelley by moonlight. He was held for investigation by the FBI before being released.

"I EXTEND TO YOU my sincere congratulations in this your sixtieth year of publishing. Faithfully and fearlessly you have crusaded . . . and fought against disloyal destructive forces . . . within our God-blessed land."—Francis Cardinal Spellman to William Randolph Hearst, in the New York Journal-American, March 3, 1947.

WILLIAM W. WALISZEWSKI was fined $150 in the Columbus (Georgia) city court last February 12 on a charge of driving while under the influence of intoxicants. Wilson Greenleaf, a Negro, same court, same day, same charge, was given a fine of $500 or a sentence of twelve months.

WE, THE MOTHERS, Mobilize for America, one of Elizabeth Dilling's organizations, has whipped up a fifty-four-page pamphlet accusing the Jews of having kidnapped the Lindbergh baby and murdered it for ritual purposes.

SHORT STORY from the March 10 Associated Press wires: "Rome—Rear Admiral Ellery W. Stone, former Allied Commissioner in Italy, announced today his engagement to Countess Renata Arborio Mella di Sant' Elia, member of a prominent Italian family closely connected with the Vatican. . . . Born a Protestant, Admiral Stone was baptized into the Catholic church Saturday and was received Sunday by Pope Pius XII. . . . Admiral Stone and the former Louise F. Wardwell were divorced a fortnight ago in Reno."

PROFESSOR HERBERT D. LAMSON, a Boston marriage counselor, has advised "eligible men and women" to pick a mate who is a political conservative in order to insure marital happiness.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

KEITH HUTCHISON

Why Greeks Go Left

IF THERE were no Communists in Greece, the Greek government would have to invent them. For in order to survive, the Athenian regime must do something to improve the desperate economic situation in Greece, must provide at least subsistence for the Greek people and offer them some hope for the future. This necessitates large financial assistance from abroad, and since Britain has no more pounds to spare, the United States is the only possible banker. But if Mr. Truman had appealed to Capitol Hill for funds to invest solely in the economic reconstruction of Greece, he would surely have been turned down. Only a Congress scared to death by a vision of Greece being dragged behind the iron curtain is likely to vote assistance on the required scale.

The result is that the Communist danger has been played up, and the real menace in Greece, the abysmal poverty which a corrupt and inefficient government cannot cope with, the menace which swells the ranks of the partisans, has been played down. This subject, however, has received a good deal of attention from the United Nations agencies which the Administration has cold-shouldered. Last May, for instance, the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) sent a mission to Greece to study agriculture, fisheries, and related industries and to make recommendations for their rehabilitation and development. In carrying out this task the mission, most of whose members were American, was compelled to review the whole Greek economy. Its recently published report, therefore, throws much light on the basic causes of the Greek crisis, and its recommendations include valuable suggestions for restoring the country to a modicum of prosperity.

Greek losses in the war were prodigious, for the Germans did a more than usually thorough job of earth-scorching. They destroyed or seriously damaged about one-eighth of the country's dwellings, blew up innumerable bridges, wrecked a large part of the railroad system. The Greek merchant marine, important as a means of earning foreign exchange and essential for local communications, was decimated. Altogether, it has been estimated, the country's losses totaled some five billion dollars. Yet, with so much work to be done, unemployment is rife. Compared to totalitarian Yugoslavia, which suffered devastation on a similar scale, "democratic" Greece has shown little energy in tackling the job of reconstruction.

Even before the war Greece was one of the most poverty-stricken countries in Europe. Mainly agricultural, it was attempting to support far too large a population on its soil. On the average, the FAO mission reports, cropland per person on farms is only 1.31 acres—about the same as in India. Working with primitive implements and using too little fertilizer, the peasants achieve crop yields far below the European average. What is needed in Greece is more intensive cultivation by a smaller number of farmers, but to achieve that industries must be developed to drain off the surplus population and expand the market for farm products.

The outstanding recommendation of the FAO mission—the development of the neglected Greek water resources—is related to both these objectives. Like California, Greece has a mild climate with a rainfall which would be fairly adequate if evenly distributed throughout the year. Unfortunately concentration of this rainfall in a few winter months means that a great deal of it runs off rapidly, causing erosion, flood damage, and the creation of malarial swamps in the low country. A systematic program of water control and development must therefore be the first step toward making Greek agriculture more productive. It should be possible, the mission suggests, to irrigate, and so make available for intensive agriculture, about one-fifth of the cultivatable land. Considerable areas could also be reclaimed by erosion control and drainage works. In connection with such projects, the mission proposes hydroelectric developments large and small, which eventually could give Greece an energy supply equal to that produced at Boulder Dam. Provided that electric-power charges were based on actual costs and not on costs of alternative methods of power production, such a program could immensely stimulate the growth of industry.

Apart from such specific plans, the mission makes a number of recommendations regarding agricultural research and education, reconstruction of transport, development of fisheries, encouragement of cooperatives, emigration, and so forth. But its members obviously realized that the best of schemes will be still-born unless handled by government midwives with clean hands and some degree of energy and technical skill. Hence their report goes somewhat beyond their terms of reference by suggesting basic government reforms in a manner that implies sharp criticism of the prevailing system. For instance, speaking of the "shortcomings" of the civil service, it mentions "exclusive reliance on seniority in promotions; excessive centralization of control in Athens; frequent political interference . . . an exceedingly inadequate scale of civil-service pay . . . unduly short working hours; and conflicting and duplicating allocation of administrative responsibility."

The mission's comments on the present Greek tax structure are even more revealing. It points out that the present system is extremely regressive, with the burden weighing far more heavily on the poor than on the well-to-do. Only about 15 per cent of the current revenue comes from direct taxes on profits, rents, and real property; the remainder is raised by imports on "almost every stage in production, transportation, and trade," with the result that the production and marketing of goods are both inhibited. Moreover, as the report points out, "the tax structure is responsible, in part at least, for the exceedingly unequal distribution of wealth and income in Greece"—an inequality demonstrated by the contrast in Athens between the luxurious living of the few and the rags and hunger of the many.

The mission suggests that the Greek government should seek technical aid from the United Nations and financial assistance from the World Bank. But, it hints unmistakably, such aid should be conditioned on internal reform. Now that President Truman has pushed the U.N. out of the picture and assumed for the United States the economic and moral burden of Greek resuscitation, I hope he will be equally insistent on radical changes in the Greek system of administration and fiscal and economic policies. Otherwise Greece is likely to turn out an exceedingly bad investment, with the bulk of the American taxpayers' money ending up in the pockets of the Greek government's rich supporters, and communism continuing to draw strength from the hunger and despair of the masses.

IN ONE EAR

BY LOU FRANKEL

THE fight for better radio went off on a fresh tangent a fortnight ago when a group of top-drawer advertising and network executives organized a Broadcasters' Advisory Council which, in the words of Charles G. Mortimer, vice-president of General Foods, will "see if [it] can make radio more what the public wants."

The industry and its trade association, the National Association of Broadcasters, have always insisted the public was getting what it wanted, but the people behind the Broadcasters' Advisory Council have long been disturbed by the industry's penchant for feuding with the Federal Communications Commission instead of cleaning house and getting on with a profitable business. The announced intention of the new organization to meet instead of ignore criticism brought the schism into the open.

Behind the break is an interesting chain of events. For twenty years the N. A. B. has been struggling to shed its diapers. In its early days it was dominated by the networks, so much so that for a time the non-network stations had their own organization, the National Association of Independent Broadcasters. This group lasted only until the independents acquired more power in the N. A. B., but the internal conflict in the latter organization left it without effectual leadership.

During this time the networks lost their monopoly fight in the courts and Congress. Finally, knowing that the FCC was preparing its indictment of their programming soon to be published as its famous "Blue Book," they persuaded the industry to put a strong man at the head of the association. Justin Miller, educator and ex-judge of the United States Court of Appeals in Washington, was given the job at $50,000 a year.

Judge Miller was an eminent jurist but a novice in radio, and when the "Blue Book" was released, he took the advice of certain men of limited vision on his staff and on that of the Broadcasting Magazine, the industry's most affluent trade publication, and proceeded to fight the FCC in public meetings and the press. The "Blue Book," however, had caught radio flagrante delicto. The networks and a few enlightened broadcasters realized that fighting it would only keep the spotlight on the industry's weak spots and do it no good. Instead of arguing with the FCC, they wanted to talk about the many things radio had to its credit. In the end the N. A. B. Board of Directors ordered Judge Miller to "stop trying to lick the FCC and to win them with friendship instead." The Judge refused to go along.

He had been out in the sticks talking with the small broadcasters, most of whom were guilty of the abuses documented in the "Blue Book." From them he had gathered that the majority of his members wanted a fight to the finish with the FCC. So today the Judge and his staff are busy throwing bricks at the commission, and Broadcasting Magazine is leading a drive to cut its budget. In protest, the two major networks, NBC and CBS, have resigned their representation on the directorate of the N. A. B. and with Mutual are now supporting the Broadcasters' Advisory Council.

For several years key men like Frank Stanton, president of CBS, and Edgar Kobak, president of Mutual, together with important people in the advertising agencies and representatives of powerful advertisers like Lever Brothers, Standard Brands, and General Foods, have sweated to stabilize the industry. They standardized rate cards and coverage maps, clipped the chiselers, and tamed the greedy. They knew radio advertising was a gold mine. They knew that both sides get dirty in a mud-fight. They strongly counseled moderation. Even when "The Hucksters" lambasted their business, they played it smart and refused to fight back.

These people know how to interpret figures. They read the Hooperatings. They see that more radio sets are in use now than ever before. They know things are going well. But they keep a finger on the public's pulse, and they also know that a considerable minority among listeners are unhappy. For these men fighting is out. If they cannot provide what the public wants they will try to persuade the public to take something else. They remember all too well the stench uncovered during the fight against the pure food and drug regulations. Radio broadcasting is a quarter-billion-dollar business. Let it ride with the punches.

When the split came in the N. A. B., it was only natural for the moderates to create the Broadcasters' Advisory Council. Within a year a considerable segment of the radio industry may have joined them. What it means is that the broadcasters, unable to run their own show, are giving the customers—that is, the advertisers and agencies—control of commercial radio. This will make for better commercials, but just what it will do to programs in the public interest is a question.

Anything which cramps the reactionaries within the N. A. B. strengthens the FCC. Likewise anything which standardizes the commercial side of radio should free brain power for the sustaining and public-interest programs. Perhaps when the Broadcasters' Advisory Council is really in the saddle, stations and networks will lend a more attentive ear to what the listener wants.

BOOKS and the ARTS

NORFOLK MEMORIALS

I

North Pickenham

The army was ours that spring. Landing in England Captured an island much reduced by rain.
Deep in the humpbacked huts we cursed and cowered, Waiting for mid-July, for now it seemed Spring was the traitor, continually it seemed
The summit of the summer was the sun.

The planes got up and barked all over England,
And here rode such a ruddy Alexander
As England greened to look upon. His voice
Was Akron and Atlanta, but his eyes
Covered the skyline with a natural grace,
And when he took the air the air took fire.
This was the springboard, lifting him so high
He thought at first all diving was to fly.
His government provided scant instruction
As to the downward journey; then his life
Turned in the hand of God, he was on his own,
For where was the manual on how to die?
If he sometimes had to fall, his flaming hair
No more concerned the medical department
Than symptoms of an unproscribed surprise,
An unmilitary terror in his face.

Some only fell in love. For them the land
Hovered under the sky. They lay in meadows Trimmed like movie sets, where bursts of green
Startled the flying bombs and where the sun
Managed its cocktail parties all day long.
Much that they did was vital, but the stamp
Set on their records marked them as autre temps;
They loved love, when they should have laughed it off.
How could the brow describe so brave an arc
As that improvident parabola
Carved by the bomber on a screaming sky?

Incessantly the planes proclaimed disaster.
The lovers of the nightride in the lorry
Lingered as long as any could afford,
But when the runs of liberty were canceled
Even the least passionate embrace
Seemed overdone, so widely was it done.

And all the planes leapt overhead and soared.

II

Wendling

Here were planes. But everything else was gone.
Somewhere in the southern part of France
Peasants gathered like vultures, and the life

Seized from the grounded airman oddly bent
Under the platane, this life was flesh,
Love of our life caught in the upturned eyes.
Defying all the mockeries of maneuvers
And violating all the secret commandments
It justified the war, and in its hand
Turned the neck of a flower like the stem
Of a wine glass, while the grateful peasants,
Raising their arms in prayer, proposed a toast.

Some read the numbers on the casualty list,
Counting the odds. Others, the erstwhile friends,
Showed shocked faces, thought as long as they dared
On the impossible event. Others shed tears
In private. Beyond these there were those Who sleepwalked in the daytime, groping the air
For something that never seemed to be wholly there.
Their hands went out and faltered and their eyes,
Dry and blind as mirrors, walked the earth
Like tourists who only have time to cover ground.

All this concerned the younger generation
(The oldest pilot would now be twenty-six).
Some who escaped wept on the ravished field,
Hiding their faces from their thoughts of home.
The lovelorn found it a time for awkwardness
In public places. The resigned pose came later.

Who could have said which look of love was real?
And how many knew what loves were gone forever
In those days when the war wound up the war?

Now watch the planes move over the horizon
Much like the elephants of Leconte de Lisle.

COMAN LEAVENWORTH

THE MATERIALISTS: 1946

This delight condemns us, what can we do for hope,
The elisions of immortality
Strike to us here.
No day after tomorrow enlarges shape.
This is delight's immediate sphere.

What will relieve us, the salutary
Outward offense of disaster
And circumstance,
Or your whole loss, or any lost vagary?
We are condemned beyond the hope of chance.

When the hanged men of burning autumn
Reproach themselves
Upon the brilliant branch,
We, reproaching them for their variable outcome,
Stay to delight's invariable task.

JOSEPHINE MILES

SPEAK UP NOW

or Forever Lose Your Peace!

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S PROGRAM ON GREECE AND TURKEY CAN SHATTER THE U.N.

If you believe that starving people need food, not guns—that the American ideal of democracy can only be preserved by people who are fed, not fought—that we should aid people, not armies—that the enactment of the Truman proposals will undermine the U. N., divide the world in two, and usher in a century of fear—THEN YOU MUST SPEAK UP NOW!

WHAT P.C.A. IS DOING

P. C. A. is acting in this crisis—with full-page ads in the New York Times, Washington Post, Chicago Sun, and other newspapers reproducing the complete text of Henry Wallace's magnificent radio address of March 13, in answer to the Truman proposals—with a mass rally in Madison Square Garden—with two coast-to-coast broadcasts—with a mass delegation in Washington—by distributing hundreds of thousands of leaflets of the Wallace speech—with community group activity throughout the country (opinion polls, rallies, forums, petitions, delegations).

We are giving the public the facts it needs to act!

What YOU can do

If you can't act in person, will you send your dollars to act for you? Every dollar received goes into a special fund used solely to mobilize public opinion to the significance of the Greek crisis—which is really a U. N. crisis—an American crisis—YOUR crisis. Every dollar will go into advertising, radio, and leaflets.

P.C.A. BELIEVES: This is not an issue of any single progressive organization. Every group and individual believing in the U. N. and peace must stand together.

PROGRESSIVE CITIZENS OF AMERICA

205 East 42nd St.

New York 17

Jo Davidson — Frank Kingdon, co-chairmen

HEAR

HENRY WALLACE

ON GREECE AND TURKEY

MADISON SQUARE GARDEN

Monday, MARCH 31, 7:30 p.m.

Tickets 60c — $3.60

HELP SAVE THE UN

I want to help spread protests against the Truman proposals to support the reactionary governments of Greece and Turkey and enclosing $..... for advertising and pamphlets.

☐ Allocate $3.00 of the above toward membership in P. C. A.

Name.....

Address.....

City..... Zone..... State.....

Political Anthology

DISCOVERY OF EUROPE. Edited with an Introduction and Comments by Philip Rahv. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

AMERICAN writings about Europe during the first 170 years of the Republic aggregate into a library of great volume and richness. Its authors have few illusions as to the youth and rawness of their own civilization, yet tend to look with disaffection upon what passes across the ocean for ripeness. They themselves are transplanted Europeans; most of these writers look back to an English origin, and all are tied with some closeness to literary England by the bond of language. So their situation is poignant; much as when a young man individually comes to self-consciousness and is obliged to appraise his nearest elders, who are enveloped with the complacency that comes of success, and not visibly infered as they ought to be by any sense of guilt.

Philip Rahv anthologizes from these writings and furnishes running comment as a cultural historian. The originality of his selections is in the large display of writings in which the European influences are not embraced but repelled. He likes the indigenous elements in the American culture.

He is also a political idealist, and the reader will approve his fidelity to the old commitment of this nation to an equalitarian society. But I have the feeling that his political interest is continually and unnecessarily getting in front of his cultural interest; for the two are not the same. The fathers must have picked like magpies from the glittering artifacts, the social rites, the evolved tastes, of countries politically very alien, without especially vitiating their own polity. I should imagine that nothing on earth is humanly much stronger than the set of the democratic principle in American character. So I feel surer of the national integrity than Mr. Rahv seems to be.

He is sternly and oddly on his guard against English influences. Now I presume that I vote pretty much as Mr. Rahv does at election time, and am therefore entitled to some sort of liberal rating; but in attaining to it I do not seem to have noted the need for arbitrary an animus. In his commentary it is as if he projected himself backward into the period when some American wrote fondly about England, and felt that such a man was vicious, and no true patriot; because he must have been socially arrogant, and here was only finding excuse for setting up his own aristocracy, after some miserable and reduced American plan. And Mr. Rahv rejoices when, about the end of World War I, American travelers begin to prefer to stop in France, where there is a "revolutionary tradition" and a truly "intellectual" stimulus, and our country is delivered of the menace of the Anglophiles forever. I think the term "intellectual" may be the key to his position. A new severity has come to political thinking in our time, in that it is abstract, or intellectual, and produces revolution as soon as not, if logic calls for it. But this country has not been very deeply modernized in this sense; it prefers a kind of political action that is more spontaneous in origin, and only evolutionary in the degree of its displacement. Considering the precariousness of the intellectual fiat in an existential world, I am satisfied with that. But historically it is doubtless an effect of English background. The new proficiency at foreign languages which has made us acquainted with other nations than England, or for that matter the eclipse of the British Empire itself, has come far too late to undo it.

